In this section it is declared Congress shall have power to declare war, to raise armies, to provide a navy, &c. If, however, the President and Senate shall approve a treaty of offensive and defensive alliance, they may thereby involve us in war, and stipulate that our contingent shall be an army of twenty or fifty thousand men; several ships-of-the line; a subsidy of many millions, and whatever else they shall conceive conducive to the attainment of the objects of the treaty—a consequence to which the doctrines avowed will indubitably lead us, and which will as clearly usurp all the great legislative powers of the Federal Government. An argument is urged by the advocates of this construction, which depends for its correctness upon the influence and extent of the provision which declares that treaties shall be the supreme law of the land. It is said there are no grades in supremacy, and a supreme implies a subordinate power; that the treaty power being supreme, the legislative power must yield to it, or if the powers be equal, the treaty repeals all laws, theretofore in force, conflicting with its stipulations.

JANUARY, 1816.

Commerce with Great Britain.

II. OF R.

The fallacy of this reasoning is demonstrated by referring it to the test relied on, viz: the provision in the Constitution declaring the effect of treaties, &c. Its language is, "this Constitution, and the laws of the United States, which shall be made in pursuance thereof, and all treaties made, or which shall be made under the authority of the United States, shall be the supreme law of the land." It is not treaties merely which are declared to be the supreme law of the land, but the Constitution and the laws of the United States also. The Constitution is first named: It shall be the supreme law; it is supremest of these supremes, and fully establishes the reverse of the proposition that there are no grades in supremacy; for example, it is admitted that a treaty stipulation directly repugnant to an express prohibition, is void, unless it is because the Constitutional charter is paramount to treaties conflicting with it. And how are these supreme laws marshalled? I answer, according to their grades of supremacy: 1st. The Constitution; 2d. The laws of the United States; and 3d. The treaties—according to a familiar maxim, "qui prior est tempore potior est jure;" if the laws conflict with the Constitution, they are ipso facto void; if treaties contravene existing laws, they are invalid, until the laws are repealed. It is said, as the power to make commercial treaties is not withheld, it constitutes a portion of the general grant "to make treaties." It is not denied by the advocates of this bill, that this position is a sound one; on the contrary, we admit its truth; we say it exists as all other subjects within the legitimate objects of conventional agreements, subject to the limitations or controlling power defined in the Constitution. To illustrate my opinion, the President and Senate may, by treaty, agree to regulate our commerce with a foreign nation, because its regulation comes within the scope of the treaty-making power, subject, nevertheless, to the subsequent sanction of Congress, without which it is invalid, because "Congress shall have power to regulate commerce with foreign nations." The direct power is given to Congress, in positive terms—the indirect subordinate power is given to the President and Senate, by inference only! Here the rule of construction I have referred to, comes in aid of our doctrine, that an express grant shall not be defeated by implication, if the intention of the grantor is unequivocally manifested in its favor.

I admit we cannot have a treaty unless it is through the Executive agency. What I contend for is, that when the treaty embraces a subject requiring legislation, either by a promise to pay money, or that a law shall cease to operate, in all cases Congress must act to render the treaty effectual; that, to repeal a law is as much an act of legislation as to pass a law appropriating money, or for raising taxes, &c.; and that you cannot legislate by treaty, because it is declared by the Constitution that all legislative powers therein granted shall be vested in Congress.

It is said that the act declaring war was repealed by treaty, and hence it is contended every other law may in like manner be repealed. This case, if it were in point, has not the force that precedents are entitled to, because it was not discussed; and it has not the sanction of age, without which, as one of them, no case is considered as of binding validity. But, the case is not an analogous one. The act of war was, first, declaratory that the relations of peace no longer existed with Great Britain; and, second, it authorized the President to employ the national forces in its prosecution.

War is, indeed, as was eloquently remarked by the gentleman from Maryland, (Mr. PINKNEY,) a great prerogative; it is the highest attribute of sovereignty; the greatest scourge of nations. The good and the wise resort to war only when it becomes the lesser of great evils, between which they are compelled, by the wickedness and folly of their enemies, to make a choice. The laws of war are essentially humane and liberal, and every civilized nation that respects the opinions of the world, and the faithful award of posterity, will keep them sacred. By these laws, the commander of an army may agree to an armistice. The President, who is the Commander-in-Chief, may alone suspend hostilities, and with his Constitutional advisers (the Senate) may terminate them. And this is from the necessity of the case, inter arma silent leges. And, when the calamities of war can be honorably ended, the construction should be liberal, if a rigid rule rendered the power doubtful. In the next place, the Treaty of Peace was a complete act; it abridged no power, it violated no right, and required no legislation. It was the exclusive attribute of the treaty power, for it is not enumerated among those granted in the Constitution. Again, the treaty was self-executory; and in fine, it did nothing more than promise that the President, to whom, by the declaration of war, was given the power to wage it, would forbear to prosecute it any longer. How different in all respects is this Commercial Treaty! It is to be in constant prospective operation, and violates daily the express injunctions of a statute which declares that the British vessels shall pay a duty in our ports, from which the treaty exempts them. The treaty, then, exercises all the functions of legislation—it repeals an act of Congress. But, in order to establish the similarity further, it is proper to remark that we co-operated in giving our sanction to the Treaty of Peace by disbanding the Army, and changing the aspect of all our external relations. If, indeed, as has been contended, the power to make treaties is limited, and when made, the treaties are instantly valid, without the agency of Congress, and exceptions to this power are by construction merely,—then it may be said of our Constitution, as has been asserted of Republicanism, that "it means anything or nothing," and the wisdom and precaution of its framers and adopters have been vain and fruitless.

I come now to the second point in the order of my arrangement, viz.: that the treaty-making power is complete, and independent, &c. In my answer to it, I will ask, what is meant by the terms so frequently used, "Congress shall have power?" And what is intended by the phrase power there employed? I suppose it is synonymous with right or discretion, and means a legislative control over the subject delegated, and does not imply compulsion, obligation. And yet we are told, if the fulfilment of the treaty requires legislative enactments, they are compelled by the treaty. I do not speak of a physical compulsion, but a moral obligation; for, if our honor binds us to make the grant, no one pretends that it should be withheld for a moment. The argument on this point was illustrated by supposing two cases—the one where a debt was contracted by a competent agent; the other where an agent sold land in behalf of his principal, under a power which did not authorize the sale. Although in the latter case it was admitted the principal was not bound, yet it was contended there was nevertheless a valid contract. In the first case it was said the debt must be paid, and in the second, you must convey the land to save the agent harmless. Sir, these cases are not apposite. Here the contract is inchoate; the debt is not yet contracted; we gave no power to sell the farm; and are not bound to make good the engagements of one that transcended his powers. But, foreign nations, it is said, regard us as bound, and our faith as pledged to them, whenever a treaty is ratified. This consideration will always render the question an extremely delicate and highly responsible one, and no doubt will have due weight in determining the House of Representatives as to the propriety of passing the necessary laws. I cannot, however, admit, that any civilized nation is so ignorant of our institutions as to suppose that a treaty, when ratified by the President, with the advice of the Senate—no matter what are its provisions—is ipso facto obligatory, and that a refusal by Congress to carry it into effect would violate the national faith. After the refusal of the British Government to ratify the Erskine arrangement, for making which so much praise was bestowed on the President, until it was ascertained that His Majesty did not approve of it, it will be recollected that the Opposition partly changed their tone from praise to censure, and excused the British for a non-compliance, because the Minister had not obeyed his instructions, and condemned the President for treating with him without requiring the production of his patent powers. Our treaty powers are patent; they are defined by the Constitution; they are limited in it. The agent who contracts for his principal, producing his powers, binds him only as far as they go; beyond them he appeals to the discretion of the principal alone; there is no contract, and the party trusting to it has no right to complain if the agreement shall be rejected. It is a well-known rule, that where an agent contracts for the Government, he is not individually liable if he had authority to contract, and it falls within the same principle that he is not liable if he produce the power under which he makes an agreement, and signs it as agent. In the first case, the Government is bound by a valid contract; in the second case, the Government is not bound, as it gave no power, and the individual is not, because he suppressed no fact, he suggested no falsehood, he annexed his letter of attorney to the agreement, and signed it as agent.

If the Congress are bound on all treaty questions in the extraordinary intercourse among nations, and must legislate to give them effect, we are a mere registering body; we ought to go home, and no longer presume to be a deliberative assembly. The complaint which led to the Revolution was the assertion by the King and Parliament of "a right to bind us in all cases whatsoever;" and, after a glorious and successful resistance, we have gained but little, if it shall be once established, that the Representatives of the people have no rights under this Government, and that in derogation of State rights, and in violation of express prohibitions, the treaty-making power can "bind us in all cases." In support of this dangerous power, it is urged that, in establishing the opposite doctrine, we palsy the Executive arm of the Government. And if this consequence were to follow, I pray you whether it would not be a better evil than to annihilate the legislative body? But, say the gentlemen, we admit you have a right to regulate commerce; yet it is by adopting municipal regulations only. How is it, if this distinction be correct, that the Constitution declares we shall have power to regulate commerce with foreign nations? One gentleman (Mr. PICKERING) has attempted an answer; he says it relates only to such nations as will not enter into a treaty of commerce with us. To this explanation I reply, the clause contains no such limitation; and if a foreign nation will not treat with the Executive, I should despair of success by sending the whole Congress abroad for that purpose. If the ships of a foreign nation come within our limits for the purposes of traffic, our regulations, by which they are bound, are municipal, and none of them can be termed a regulation of commerce with such foreign nation. The admission, however, of those that contend our power is municipal only, is fatal to their argument. What is the obvious meaning of the term municipal? Not a regulation of commerce in the body of a State between its citizens, for we have no such power; nor a regulation of commerce "among the States," for that is granted by a separate clause; but its regulation in the ports and harbors of the United States—the very office which it is contended this treaty performs in defiance of the law in your statute book. It is argued that a treaty may, without legislative aid, regulate our foreign trade by defining what shall be deemed contraband of war, and by prohibiting exports of such articles. I admit that the treaty power may stipulate as to what articles shall be contraband, and yet I deny the right of that power to prohibit their exportation. The law of nations designates certain articles as contraband of war; these have been particularly defined by conventional agreements, and that between Russia and England is the most liberal. In these articles you shall not trade with a nation at war, because such a nation, converting them to the purposes of war, is thereby enabled to annoy its adversary, and being neutral yourself, it is your duty to preserve an inviolable impartiality between the belligerents; yet a trade in those articles is not unlawful, provided it is carried on with a Power at peace, and consequently it being a belligerent restriction, it ceases entirely to have effect in time of peace, and in time of war is confined to the parties at war. It follows as a necessary consequence that the exportation cannot be interdicted, but the destination merely.

The third position assumed is, that the treaty requires no sanction; because, says the gentleman from Pennsylvania, (Mr. HOPKINSON,) all prior conflicting laws are repealed by the treaty. The repeal of a law, as has been shown, is a legislative act, and all legislative powers are vested in Congress. The conclusion is, therefore, irresistible, that the argument is erroneous. Another remark is, that there is no instance of the question being put, whether a treaty or no treaty; that in 1795 this House only claimed the right to withhold or grant money to carry the treaty into effect. So in this case we say as it proposes to regulate commerce by repealing the discriminating duties, we have the right to decide upon such repeal, and do not decide the question of treaty or no treaty either. And this for a plain and obvious reason: it does not comport with the practice of the House, or rules of legislation, to decide an abstract proposition. The only departure from this rule, that I recollect, was when, in consequence of the outrageous edicts of Great Britain and France, this House solemnly declared, by the votes of all the members except two, (and these two opposed the declaration on the ground that it was an irregular course,) that the United States could no longer submit to those edicts without a sacrifice of their rights, honor, and independence. It is said, also, that when the treaty power is violated, the check is not here, but in the Constitution. Certainly, sir, it cannot be denied that if we permit the Constitutional powers of the Legislature to be usurped, without an effort to maintain them, we cannot answer for our conduct to our consciences or to our country. We stand here as the sentinels of the people to challenge all hostile attempts to invade their liberties, all hostile attacks subversive of the Constitution.

The gentleman (Mr. HOPKINSON) told us the argument in support of the bill was built upon the supposed impropriety of the conduct of the Senate. How, wherein, I pray you? By asserting our rights; in performing our duties? We claim to participate in acts of legislation; we cannot, if we would, permit the Senate to legislate; if there be any inference of impropriety, the fault lies in the Constitution in creating two branches of the Legislature, and not in performing our functions as one of them. We were called the spoiled child of the Constitution, and were solemnly admonished to beware of jealousy. Sir, we are the favorites of the Constitution, the great agent of all political operations; the money of the people has been confided to us; the purse-strings of the nation have been given into our hands, and, until we loosen them, not a dollar can be drawn from their pockets. But wherein, I ask, do we manifest this jealousy? If by the term it be meant that nice sense of propriety which induces the world, in speaking of a high-minded gentleman, to say that he is jealous of his honor, I accept the application; but if it be meant that we manifest a distrust of the virtue or patriotism of the Senate, I disavow it. Our ground is elevated above the atmosphere in which jealousy of that kind finds its aliment; it is the ground of faithful interpretation and not of expediency; and I will ask the gentleman, in his own language, if the assertion was not used to point an argument or to round a period?

If the view already presented be a correct one, not only does the treaty require the sanctions of a law, but it cannot be executed without an act of the Legislature. It was remarked that this construction would violate the assurances of our Ministers, as they told the British the treaty would be complete on being ratified, and the fifth article was read in support of the assertion. Suppose that such was indeed their opinion in form; it proves nothing more than the discussion now proves, that many distinguished able men take up a similar opinion; the true question is, which opinion is the correct one.

And this brings me to the consideration of the 4th point, viz: that the treaty was promulgated by the President as a valid and binding instrument requiring no legislation. I wish it to be understood that I disclaim entirely the binding influence of any opinions from any quarter; the weight they ought to have is always proportioned to their inherent correctness, and the distinguished talents of those by whom they are pronounced. I always pay due respect to such authority, for the same reason that I would in a court of law to the judgments of Lord Ellenborough. But the President has not expressed the opinion, according to my view, that the gentlemen ascribe to him, but the reverse. I have been led to compare the language of the proclamation promulgating this treaty with that used in the cases of the declaration of war issued on the 19th of June, 1812, of the Treaty of Peace dated the 18th of February, 1815, and I find a marked difference between them. [Here Mr. J. read the proclamations alluded to, which after announcing the facts, "enjoins all persons to be vigilant and zealous in discharging their duties and faithfully to observe and fulfil the treaty," whilst the proclamation touching the convention declares merely that it has been "accepted, ratified and confirmed."] Why, I ask you, this material difference in the proclamations? The Treaty of Peace proclaims the fact to which it relates and "specially enjoins a faithful observance and fulfilment of the treaty." The convention is simply accompanied by a notice that it has been accepted and ratified. Sir, the answer is to be found in the Message of the President dated the 22d of December, in which he "recommends to Congress such legislative provisions as the convention may call for on the part of the United States." Wherefore this Message, if the President did not believe that legislative aid was necessary? The gentleman from Pennsylvania, (Mr. HOPKINSON,) in discussing this point, adverted to the Message and criticised its language. The President, said he, has not used the term does call for; but may call for. The word may is synonymous with shall or will, and to my mind conveys the same idea with does, the word selected by the gentlemen. And can it be supposed that the President intended this evasion? Why recommend to us legislative provisions at all, if none were necessary, and he considered them unnecessary?

The 6th and last point to be noticed is, that the security we have against the abuse of the vast power contended for by the opponents of this bill, is in the public opinion. I differ with my friend from Georgia in regard to public opinion, according to the acceptance of his remarks, though I believe we do not essentially differ. I bow to the public opinion, revere it, and the politician who defies its mandates will sooner or later be prostrated by them. The vox populi is emphatically the vox dei. Not the spurious opinion of a faction that lives upon the breath of a demagogue, and which passes by me as the idle wind which I regard not. But that sober deliberate opinion which is slow to censure and reluctant to condemn, until reason and truth come in aid of rumor, and stamp their impression upon its award. Which, although like the pendulum of a clock it may by winding up the wheels oscillate to and fro until the impetus which propels it is exhausted, at last stands still at that central point where its influence is unbounded, and its power is irresistible. Yet for that very reason that it is slow to operate, is it improper to rely on it as the only safeguard. Why a written Constitution at all, why not abolish the instrument and declare at once that the whole reliance is on public opinion? Sir, if our Henry had been told of this as the security, by the advocates for the Constitution, in the Convention of which he was a member; the lightning of his eloquence, vivid, lasting, piercing as it was when thus elicited, would have been poured out in such a resistless stream, that the parchment, like the oak of the forest when riven by the bolts of Heaven, would have been torn to pieces and scattered in countless fragments to the four winds of the earth. We have a security against the abuse of power which is ample, if it be only vigilantly guarded and faithfully observed. It lies—

- 1st. In the Constitution itself;
- 2d. In the oaths of those who have sworn to support it;
- 3d. In the moral sense of the public agents;
- 4th. In their responsibility to the people; and
- 5th. In the force of the public opinion.

By a due exercise of all their proper functions by all, we shall hand down this Constitution unimpaired to our posterity, and they to theirs, with the holy exclamation of esto perpetua!

Mr. HUGER rose, he assured the House, not to take a part in the debate, nor to offer any arguments of his own. It would be unpardonable in him to do so at that late hour, when the patience of the House must be so nearly exhausted, and the subject had been discussed so ably, so fully, and, as it appeared to him, so unanswerably, on that side of the question, which he should support by his vote. Yet, as it had escaped all those who had preceded him, he could not refuse to himself the gratification, before the yeas and nays were taken, of directing the attention of the House to an authority which (if the arguments already adduced had not produced conviction on every mind) could not fail to decide the point at issue, and under the shadow of which he should at all events be most happy to record his name. Gentlemen themselves, he was well satisfied, would feel indebted to him, late as the hour was, for offering to their consideration, before the final vote was taken, the extracts he was about to read from the book he had in his hand, when he informed them that they were from the pen of the immortal WASHINGTON.

Without further preface, therefore, he begged leave to refer gentlemen to the journals of the 4th Congress, page 193, in which they would find recorded President Washington's Message accompanying the Treaty with Great Britain, or, as it is usually called, Jay's Treaty of '94-'95, in the following words:

"Gentlemen of the Senate and House of Representatives:

"The Treaty of Amity, Commerce, and Navigation between the United States of America and His Britannic Majesty, having been duly ratified, and the ratifications having been exchanged at London the 28th of October, 1795, I have directed the same to be promulgated, and transmit a copy hereof for the information of Congress.

"G. WASHINGTON.

"MARCH 6, 1796."

Such, then, was the Message of President Washington, which accompanied the copy of the Treaty of '94-'95, transmitted to the House of Representatives for the information of Congress, but asking no legislative aid, sanction or co-operation whatsoever, although the Treaty had (in that precisely as in the present instance) been exchanged, ratified, and directed by him to be promulgated.

But it will be further recollected, that in the course of the discussion which afterwards took place on the subject of the treaty, grounds were taken similar to those now contended for, and a resolution was passed requiring the President to lay before the House of Representatives copies of certain papers which it was presumed might throw a light upon the merits of the treaty. In answer to this resolution, or request, the President returned a written Message on the 30th March, which would be found in the journals, page 292. Mr. H. observed he would not take up the time of the House by reading the whole Message at length, but he earnestly requested, and felt himself authorized to claim, the undivided attention of gentlemen to such extracts as had a particular bearing on the question now about to be decided, and which he should proceed to submit to them.

"The course which the debate has taken on the resolution of the House, leads to some observations on the mode of making treaties under the Constitution of the United States.

"Having been a member of the General Assembly, and knowing the principles on which the Constitution was formed, I have ever entertained but one opinion on this subject; and from the first establishment of the Government to this moment, my conduct has exemplified that opinion; that the power of making treaties is exclusively vested in the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate; and that every treaty so made and promulgated thenceforward became the law of the land.

"It is thus the treaty-making power has been understood by foreign nations; and in all the treaties made with them, we have declared, and they have believed, that when ratified by the President, with the advice and consent of the Senate, they became obligatory. In this construction of the Constitution, every House of Representatives has heretofore acquiesced, and until the present time not a doubt or suspicion has appeared, to my knowledge, that this construction was not the true one; nay, they have more than acquiesced, for till now, without controverting the obligation of such treaties, they have made all the requisite provisions for carrying them into effect.

"There is also reason to believe that this construction agrees with the opinions entertained by the State conventions when they were deliberating on the Constitution, especially by those who objected to it, because there was not required, in commercial treaties, the consent of two-thirds of the whole number of the members of the Senate, instead of two-thirds of the Senators present, and because in treaties respecting territorial and certain other rights and claims, the concurrence of three-fourths of the whole number of the members of both Houses, respectively, was not made necessary.

"It is a fact declared by the General Convention, and universally understood, that the Constitution of the United States was the result of a spirit of amity and mutual concession; and it is well known that under this influence the smaller States were admitted into an equal representation in the Senate with the larger States; and that this branch of the Government was invested with great powers, for on the equal participation of those powers the sovereignty and political situation of the smaller States were deemed essentially to depend.

"If other proofs than these, and the plain letter of the Constitution itself be necessary to ascertain the point under consideration, they may be found in the journals of the General Convention which I have deposited in the office of the Department of State. In those journals it will appear that a proposition was made that no treaty should be binding on the United States, which was not ratified by a law, and that the proposition was explicitly rejected.

"As, therefore, it is perfectly clear to my understanding that the consent of the House of Representatives is not necessary to the validity of the treaty, &c., a just regard to the Constitution, and to the duty of my office, &c., forbid a compliance with your request.

"G. WASHINGTON.

14th CON. 1st SESS.—22

Mr. HUGER said he would not venture to add a single word more on the subject, but resume his seat, lest, perchance, some observation of his might draw the attention of the House from the extracts he had just read, or weaken the effect of the opinion in regard to the point at issue between honorable gentlemen, so unequivocally given by that immortal man, who was by all acknowledged to have been equally the founder of this great Republic, and the father of that Constitution they were about to interpret.

Mr. RANDOLPH and Mr. WRIGHT followed in some remarks; when the question on the passage of the bill was taken, and decided in the affirmative—yeas 86, nays 71, as follows:

Several other members, to wit: from New Hampshire, WILLIAM HALE; from Massachusetts, ASAHEL STEARNS and ARTEMAS WARD; and from New Jersey, BENJAMIN BENNETT, appeared produced their credentials, were qualified, and took their seats.

Mr. GROSVENOR presented a petition of the Columbian Manufacturing Society, in the State of New York, praying that additional duties may be imposed on cotton goods imported from foreign countries.—Referred to the Committee on Commerce and Manufactures.

Mr. GOLD presented a petition of Elizabeth Hamilton, widow of the late General Alexander Hamilton, deceased, praying that the commutation of half pay, due for the services of her said husband, as an officer of the Revolutionary Army, may be paid to his representatives.—Referred to the Committee on Pensions and Revolutionary Claims.

Mr. TUCKER, from the District Committee, made an unfavorable report on the petition of the Masonic Lodge in Alexandria, called Washington Lodge, No 22, who pray for authority to raise money by way of lottery for certain purposes. The report is adverse to the petition, on the general ground of hostility to lotteries. The report was ordered to lie on the table.

On motion of Mr. EASTON, the Committee of Ways and Means were instructed to inquire into the expediency of making an appropriation, by law, sufficient to discharge and satisfy the claims of such individuals as are entitled to compensation on account of depredations committed by the Osage Indians.

The bill from the Senate "relative to evidence in cases of naturalization," was read twice, and referred to Messrs. JOHNSON of Kentucky, PITKIN, THOMAS WILSON, WENDOVER, and BAYLIES.

The bill from the Senate "confirming to the Navigation Company of New Orleans, the use and possession of a lot in said city;" was read the first time.

THE REVENUE.

The House, on motion of Mr. LOWNDES, resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the report of the Committee of Ways and Means on so much of the President's Message, and the annual Treasury report, as relates to the revenue.

The first resolution having been read, in the following words, viz:

Resolved, That it is expedient to continue in force, until the 30th day of June next, and until an act shall be passed establishing a new tariff of duties, the act, entitled "An act for imposing additional duties upon all goods, wares and merchandise, imported from any foreign port or place, and for other purposes;" passed on the 1st of July, 1812.

Mr. LOWNDES gave a general explanation of the views of the committee in regard to this resolution; referring, for the grounds of it, to the instruction given to the Secretary of the Treasury to report a tariff of duties, and the implied intention of the Congress to act on that subject at the present session.

Mr. SERGEANT explained the grounds of his hostility to the present form of this resolution. The period to which it was proposed to extend the double duties, and the terms in which it was conveyed, he considered very objectionable, as well on account of the mercantile as of the manufacturing interest. As to the one, it would introduce an uncertainty prejudicial to their business; and, as to the manufacturers, he apprehended the effect of the resolution would be to alarm the whole manufacturing interest, which was now looking up to the Government for additional support, instead of expecting an early reduction of the existing duties. Mr. S., under these impressions, moved to strike out of the resolution the words, "the 30th day of June next, and until an act shall be passed, establishing a new tariff of duties," and, in lieu thereof, to insert "the first day of January next."

Mr. HUGER opposed this motion, on the ground that it proposed to collect heavy taxes from the agricultural part of the community, the consumers, in order to accommodate the merchant, who happened to have unexecuted orders abroad. Mr. H. though friendly, as he remarked "in the course of his speech, to commerce and manufactures, could not consent to tax his constituents, during peace, for the benefit of the merchants, to the same extent as was thought necessary under all the pressure and exigencies of the war.

Mr. WRIGHT went still farther than Mr. HUGER in his opposition to the continuation of the double duties. He was opposed to continuing them a single day beyond the time already fixed for the expiration of the law. He was opposed to taxing the great body of the agricultural community in any way that could possibly be avoided, merely for the benefit of merchants or manufacturers. He was opposed to heavy taxes, proposed to be continued, in any shape, because he did not consider it necessary for any valuable purpose; and he appeared to be very positive in his opinion, that the interest of the merchant and manufacturer were not a sufficient motive for perpetuating oppressive taxes on the landed interest, &c.

The question, on Mr. SERGEANT's motion was decided in the negative, without a division.

The first resolution, in the words above, was then agreed to without a division.

The second resolution, in the following words, being under consideration, viz:

Resolved, That it is expedient to continue in force the act, entitled "An act laying a duty on imported salt; granting a bounty on pickled fish exported, and allowances to certain vessels employed in the fisheries;" passed the 29th of July, 1813.

This resolution was agreed to by a majority of more than three to one.

The third resolution, in the following words, was then read:

Resolved, That it is expedient to continue in force the act, entitled "An act laying duties on sugar, refined, within the United States;" passed on the 24th of July, 1813.

Mr. HUGER moved to reject this resolution. Sugar, in some countries a luxury, had become in the United States, he said, a necessary of life; besides which, it had become one of the principal manufactures of the nation. But this was not all; by the effects of embargoes and war for some years, and now, by our exclusion of our ships from the West India islands, sugar had become so dear as to be obtained with difficulty; and re-finer sugar in particular, so scarce, that it could not be had sometimes for money. At Charleston, he had sought at one time for some refined sugar, and found that there was not a loaf to be had in that city, while in Philadelphia the sugar refiners, he understood, had given up their work.

Mr. LOWNDES said, that the expenditure of the Union on refined sugar did not exceed $150,000 a year. Such a sum, paid too generally by the opulent, could not, he said, be oppressive.

The resolution was agreed to by a large majority.

The fourth resolution, for continuing the present stamp duties on bank notes, &c., came next under consideration.

This resolve was opposed by Messrs. STRONG, WRIGHT, and MILNOR, on account of the insignificance of the proceeds thereof, when contrasted with the inconvenience to which it puts the community, and the partiality of its operations. To which arguments, Mr. SOUTHWARD, as well as Mr. LOWNDES, replied, denying the justice of the character given to the tax, and asserting its facility of collection, and operation on wealthy or moneyed men, as giving it a preference to almost any other tax embraced in the system.

Mr. BURNSIDE moved to amend the resolution so as to confine the continuation of duties to those on the notes of banks, bankers, and certain companies, (excluding notes discounted, and on bills of exchange.) This motion was supported by himself and Mr. MILNOR; and opposed by Mr. LOWNDES. It was negatived by a decided majority.

The resolution itself was then agreed to by a large majority.

The fifth resolve, which proposes to abolish the additional duty on postage, was then taken up and agreed to by a large majority.

Mr. LOWNDES suggested that the Committee should rise and report these resolutions to the House, before acting on the remainder of the report. The resolutions already agreed to, applied to laws which will expire on the 18th of February, and he wished them to be referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, in order to report bills conformably thereto.

Mr. SERGEANT endeavored to prevent the Committee's rising, in order to bring before the House the resolution for repealing the duties on manufactures, &c.; a speedy decision of which he considered of great importance.

Mr. LOWNDES opposed this course, because of certain information on the subject thereof, required by the Committee, which was not yet ready.

The motion for the Committee to rise was agreed to; and the question was about to be put on concurring with the Committee of the Whole in their agreement to the first resolution.

Mr. RANDOLPH rose, and commenced a speech in a rather desultory but pointed manner, on the general character of the report of the Committee of Ways and Means, which he condemned. He had not spoken long, when the SPEAKER intimated that he had digressed too far from the subject of debate.

An appeal was taken by Mr. HANSON from the Speaker's decision on this point; which, after much acrimonious and some argumentative debate, was affirmed by the House, by a vote of 79 to 59.

Mr. RANDOLPH resumed his discourse, which he concluded just before sun-set.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH then moved to amend the said first resolution, by striking out all that part of it which refers to a "new tariff." Whereupon, the House adjourned.

TUESDAY, January 16.

Mr. WARD, of Massachusetts, presented a petition of Jane A. Blakely, of Boston, in the State of Massachusetts, stating her fears for the loss of her husband, Captain Johnston Blakeley, of the United States ship-of-war "Wasp," and praying that measures may be adopted for the support of herself and the daughter of the said Captain Blakeley.—Referred to Messrs. merchants in Boston, praying that a new tariff of duties may take effect on the 17th of February next, or that the double duties may continue until the 1st day of January, 1817.

Mr. STEARNS presented a petition of sundry manufacturers of tallow candles, in the county of Middlesex and State of Massachusetts, praying that the duty imposed upon mould tallow candles may be repealed.

Mr. PITKIN presented a petition of the master hatters in Hartford county, and State of Connecticut, praying that the tax imposed upon hats manufactured within the United States may be repealed.

Ordered, That the said petitions be referred to the Committee of the Whole, on the report of the Committee of Ways and Means of the 9th instant, upon the subject of revenue.

Mr. WARD, of Massachusetts, presented a petition of Jonathan Merry, praying compensation for sundry vessels, captured by French cruisers in the years 1796, 1797, and 1799, out of the moneys reserved by the Government of the United States in the purchase of Louisiana.—Referred to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. WARD also presented a petition of the Convention of Congregational Ministers, in the State of Massachusetts, praying that the mails may not be opened or transported on Sundays.—Referred to the Post Office Committee.

Mr. LYLE presented a petition of sundry inhabitants of Washington and Alleghany counties, in Pennsylvania, praying that the mails may not be opened or transported on Sundays.

Mr. LOWNDES laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, and a letter from the Commissioner of the Revenue, addressed to him as Chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, containing estimates of the probable amount of the internal duties which have accrued, and will accrue for the year 1815; which were read, and referred to the Committee of the Whole on the report of the Committee of Ways and Means, of the 9th instant, upon the subject of revenue.

Mr. NEWTON, from the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, made a report on the petition of William Hamon, which was read; when Mr. N. reported a bill for the relief of William Hamon; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. NELSON, of Virginia, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported a bill supplementary to the act, entitled "An act regulating and defining the duties of the judges of the Territory of Illinois," and for vesting in the courts of the Territory of Indiana a jurisdiction in chancery cases arising in the said Territory; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. NELSON also reported a bill providing an additional compensation to the district judge of the southern district of New York, for performing the duties of judge of the northern district thereof; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported a bill making further provision for military services during the late war, and for other purposes; which was read twice, and committed to the Committee of the Whole on the bill making provision for an additional military academy.

Mr. JOHNSON also reported a bill for the liquidation of certain claims, and for other purposes; which was read twice, and committed to the Committee of the Whole last mentioned.

The bill from the Senate, "confirming to the Navigation Company of New Orleans the use and possession of a lot in said city," was read the second time, and referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

On motion of Mr. PITKIN,

Resolved, That the correspondence between the American and British Commissioners, on the subject of the Commercial Treaty, lately negotiated between the United States and Great Britain, which have been printed by order of the Senate, and now made public, together with a tariff of duties on lumber imported into Great Britain, which was printed with said correspondence, be printed for the use of the House.

On motion of Mr. MARSH, the Committee on the Judiciary were instructed to inquire into the expediency of so altering the law of the United States, in relation to costs in the courts thereof, as to allow full costs in all cases in which the said courts have exclusive jurisdiction, notwithstanding the plaintiff shall not recover, in damages, the sum of five hundred dollars.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a bill "authorizing the appointment of admirals;" in which they ask the concurrence of this House.

THE REVENUE.

The House resumed the consideration of the report of the Committee of the Whole, on a part of the propositions of the Committee of Ways and Means, respecting the revenue.

The question before the House was (as on the adjournment yesterday) on an amendment moved by Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH to the resolution proposing the continuance of the double duties until June next. This amendment of Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH proposed to strike out so much as proposes to continue the double duties until a new tariff shall be established by law.

After a few remarks from Mr. GASTON and Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH, respecting this amendment—

Mr. RANDOLPH, after stating that he had a motion to offer, said that he was induced to believe that it was through inattention the very extraordinary proceeding of yesterday was suffered to pass sub silentio—he meant that of the Committee of the House going through a part only of the report of the Committee of Ways and Means—sending it back to be reported in the shape of bills, and leaving the rest of it behind to be separately acted upon; for he would venture to affirm, that it was the first time a committee of that or of any other legislative assembly had ever made a report in part. There were twelve resolutions—five of those had been detached, to be served upon again, when done, in the shape of bills, while the remaining seven were left behind to employ the House. It was not, however, on the point of Parliamentary incorrectness that he founded his motion, but on still more important grounds.

It was proposed to levy what he called grievously heavy burdens, though perhaps what other gentlemen would denominate only necessary supplies. By the good old rules of the House—which seemed to him to have shared the fate of the poet's old silk stockings in the anecdote, and to have been so often darned, and altered, and cobbled, that it was doubtful whether any part of the original texture remained behind—every bill for laying taxes was required to be discussed in a Committee of the Whole. But in the present case, he said, that would not have been done. It might have been recommitted, but gentlemen did not choose to discuss it in a Committee of the Whole, and may say that when the bills upon the resolutions are reported, they may then be discussed. But what security was there, that when they were reported they would not be grasped with the same strong hand as before, and as they had been refused discussion in the Committee, be again proceeded upon without discussion; for gentlemen might as well order them to be engrossed, as do what they had already done with them. The rules of the House, he repeated, were that every measure of the kind should be fully discussed in a Committee of the House. On these grounds he intended to move (and he desired the House to observe that he asked no favor, nothing but the established law, sheer law,) that these resolutions be recommitted to a Committee of the Whole, in order that the measure might proceed, and the taxes be laid in the true spirit of the Government; or, is it come to that with us, exclaimed Mr. R., that we dare take upon us to double all the taxes upon the people of this country, with as little concern or ceremony as we order a petition to go to this or to that committee.

Mr. RANDOLPH added, that he moved the recommitment on two grounds.

The first of those grounds, he said, was the conduct of the House in reporting a part of the resolutions, and not discharging the committee from the rest.

The second, because there had been no discussion of the report in the Committee; and that, on the contrary, all discussion had, by a solemn decision, been stifled.

Mr. INGHAM endeavored to justify the conduct of the Committee, by a precedent from the proceedings of the last Congress, in laying these very taxes.

Mr. STANFORD replied to Mr. INGHAM; after which, the question was put and negatived—yeas 59, nays 91, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Baer, Baylies, Boss, Bradbury, Breckenridge, Brigham, Chipman, Cilley, Clopton, Cooper, Culpeper, Davenport, Gaston, Goldsborough, Grosvenor, Hale, Hanson, Hardin, Herbert, Hopkinson, Huger, Hulbert, Kent, King of Massachusetts, King

NAYS—Messrs. Adgate, Alexander, Baker, Barbour, Bassett, Bateman, Bennett, Betts, Birdsall, Birdseye, Blount, Brooks, Bryan, Burwell, Cady, Caldwell, Calhoun, Cannon, Chappell, Clarke of North Carolina, Clark of Kentucky, Clayton, Clendennin, Comstock, Condict, Conner, Crawford, Creighton, Cuthbert, Darlington, Desha, Forney, Forsyth, Gold, Griffin, Hahn, Hawes, Heister, Henderson, Hungerford, Ingham, Irwin of Pennsylvania, Jewett, Johnson of Virginia, Johnson of Kentucky, Kerr of Virginia, Love, Lowndes, Lumpkin, Lyle, Maclay, Mayrant, McCoy, McLean of Kentucky, Middleton, Moffit, Murfree, Nelson of Virginia, Newton, Ormsby, Parris, Pickens, Piper, Pleasants, Powell, Root, Savage, Schenck, Sharpe, Smith of Virginia, Southard, Taul, Taylor of New York, Taylor of South Carolina, Telfair, Thomas, Throop, Townsend, Tucker, Wallace, Ward of New York, Wendover, Whiteside, Wilde, Wilkin, Willoughby, Thomas Wilson, William Wilson, Woodward, Yancey and Yates.

The question then recurred upon Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH's amendment.

Mr. WRIGHT, of Maryland, spoke as follows:

Mr. Speaker, I wish to remind the House, that we are legislating for the nation, and not for the merchants and manufacturers exclusively, and that the good of the whole ought to be the pole star to guide us. I hope the time proposed for the extension of the double duties will not obtain; but the 17th of February next, the time fixed by the provisions of the law, which does not only fix the time to one year after the termination of the year, but expressly declares it shall continue "no longer," whereby the faith of the nation has been pledged to the American people that the double duties shall then cease. There is no doubt a portion of the people near the Canada line, who have been engaged in smuggling, who would make it perpetual, and thereby pocket the double duties; as the great inundation of tin-carts during the war, filled with goods from Canada, will attest. But I should hope that honorable gentlemen on this floor, would not countenance the continuance of so impious a practice. The merchants of Boston, with the highly respectable Mr. William Gray at their head, petition for the discontinuance of the double duties on the 17th of February, agreeably to the plighted faith of the nation, as they had directed their importations, so that they might arrive after the expiration of the law imposing them. Sir, I am prepared to adopt a sound corrected tariff of duties, but not prepared to continue, one hour, the double duties, in violation of the nation's faith. Sir, permit me here to present briefly my objection to the system of taxes now proposed; I wish, therefore, to be permitted to call gentlemen back to the year 1795, when the public debt amounted to seventy millions, and when, under General Washington's Administration, it was provided, by the Sinking Fund, to sink the debt in twenty-eight years; then, sir, twenty-eight years was thought a sufficient time to sink seventy millions, but now, sir, after a glorious war, which has greatly distressed the American people, especially when the enemy pressed them—and I can speak from experience, for Kent Island, twenty-one miles by seven, a part of the county where I reside, was a long time in their possession, and our militia were constantly out; nor was the Western Shore less oppressed, as my colleague, General Stuart, can attest—we are called on to pay, on the heels of the war, one hundred and twenty millions in twelve years. Sir, have we forgot the quasi war, and the taxes imposed for its prosecution, and the consequences? I hope not; and I hope neither we nor the nation will ever forget, that, at the commencement of Jefferson's republican Administration, we repealed all the internal taxes as unnecessary, unless some untoward circumstances should occur—such as war. We then dismissed the sixteen midnight judges, as they were called. Gentlemen well recollect my devotion to the prosecution of the war, and my readiness to impose the necessary taxes for that purpose; but, above all, the readiness of the people to pay those taxes; and that they had covered the nation with glory, and themselves with imperishable laurels, so as justly to claim at our hands as much indulgence as had been granted the people under Washington's Administration. If, then, twenty-eight years was allowed for the payment of seventy millions, can it now be just to compel our people to pay one hundred and twenty millions in twelve years, the time proposed by the plan before us? Sir, we can, after the establishment of a correct tariff of duties, dismiss the internal taxes as well now as in 1812, and in my judgment with the same propriety; and it is now necessary for the ease of the people. Sir, the public debt in 1802, when compared with the revenue of that day, and the demands of the Treasury, was as great as it is now, when compared with the increased population; and the consequent increase of the revenue from imposts and tonnage, and the sale of the public lands, and the surplus revenue arising from those sources, will effect a sinking fund sufficient to sink the present debt of one hundred and twenty millions as rapidly as the debt of seventy millions was provided to be sunk in 1795. I therefore invoke gentlemen to consider well the measures now under consideration, and not act a hasty or imprudent part; although I never considered a national debt a national blessing, I cannot consent to its extinguishment by oppression.

Mr. GROSVENOR and Mr. HUGER spoke in favor of the amendment, and Mr. TAYLOR and Mr. LOWNDES against it.

It was contended, by the advocates of this amendment, that to retain the clause referring to a new tariff, would introduce a looseness and vagueness in our laws, and produce an uncertainty as to the intentions of Congress, which would be prejudicial as well to individual as to public interest. By the opponents of the amendment it was contended that the present phraseology would mislead the public mind, and deceive interested individuals as to the views of Congress, which, unquestionably, favored the establishment of a new tariff; and would besides prejudice the public interest, inasmuch as a concurrence of circumstances, such as long discussion, clashing opinions on the details, &c., might protract the adoption of a new tariff of duties beyond the 30th of June, the time prescribed in this resolve for the expiration of the double duties.

Mr. SERGEANT spoke at considerable length, and with much zeal, in behalf of the manufacturers, whose interests he evinced much anxiety to guard; but he said he would vote against the proposed amendment, because he was disposed to extend the limitation of time to January next.

Mr. RANDOLPH asked the Speaker, if the question were not on striking out of the resolution the words "and until an act shall be passed establishing a new tariff?"—and on the Speaker answering in the affirmative—so I thought, said Mr. R., and yet I could not help doubting my understanding on the case. This is a limitation I have never before known or heard of. A law to remain in force, not to a particular time, but until a particular contingency shall have happened; until another law now in contemplation shall have passed! This, sir, is such a curiosity in legislation as I have not only never witnessed or heard of but, never so much as imagined; and as not only myself, but, I do most potently believe, no man living, or that ever lived, did hear of. This question, sir, has been an old bone of contention between the two parties which divide this country, almost from the establishing of the Constitution. It was always a principle obstinately maintained by the Federalists, that the power of taxing extended beyond this House, and that taxes might be imposed permanently; while the opposite party as obstinately contended that the power over taxation, could not, constitutionally, be let out of the hands of the Representatives; or, in other words, that the makers of the Constitution never intended to impart to the Senate or the President any right to impose taxes on the people. To every gentleman who knows the history of our Government, and to every member who has been familiar with this House and its proceedings, for any considerable length of time, it is well known to have been the constant subject of controversy, or, as I said before, a never failing bone of contention, as much so at least as any other subject; and the point being now voluntarily surrendered by the very men who had ranged themselves on the side of those who maintained the exclusive right of this House to taxation, is to me a proof, additional to the many I have long had, that the time is come when the system of Mr. Jefferson, though it was the ladder by which the present Administration mounted into power, is to be departed from, both in practice and theory, in the conduct of public affairs, and that the great principles which governed the policy of Mr. Jefferson are to be entirely renounced. It is true of all free Governments—and it is still more true of that of the United States than any other in the world—that the House in which the people are represented should never yield to any other, in the slightest extent, the power over the purse. This, sir, is a Government of compromise, in the settling of which, we, the great States, stipulated, as the terms of the compromise, that the smallest of those States should be of equal weight with ourselves in the Senate, and in the election of a President greater than in proportion to their strength—a fact the House should never lose sight of. Let the Senate then do their duty, let them make those acts which by the Constitution they are authorized to do—but let them not originate any money bills—never give that staff out of your own hands to be voted away by that body. I have infinitely less jealousy of the President, (I do not speak personally of him who now fills that office, I speak of the Chief Magistrate of the United States, whoever and whenever he may be,) than I have of the Senate. It is in human nature, sir; not having lawfully the power to originate money bills, on money bills they will be most likely to make attempts to evince their power; like all other bodies they will be animated by the impulse of the esprit de corps, and will exercise it if you give them an opportunity. The question is, then, shall we give them that opportunity? We hear much said about taxes, about our funds being pledged to the public creditors; and about the national faith being violated with respect to those creditors if we should repeal the double taxes, oppressive as they are to the people. To this I answer that the public faith never was broken when I had a share in the councils of the country—and yet we did repeal an entire system of taxation, though the whole of it was pledged for the public debt; and here, sir, we have another proof that the present Government have renounced the true Republican principles of Jefferson's Administration on which they raised themselves to power, and that they have taken up, in their stead, those of John Adams. At that time—I mean when we repealed that system of taxation—the Federalists were against the repeal, as these men are now, and, like these, insisted that the taxes were pledged to the public creditors. This, sir, is another plain indication that they have changed the principle by their pretences to which they have gulled the people, and obtained their ascendancy, and that, as I have somewhere else remarked, their principle now is old Federalism, vamped up into a something bearing the superficial appearance of Republicanism. Yes, we repealed those taxes upon the ground that so long as the nation should punctually pay the public creditor his due, the latter had no right to inquire out of what fund it came. Suppose, sir, I borrow a sum of money and promise to pay my creditor out of the sales of my next crop of cotton, and that I should think fit to raise corn enough to pay him, and choose to reserve my cotton in store for a more advantageous market—will any man be absurd enough to say that I violate the faith I had pledged to that creditor, if I do not sell my cotton? The Federalists at that time said, that we had violated the public faith—while we, on the other hand, contended that so long as the creditor was paid his just demand, he had no right to ask where we got the means; whether we drew them, like the Federalists, from internal taxes, or, like the Republicans of that day, from our import duties, and the funds of the custom-house. But, sir, Jefferson had other funds—funds of his own—funds out of the reach, as it should seem, of our present financiers; his ways and means were the very reverse of theirs; his was economy, retrenchment; he put the country out of the reach of its creditors by retrenching the public expenditure to the amount of the debts to be paid. By these ways and means, the Treasury overflowed with wealth, and a committee was appointed, not to raise double taxes, or, by wholesale vote, to continue in force those already raised, but to dispose of the surplus revenue that flowed into the Treasury. Thus, he was accustomed to have lying by, in the Bank of the United States, from five to seven millions of dollars more than the expenses of the Government and the disbursements of the sinking fund, though he was all the time redeeming the public debt. That, sir, was the result of practising as well as preaching. That was the result of really acting upon the Republican principles he professed, instead of professing one principle and practising another—professing Republicanism and practising old Federalism. Can the House pass a more severe sentence on Mr. Jefferson, than in saying that the repeal of the internal taxes was a violation of the national faith? But, let us go to the proof—At the time I allude to, the six per cent. stocks were above par, payments being made, too, in good hard dollars; not rags, but silver, or, if you chose it, gold. What is the price now? you are at peace, and yet your stocks are at ninety-eight; and what is the value of the stuff you get for it, the rags?—why, thirteen per cent. under par, so that you get just eighty-five out of each hundred of your stock. But then there was a pledge to the people, who it seems are in a state of pupillage and want guardians—(poor little things! I apprehend that in the administration of their affairs, the executorship is much better than the heirship,) a pledge to establish a sinking fund to redeem the debts incurred by the mismanagement of the executors. You promised that if the minor would elect you his guardian, you would pay off the encumbrances on his estate. Did you do so? No; the ward was robbed, and his property was lavished away upon war feasts in Canada, and upon tilts, and shows, and tournaments.

My honorable colleague (Mr. SHEFFEY) has said, that the case of the manufacturers is not fairly before the House. True! it is not fairly before the House. It never can be fairly before the House; whenever it comes before us, it must come unfairly, not as “a spirit of health—but a goblin damned”—not “bringing with it airs from Heaven, but blasts from Hell”—it ought to be exorcised out of the House: for, what do the principles about which such a contest is maintained amount to, but a system of bounties to manufacturers, in order to encourage them to do that which, if it be advantageous to do at all, they will do, of course, for their own sakes; a largess to men to exercise their own customary callings, for their own emolument; and Government devising plans, and bestowing premiums out of the pockets of the hard working cultivator of the soil, to mould the productive labor of the country into a thousand fantastic shapes; barring up, all the time, for that perverted purpose, the great, deep, rich stream of our prosperous industry. Such a case, sir, I agree with the honorable gentleman, cannot be fairly brought before the House. It eventuates in this: whether you, as a planter will consent to be taxed, in order to hire another man to go to work in a shoemaker's shop, or to set up a spinning jenny. For my part I will not agree to it, even though they should, by way of return, agree to be taxed to help us to plant tobacco; much less will I agree to pay all, and receive nothing for it. No, I will buy where I can get manufactures cheapest; I will not agree to lay a duty on the cultivators of the soil to encourage exotic manufactures; because, after all, we should only get much worse things at a much higher price, and we, the cultivators of the country, would in the end pay for all. Why do not gentlemen ask us to grant a bounty for the encouragement of making flour?—the reason is too plain for me to repeat it; then why pay a man much more than the value for it, to work up our own cotton into clothing, when, by selling my raw material, I can get my clothing much better and cheaper from Dacca.

Sir, I am convinced that it would be impolitic, as well as unjust, to aggravate the burdens of the people, for the purpose of favoring the manufacturers; for this Government created and gave power to Congress, to regulate commerce and equalize duties on the whole of the United States, and not to lay a duty but with a steady eye to revenue. With my good will, sir, there should be none but an ad valorem duty on all articles, which would prevent the possibility of one interest in the country being sacrificed, by the management of taxation, to another. What is there in those objects of the honorable gentleman's solicitude, to give them a claim to be supported by the earnings of the others? The agriculturists bear the whole brunt of the war and taxation, and remain poor, while the others run in the ring of pleasure, and fatten upon them. The agriculturists not only pay all, but fight all, while the others run. The manufacturer is the citizen of no place, or any place; the agriculturist has his property, his lands, his all, his household gods to defend; and, like that meek drudge, the ox, who does the labor, and ploughs the ground, and then, for his reward, takes the refuse of the farm yard, the blighted blades and the mouldy straw, and the mildewed shocks of corn for his support;—while the commercial speculators live in opulence, whirling in coaches, and indulging in palaces; to use the words of Dr. Johnson, coaches, which fly like meteors, and palaces, which rise like exhalations. Even without your aid, the agriculturists are no match for them. Alert, vigilant, enterprising, and active, the manufacturing interest are collected in masses, and ready to associate at a moment's warning, for any purpose of general interest to their body. Do but ring the fire bell, and you can assemble all the manufacturing interest of Philadelphia, in fifteen minutes. Nay, for matter of that, they are always assembled, they are always on the Rialto; and Shylock and Antonio meet there every day, as friends, and compare notes, and lay plans, and possess in trick and intelligence, what, in the goodness of God to them, the others can never possess. It is the choicest bounty to the ox, that he cannot play the fox or the tiger. So it is to one of the body of agriculturists, that he cannot skip into a coffee-house, and shave a note with one hand, while with the other he signs a petition to Congress, portraying the wrongs, and grievances, and sufferings he endures, and begging them to relieve him; yes, to relieve him out of the pockets of those whose labors have fed and enriched, and whose valor has defended them. The cultivators, the patient drudges of the other orders of society, are now waiting for your resolution. For, on you it depends, whether they shall be left further unhurt, or be, like those in Europe reduced, gradatim, and subjected to another squeeze from the hard grasp of power. Sir, I have done.

Mr. SHEFFEY, and others, regarded the expression respecting the tariff as paving the way, if not absolutely providing for an indefinite continuation of the double duties.

The motion of Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH was finally agreed to, by a majority of about ten votes.

Mr. SERGEANT then moved to strike out the "thirtieth June," (the day to which the continuation of the double duties is limited in the resolve,) and in lieu thereof to insert the "first day of January next."

Mr. KING was opposed to this motion; because, as he conceived, the national faith was pledged that the duties should expire on the 18th of next month.

Mr. SERGEANT earnestly and at large supported his motion.

The motion was negatived, however—77 to 56.

WEDNESDAY, January 17.

Mr. HAMMOND presented a petition of sundry inhabitants of the United States, praying that such measures may be adopted as will encourage and promote the interests of the cotton manufacturing establishments within the United States.

Mr. MIDDLETON presented a petition of the City Council of Charleston, in South Carolina, praying to be repaid the moneys expended by the said corporation in the support and maintenance of seamen confined by sickness in the marine hospital in that city, and that additional funds may be provided for the use of the said hospital.—Referred to the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures.

Mr. GASTON presented a petition of the Legislature of the Territory of Missouri, praying that a tract of land may be granted to the commissioners of the county of Laurence, on which they propose to authorize the erection of a town and court-house, and other public buildings.—Referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. TUCKER presented a petition of the Levy Court of the county of Washington, in the District of Columbia, praying that the powers granted to the said court, by an act authorizing them to erect a penitentiary, may be enlarged and extended.—Referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

On motion of Mr. JOHNSON, the Military Committee were discharged from the further consideration of the petition of the officers and soldiers of the twenty-third regiment of United States' infantry, praying for permission to locate their lands in one body; and the petitioners had leave to withdraw their memorial.

The bill from the Senate "authorizing the appointment of Admirals" was read twice, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

THE REVENUE.

The House resumed the consideration of the first five propositions of the Committee of Ways and Means respecting the revenue.

The first resolution, for continuing in force the double duties on imports and tonnage until the 30th day of June next, being still under consideration—

Mr. MACLAY moved a reconsideration of yesterday's vote, whereby the House refused to strike out of said resolve the 30th June, and insert the 1st January.

The House having agreed to reconsider the said question—66 to 63—the question again presented itself to strike out the 30th day of June, and insert the 1st day of January, so as to prolong the double duties to the latter day.

On this question, the whole ground of debate occupied yesterday and the preceding day was again travelled over. The advocates of this motion maintained that its adoption was necessary to secure the manufacturers from loss, and almost ruin, as well as to enable the merchants to lay their course intelligently in the business of the approaching season. On the other hand, it was contended by some that the extension of these duties would be an unnecessary and grievous tax on the consumers for the benefit of the manufacturers, and the convenience of the merchants; and by other gentlemen the broad ground was taken that the faith of the Government being pledged to discontinue the duties at the end of one year after the expiration of the war, it would of course be more unjust to protract their cessation to a more distant day, than to that already proposed in the resolve.

Many topics not directly applicable to the subject were brought into the question, and complained of by some of the gentlemen who mingled in debate, who said that the interests of manufacturers did not belong to this question, nor perhaps the interests of the merchants; that it was a question of national policy, which ought to stand on its own merits. And some of those who spoke and voted against the extension to January, did so on the ground that such a course would be equally adverse to the interests of the manufacturer and merchant, as to those of the community generally.

The gentlemen who spoke on the affirmative side of this question were, Messrs. SERGEANT and BURNSIDE; and those on the negative side, Messrs. LOWNDES, ROSS, GROSVENOR, PITKIN, WRIGHT, KING, GASTON, MILLS, PICKERING, and RANDOLPH.

The question on this motion was at length decided, late in the day, by the following vote:

YEAS—Messrs. Betts, Birdseye, Blount, Brooks, Bryan, Burnside, Cannon, Clendennin, Clopton, Conner, Creighton, Darlington, Desha, Hahn, Hawes, Heister, Henderson, Hopkinson, Ingham, Johnson of Kentucky, Kerr of Virginia, Lyle, Maclay, Mayrant, McCoy, McLean of Kentucky, McLean of Ohio, Milnor, Nelson of Virginia, Newton, Piper, Powell, Reynolds, Root, Sergeant, Strong, Taul, Taylor of New York, Thomas, Throop, Wallace, Ward of N. York, Wendover, Whiteside, Williams, Thomas Wilson, and William Wilson—47.

NAYS—Messrs. Adgate, Alexander, Atherton, Baer, Baker, Barbour, Bassett, Bateman, Baylies, Bennett, Boss, Bradbury, Breckenridge, Brigham, Burwell, Cady, Caldwell, Calhoun, Chappell, Chipman, Cilley, Clarke of North Carolina, Clark of Kentucky, Clayton, Comstock, Condict, Cooper, Crawford, Culpeper, Cuthbert, Davenport, Forney, Forsyth, Gaston, Gold, Goldsborough, Griffin, Grosvenor, Hale, Hall, Hammond, Hanson, Hardin, Herbert, Huger, Hungerford, Irwin of Pennsylvania, Jewett, Johnson of Virginia, Kent, King of Massachusetts, King of North Carolina, Langdon, Law, Lewis, Love, Lovett, Lowndes, Lumpkin, Lyon, Marsh, McKee, Middleton, Mills, Moffit, Moore of South Carolina, Moseley, Murfree, Nelson of Massachusetts, Noyes, Ormsby, Parris, Pickens, Pickering, Pitkin, Pileasants, Randolph, Reed, Roane, Robertson, Ross, Ruggles, Savage, Schenck, Sharpe, Sheffey, Smith of Pennsylvania, Smith of Virginia, Stanford, Stearns, Stuart, Sturges, Tallmadge, Taylor of South Carolina, Telfair, Townsend, Tucker, Vose, Ward of Massachusetts, Wilcox, Wilde, Wilmoughby, Wright, Yancey, and Yates—105.

So the motion to extend the continuance of double duties to the first day of January was negatived, and the House adjourned.

THURSDAY, January 18.

Mr. CILLEY presented a petition of the Exeter and Rockingham Cotton Manufacturing Companies, in the State of New Hampshire, praying that the importation from foreign countries of all cotton goods of a coarse texture may be prohibited.—Referred to the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures.

The following bills passed through Committees of the Whole, and were ordered to be engrossed for a third reading: the bill for the relief of the heirs of George Nebinger; the bill for the relief of Jonathan White; the bill for the relief of John G. Camp; the bill for the relief of Jonathan Rogers, jun., of Waterford, Connecticut; the bill for the relief of John Redman Cox; and the bill for the relief of Joseph Anderson.

ceived during the late war, was some time before a Committee of the Whole. The Committee rose, and the bill was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the bill making further provision for military services during the late war, and for other purposes.

Mr. HULBERT presented a petition of Ann Gerry, widow of Elbridge Gerry, deceased, late Vice President of the United States, praying that the salary which would have been paid to the deceased, had he lived to the end of the term for which he was elected, may be given to her, for the support of herself and children.—Referred to MESSRS. HULBERT, CONNER, and GASTON.

Mr. ROBERTSON, from the Committee on the Public Lands, made a report on the petition of the Legislature of the Illinois Territory, referred on the 18th ult. and 9th instant, and on the petition of sundry inhabitants of the said Territory, referred on the 18th ult., which was read; when Mr. R. reported a bill, making further provision for settling the claims to land in the Territory of Illinois; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. ROBERTSON also made a report on the petition of Antoine Drouet and Dillas, which was read; when Mr. R. reported a bill for the relief of certain claimants to land in the district of Vincennes; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. ROBERTSON also made a report on the petition of sundry inhabitants of the Territories of Indiana and Illinois, referred on the 14th and 15th ult. and 16th inst.; which was read, and the resolution therein contained was concurred in by the House, as follows:

Resolved, That the prayer of the petitioners ought not to be granted.

COLONIZATION OF NEGROES.

Mr. ROBERTSON made a report on the petition of the Kentucky Abolition Society; which was read, and the resolution therein contained was concurred in by the House.

The report is as follows:

That, according to the petition, great numbers of slaves have been emancipated in different parts of the United States; that the number may be expected to increase daily; that they are not allowed the privileges of free citizens when they are emancipated, and are prohibited by law from emigrating to many of the other States and Territories; in consequence of all this, and, to use the words of the petition, as they are suffering many privations for the want of room and opportunities for the expansion of genius and encouragement to industry, they pray that a suitable territory may be laid off as an asylum for all negroes and mulattoes emancipated or to be emancipated within the United States; and that such donations, allowances, encouragement, and assistance, be afforded them as may be necessary for conveying them thither, and settling them therein. The committee beg leave to observe, that the Government is not in the habit of granting such advantages to white citizens, nor can they well perceive why they should be expected in favor of those of any other color. The public lands of the United States are sold or earned by services rendered to the country; and all those who wish to reside on them have heretofore (as most probably they must continue to do) paid their own traveling expenses. The committee, too, cannot but believe that there is no part of our highly favored country where industry and economy will not insure to those who practise them an easy and independent support. The committee can see no cause for the interference of the Government on this subject; they have, consequently, prepared a resolution, which is respectfully submitted.

Resolved, That the prayer of the petition ought not to be granted.

The honorable the Speaker and Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, the petition of the Kentucky Abolition Society, at their annual meeting, holden in Franklin county, near Frankfort, Kentucky, October 18 and 19, 1815, respectfully sheweth:

That, whereas great numbers of slaves have been emancipated in different parts of these United States, and it may be expected, from the genius of our Government, and from a spirit of benevolence that seems to be taking place among all classes of citizens, that the number will be daily increasing: and whereas they are not allowed the privileges of free citizens where they are emancipated, and most of the States and Territories have passed laws to prevent this class of human beings from emigrating to them; and, from their poor and degraded situation where they at present reside, they are suffering many privations for the want of room and opportunities for the expansion of genius and encouragement to industry: and whereas there are vast tracts of unappropriated lands within the boundaries of the United States, and as we now enjoy a time of peace and prosperity, opening the way, and inviting the Government to so benevolent a project, we do therefore (and we make no doubt but we substantially speak the language of thousands of our fellow-citizens) most earnestly petition your honorable body, that you cause a suitable territory of lands to be laid off as an asylum for all those negroes and mulattoes who have been, and those who may hereafter be, emancipated within the United States; and that such donations, allowances, encouragement, and assistance be afforded them, as may be necessary for conveying them thither, and settling them therein; and that they be under such regulations and government, in all respects, as your wisdom shall dictate.

The friendly attention of your honorable body to this, our humble address, will ever be remembered with gratitude by your petitioners.

Signed by order of the Society, in annual meeting, as above written.

DAVID BARROW, Pres't.

MOSES MARTIN, Sec'y.

THE REVENUE.

The House resumed the consideration of the unfinished business of yesterday, to wit: the 1st, 2d, 3d, 4th, and 5th resolutions attached to the report of the Committee of Ways and Means, of the 9th instant, upon the subject of Revenue; to which resolutions the Committee of the Whole have reported their agreement. Whereupon the House concurred with the Committee of the Whole in their agreement to the said first resolution, amended to read as follows:

JANUARY, 1816.

Copper Coins, &c.

H. OF R.

1. Resolved, That it is expedient to continue in force, until the 30th day of June next, the act, entitled "An act for imposing additional duties upon all goods, wares, and merchandise, imported from any foreign port or place, and for other purposes," passed on the 1st July, 1812.

The question was then taken to concur, in like manner, in the second resolution, which is in the following words:

2. Resolved, That it is expedient to continue in force the act, entitled "An act laying a duty on imported salt, granting a bounty on pickled fish exported, and allowances to certain vessels employed in the fisheries," passed on the 29th July, 1813.

And it passed in the affirmative—yeas 90, nays 43, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. The third, fourth, and fifth resolutions were then again read and concurred in by the House; which said resolutions are as follows:

3. Resolved, That it is expedient to keep in force the act, entitled "An act laying duties on sugar refined within the United States," passed on the 24th July, 1813.

4. Resolved, That it is expedient to continue in force the act, entitled "An act laying duties on notes of banks, bankers, and certain companies; on notes, bonds, and obligations, discounted by banks, bankers, and certain companies; and on bills of exchange of certain descriptions," passed the 2d of August, 1813; and also the act supplementary thereto, passed on the 10th day of December, 1814.

5. Resolved, That it is expedient to repeal, from the 3d day of March next, so much of the act, entitled "An act to provide additional revenues for defraying the expenses of Government, and maintaining the public credit, by duties on sales at auction, and on licenses to retail wines, spirituous liquors, and foreign merchandise, and for increasing the rates of postage," passed on the 23d of December, 1814, as imposes additional duties on postage.

Ordered, That the said first, second, third, fourth, and fifth resolutions be recommitted to the Committee of Ways and Means, with instruction to report bills conformably thereto.

FRIDAY, January 19.

Mr. LOWNDES, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported a bill to continue in force the act, entitled "An act for imposing additional duties upon all goods, wares, and merchandise, imported from any port or place, and for other purposes;" which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. LOWNDES, from the same committee, also reported a bill to continue in force an act, entitled "An act laying a duty on imported salt, granting a bounty on pickled fish exported, and allowances to certain vessels employed in the fisheries;" which was read twice, and committed to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. LOWNDES, from the same committee, also reported a bill to repeal so much of an act, passed on the 23d of December, 1814, as imposes additional duties on postage; which was read twice, and committed to the Committee of the Whole last appointed.

Mr. LOWNDES, from the same committee, also reported a bill to continue in force certain acts therein mentioned; which was read twice, and committed to the Committee of the Whole last appointed.

On motion of Mr. EASTON, the Committee on Military Affairs were instructed to inquire into the expediency of allowing the non-commissioned officers and privates of the militia, army, and the several companies of rangers who served during the late war, interest on the respective sums due to them from the time they ought to have been paid until they shall be actually paid.

The following engrossed bills were read a third time and passed: A bill for the relief of George Nebinger; a bill for the relief of Jonathan White; the bill for the relief of John G. Camp; the bill for the relief of Jonathan Rogers, junior, of Waterford, Connecticut; the bill for the relief of Joseph Anderson; the bill for the relief of John Redman Coxe. The bills were all sent to the Senate for concurrence, except that for the relief of Joseph Anderson, which had previously passed that body.

COPPER COINS, &c.

Mr. ROOT, in offering a motion on this subject, said that the want of a national circulating medium had been a topic of much complaint. This subject had been referred to a committee, and that committee had reported a bill for establishing a National Bank as the means of producing the desired uniformity in the national currency, as regarded the circulation and exchange between different sections of the Union. But the evil of the absence of small change, Mr. R. said, was as generally felt by all classes of the community, as the difficulty of remittance of large sums. For a premium you can anywhere get from a broker such large money as will circulate; but not so with the small change that is in circulation, which, such as it is, will scarcely pass a stone's throw from the place where one receives it, and will scarcely be accepted by the servants at the taverns. How was this evil to be remedied? By the act establishing the Mint, Congress had enacted that the copper coin should be of a weight below what was the real value of the metal in bolts, bars, or sheets. The copper coin originally weighed eleven pennyweights; by a subsequent act of Congress in 1792, it was ordered that the cent should weigh 208 grains, or 8 pennyweights, 16 grains. By a subsequent act the President was authorized to reduce the weight of the cent, by proclamation, whenever he should think fit, two pennyweights.

Such a proclamation never had been issued, Mr. R. believed, and the weight of the cent therefore remained eight pennyweight sixteen grains. A pound avoirdupois, therefore, contained thirty-three cents and six and a half mills; whilst copper had frequently been much higher, and during the war double as much per pound; the price, however, being now reduced, was probably about par with cents. Owing to the high price of copper, the coinage of copper coin at the Mint had ceased for some time. It now appeared, from the report of the Director of the Mint, that the Mint was about to recommence the coinage of copper, of which it was estimated they could turn out about fifty tons in the course of a year. The coins, Mr. R. said, would, according to law, be distributed among the respective States, according to their population; they would be distributed in quantities, in casks, and there retained for sale as an article of merchandise, until the price of copper should be so much higher than the value of the cents as shall afford a sufficient profit on the sale of them, for the purpose of being melted up for sheets, bolts, or stills, &c. Mr. R. said he presumed the Director of the Mint was mistaken in supposing the cents already coined remained in the United States, unless in the form of bolts, &c. The copper coin of the United States had never been made a legal tender, because being worth more generally than the nominal value, people were glad enough to take them. There never had been any punishment enacted for counterfeiting it, because, for the same reason, there was no motive for the offence. If the weight should be diminished, however, both these measures might become necessary. He therefore moved,

"That the weight of the copper coin ought to be reduced to four pennyweights the cent.

"That the copper coin of the United States ought to be made a legal tender to the amount of one dollar.

"That provision ought to be made by law for the punishment of counterfeiting the copper coin of the United States."

On motion of Mr. CALHOUN, these propositions were referred to a select committee.

STANDING RULES AND ORDERS.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the report of the Committee on the Rules and Orders of the House. After several amendments to the rules had been proposed and agreed to, Mr. STANFORD moved to expunge from them that which related to "the previous question." He said he owed it to himself and to the oath, which, as a member of that House, he had taken, to get rid, if possible, of a rule under which the most tyrannical control might be exercised over the House, and the debates of that assembly be deprived of their freedom, and by which the majority might exercise the most complete despotism, shutting out the Representatives of the people from the free Constitutional privilege of expressing their opinions and maintaining the rights of their constituents. He expressed his regret that such an abominable badge of slavery should have found its way into the regulations of any free deliberative assembly; gave a succinct history of its rise and progress in that House, and portrayed the pernicious effects of it, as shutting up, at the will and pleasure of the majority, the current of deliberation, and enabling them to get rid, when they pleased, of a discussion that was disagreeable to them, and of a decision that might be deemed hostile to their party or their purposes. The last mischievous construction of the rule—the last twist of the screw, he observed, was fastened upon them in a moment of excitement, partly in resentment at a resistance made to their measures, and perhaps partly for the despatch of business during the war. But now when, not only the war had ceased, but much of the asperities which existed at that time had vanished—when we were "all Federalists, all Republicans"—and there could no longer be a pretext for exercising it—when, in short, it could no longer be pretended to be wanting—he hoped it would be expunged, or suspended, and that as the House had got rid of the excitement, they would also get rid of the rule. If the minority had no right in debate, but what they were to owe to the courtesy of the majority, it was no longer a free deliberative assembly; nor could the country for which they were assembled to legislate be free. The right to deliver their sentiments in Congress they possessed from the people, and no majority in that House had a right to take it from them. He had seen the time when it would be resisted in that House, and he hoped he should see the time come again when such tyrannical rules would be disabled of their force, and chased out of the rules of Congress; the majority had no rights to give, and they could have none that he would receive at their hands.

Mr. RANDOLPH said he seconded Mr. STANFORD's motion with pleasure. He never rose with more satisfaction, and he hoped the rule would be modified so as to reinstate it, as it was in the Administration of Thomas Jefferson, during which period it was the same that it had been in the time of his predecessor. Mr. R. declared that he had listened to Mr. STANFORD with delight; his sentiments were of the good old times; they were worthy of the school in which he had been bred.

JANUARY, 1816.

Standing Rules and Orders.

H. OF R.

Mr. R. then entered into a history of the rule so obnoxious to every lover of freedom—a history in itself very curious and interesting, and rendered much more so by the felicitous manner in which he exhibited it. He brought the genealogy of the previous question down from a very remote period, and that, too, one of the worst of the British history; but he showed that though bearing the same name the present one differed from its ancestors, and differed very much for the worse. If it was to stain the rules and orders it ought to have a new name, and be called the gag law. What the Federalists called “the sedition law,” he said his party called the gag law, and so ought this to be called. Not but that he owned the sedition law itself was good in many respects, the objection to it was that it assumed the exercise of a power which did not belong to Congress over the press, and insidiously usurped a jurisdiction denied by the Constitution; yet in comparison with the previous question, he said the sedition law was as white as wool—was indeed innocence itself.

Mr. R. then proceeded to carry on his history of the rule from its first entrance into the business of that House until it had arrived, upon a late occasion, to the highest degree of malignity and oppressiveness in its exercise; the most outrageous despotism over the counsels of the representative body. He could not depict it, he said, in stronger colors than by giving a simple statement of the fact, that the previous question was called while a member was addressing the Chair.

Mr. R. said that a member of that House who was so deprived of the freedom of speech that he could not at any time stand up and defend the invaded rights of his constituents was a nuisance—the slightest abuse of liberty seldom failed to end in slavery—and the liberty which the people of the United States did enjoy would be lost by this abuse. Yet, however, the nation's liberty was not entirely lost—it was “not less than Archangel ruined”—it was yet open to the House to preserve it. He then drew a picture of the mischiefs attending the application of the previous question in the hands of corrupt men, and said that, instead of being what every rule of that House ought to be—an instrument for the advancement and protection of the freedom of debate—it was perverted into an engine to intercept fair discussion, and prevent the sense of the House from being taken. If an amendment which startled the leaders of the majority were moved, instead of meeting it with reason, and letting it go for the sense of the House, one of the party had but to move the previous question, and the amendment instantly disappeared, as if it had sunk through a trap-door or fallen through a broken place in a bridge, and not a vestige was ever more heard of it—no, not so much as would serve to justify the member that offered it to his constituents, or to inform them what he had been endeavoring in vain to do for their interests. For example: if a member moved to propose twenty cents a bushel tax upon salt, and he (Mr. R.) taking into consideration that it would come too heavy on his constituents to tax so highly one of the most essential articles of life—one of the sacred emblems of hospitality—should propose to amend the resolution by substituting ten for twenty, the majority not finding it convenient to argue the case, or being unable to reason, and therefore like Falstaff, “if reasons were as plenty as blackberries,” resolute not to give a reason on compulsion, should call for the previous question, the amendment would disappear; the unsuspecting, confiding people would be deceived, and would never hear that the amendment was moved, or that the Representative to whom they had confided their interests had done his duty; but on the contrary would conclude that he had voted for imposing on them that oppressive tax.

Thus, he said, amendments fell dead in that House, and with them the right of free discussion. There were other members of those rules, he said, which might well content those gentlemen, whatever their appetite might be for despotism. Some that might satisfy the grand inquisitor himself. The motion to reconsider was one of those—that simple rule might satisfy the most lynx-eyed duenna, anxious to restrain the wanton excursions of debate. There was another, too, always at hand, which was still superior to the previous question—the call to order. On this subject Mr. R. was very pointed and powerful. He showed from the rules of the British House of Commons, laid down by Mr. Hatsell, that no instance ever was known in that body of a member's being prevented from discussing any proposition, either immediately, sub judice, or that he wished to bring before them; and that the only interruption allowable in it, was confined to cases where anything touching the royal authority was introduced, which by the constitution were forbidden to be discussed in it. Not only Mr. Hatsell, but Mr. Onslow, who so long presided in that body, never saw a member of the minority or opposition bench refused a hearing—they would as soon think of stopping the vollied lightning of heaven, as of stopping the elder Pitt. No; in the British House of Commons debate was free.

After expatiating on better parts of the subject, as well as on several topics incidental and auxiliary to the train of his reasoning, Mr. R. declared it to be his conviction that if this rule continued on the books, it would sooner or later be resisted if put in practice; but whether resisted or not, it ought to be resisted, and at every or any hazard. He had ever been a Whig—a warm and sincere friend to the Revolution—but when he compared the tax upon tea, with this pernicious rule “the previous question,” he doubted which struck most deeply at the personal rights of the people of America, or at the independence of the country.

Mr. CLAY rose in reply to Mr. RANDOLPH, and endeavored to justify the previous question—partly on the grounds of the Constitutional right of the House to make it—the majority had the power to make it, and therefore were right in making it; partly on the expediency—it was certainly expedient for the same reason; besides which, he thought the public interest required it. He said Mr. RANDOLPH's history of the order had itself shown that the previous question was not resorted to until the abuse of debate rendered it expedient, and in illustrating this he reminded the House of the very remarkable circumstance of a certain gentleman having, for the purpose of delay, spoken four and twenty hours without stopping. He said that the House must adapt their rules to experience, until the objects of its institution were fulfilled.

He did not think it necessary to go to Great Britain for precedents; but if they did, he could show the superior freedom of our House, taking all the rules of the British House of Commons together. They had there, he said, a previous question for stopping members, peculiar to themselves—that was, making a noise to drown the voice of the person who endeavored to speak. Another was, that there was no protracting a debate beyond the rising of the House. Here, said Mr. C., have we not had a question debating for six or seven weeks? Mr. C. then adverted to the personal invectives in the British Parliament, contrary to all example in the American House of Representatives. He had himself, in the short time he was in London, heard a British Minister, high in office, charge a member with wishing to produce a revolution in the country; and he had heard that member retort upon the Minister the charge of bribery and corruption, and tell him that he ought to lose his head.

What would be the situation of the House, Mr. C. asked, without such a rule as the previous question; and what was it more than a declaration of the House that they had heard enough, and would proceed to decide; and that the majority were not to be controlled by the minority?

Mr. GASTON rose and spoke as follows:

Mr. Chairman, the proposition which has been made by my worthy friend and colleague (Mr. STANFORD) to expunge from the rules of this House what is there called "the previous question," brings distinctly forward for consideration a subject which has the most imperious claims on the attention of every individual of this honorable body. It vitally concerns the rights of the members of this House, and the essential interests of the people whom they represent. From the moment, sir, I have been able to comprehend what, from that chair and on this floor, has been expounded to be "the previous question," I have believed it hostile to every principle of our Government, inconsistent with all notions of correct legislation, and without a precedent in the annals of any free deliberative assembly. At different periods of the last Congress I had thought of attempting to procure some amendment of this arbitrary rule, but I was prevented from prosecuting my purpose by a conviction that the party feelings which had grown out of the war, and which had then reached their highest state of excitement, forbade all hope of that deliberate consideration which was indispensable to a correct decision. The present Congress, I have flattered myself, afforded a fit opportunity for a revision of this rule. With the return of peace to our land had returned also a spirit of mutual forbearance between the political parties of the House. Now, it might be practicable to discuss and decide a great question upon its intrinsic merits, and not simply with a view to its influence on the interests or purposes of faction. Indulging this hope, it was my fixed determination not to permit the present sessions to pass away without an effort to rescue my own rights, and the rights of those whom I represent, from the further oppression of this instrument of tyranny. I have been anticipated by my colleague, and I rejoice that I have been thus anticipated. From none could the call upon this honorable House to emancipate itself from the thralldom of "the previous question," proceed with more authority and propriety than from its oldest surviving son; from him who has witnessed the growth of this rule from its first intrusion here to its present all-controlling domination. And, sir, I rejoice equally at the opposition which the motion of my colleague has encountered. If this hideous rule could have been vindicated, we should have received that vindication from the gentleman who has just resumed his seat, (Mr. CLAY.) If his ingenuity and zeal combined could form for the previous question no other defence than that which we have heard, the previous question cannot be defended. If beneath his shield it finds so slight a shelter, it must fall a victim to the just, though long delayed, vengeance of awakened and indignant freedom. If Hector cannot protect his Troy, the doom of Troy is fixed by fate.

It is indispensable, before we proceed further in the consideration of this subject, that we should perfectly understand what is our previous question. Gentlemen may incautiously suppose that it is the same with what has been called the previous question elsewhere. This would be a most fatal mistake. Our previous question is altogether "sui generis," the only one of its kind; and to know it, we must consider not merely what is written of it in our code, but what it has been rendered by exposition and construction.

Our previous question "can only be admitted when demanded by a majority of the members present." It is a question "whether the question under debate shall now be put"—on the previous question "there shall be no debate." "Until it is decided, it shall preclude all amendment and debate of the main question." If it be decided negatively, viz: that the main question shall not now be put, the main question is of course superseded; but if it be decided affirmatively that the main question shall now be put, the main question is to be put instantaneously, and no member can be allowed to amend or discuss it. The previous question is entitled to precedence over motions to amend, commit, or postpone the main question, and therefore when admitted puts these entirely aside. This, according to the latest improvement, is now our rule of the previous question; and certainly in your Patent Office there is no model of a machine better fitted for its purposes than this instrument for the ends of tyranny. It is a power vested in the majority to forbid, at their sovereign will and pleasure, every member, not of that majority, from making known either his own sentiments or the wishes or complaints of his constituents, in relation to any subject under consideration, or from attempting to amend what is proposed as a law for the government of the whole nation.

It is a fundamental principle of civil liberty, that no citizen shall be affected in his rights without an opportunity of being heard in support of them. Our Constitution provides "that no citizen shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law." Every freeman is recognised by our Constitution as possessing also the right, either by himself or peaceably assembled with others, to petition the Government for a redress of grievances. The peculiar duties of the Representatives of freemen delegated with authority to bind their constituents by law, constitute these Representatives the agents of the people, to make known their grievances, their wants, and their wishes; that thus, by mutual and free intercommunication, rules of action may be framed fitted "to promote the general welfare." To refuse to receive the petition of the poorest and meanest member of society, alleging a grievance, and applying to the competent authority for redress, is an act of tyranny prohibited by the Constitution. To impair, by a judicial sentence, any one of his rights, or restrain him in the exercise of his freedom—to touch either his purse or his person, until after regular process to apprise him of the charge brought against him, and a full hearing of any defence he may urge by himself or his counsel, is confessedly iniquitous and unconstitutional. Yet by this detested rule, he, his neighbors, the whole community, may be mulcted with taxes to an indefinite amount, and subjected to obligatory rules of action, involving consequences fatal to liberty, property, and life, and their recognised agents, their Constitutional counsel, their Representatives, not suffered to allege a grievance or offer a defence! No individual can be condemned unheard—no individual can be refused a hearing of his petition. But thousands petitioning through their Representatives may be commanded into silence, and a whole country sentenced without a trial. The people are to be allowed Representatives in the great national council, who are forbidden to make known their wants—they are indulged with agents who are refused a hearing!

Sir, such absurdities will not bear examination. They cannot be tolerated by thinking and dispassionate men. It is vain to allege, in the language of the Speaker, that as the House is permitted by the Constitution "to determine the rules of its proceeding," it has a perfect right to forbid discussion, when, and as it pleases. It cannot (rightfully cannot) so regulate its proceedings as to annihilate the Constitutional franchise, either of a member or his constituents. They have a right to be heard before their money is voted, or their liberty restrained, and he is their delegated agent. The whole Congress cannot, by law, deprive them of their Constitutional franchise, to petition for redress of grievances; and this House is not competent to close the mouth through which the petitioners speak. Under the pretence of determining the rules of its proceedings, the House has no more authority to deny to any portion of the people the fair agency of their Representatives, than a court of justice under a plea of preserving decorum, to forbid a criminal the assistance of counsel. The power in either case is given for the preservation and more effectual enjoyment of the rights of which it is the guardian. It may regulate, but it cannot destroy them. It may prevent their abuse, but it cannot forbid their exercise. The court is not obliged to hear counsel as often as they may wish to speak, nor to tolerate impertinence or contempt. The House may not allow debate on a motion for adjournment, or a question whether language be indecorous, but if either forbid the duly constituted agent from performing his regular and proper functions, it is then usurpation, not right; it is abuse of power, not regulation. The privilege of the Representative to declare the will, to explain the views, to make known the grievances, and to advance the interests of his constituents, was so precious, in the estimation of the authors of our Constitution, that they have secured to him an irresponsibility elsewhere, for whatever may be uttered by him in this House; "for any speech or debate in either House, they (the Senators and Representatives) shall not be questioned in any other place." The liberty of speech is fenced round with a bulwark, which renders it secure from external injury—here is its citadel—its impregnable fortress. Yet here, even here, it is to be strangled by the bowstring of the previous question. In vain may its enemies assail it from without; but within, the mutes of despotism can murder it with impunity!

The existence of this arbitrary rule is incompatible with the independence which belongs to the character of a Representative. Called by the voice of a great and free people to the high (and I had almost said sacred) office of making laws for their government, we should all of us feel that our functions and the privileges essential to their discharge, are delegations of sovereignty, not the revocable precarious grants of a courteous majority of our own body; legislating for freemen we should ourselves be free. But what pretensions can he advance to freedom, who is indebted for the exercise of his supposed rights to the grace and favor of his associates? Our English ancestors considered those tenures free which were independent of another's will. To hold by the will of another was the tenure of a "villain"—a slave. And has the Constitutional right of a Representative of the people, in the freest of all free countries, become nothing more than a species of privileged villanage—of splendid servitude? Instead of the legislator being independent of all, but God and his country, in the exercise of his functions, is he to receive as a favor the permission of his fellows to take a part in legislation? The degradation is not the less, because those on whom he depends are equally degraded with himself. Each may be regarded as a slave, in an association of slaves, of which the majority are tyrants. Can it be, that to such a body, and so composed, the people of the United States designed, by their great Constitutional charter, to confide the mighty trust “of securing the blessings of liberty to themselves and their posterity?” Can it be that they should select as guardians of their rights those who should have no right to assert them? That never can be called a right which owes its existence to favor.

This rule of the previous question, instead of being sanctioned by the Constitutional authority which the House possesses of making rules to govern its proceedings, is at variance with the very object, for the attainment of which this power was delegated. The great purpose of rules in every community is to protect the weak against the tyranny of the strong. The end of regulations in a society where a majority governs, is to limit the power of the majority, and to secure the few from the oppressions of the many. The celebrated Arthur Onslow (who held the office of Speaker of the English House of Commons for more than three and thirty years, and discharged its duties with an ability and impartiality which have never been surpassed) used to remark, that “nothing tended more to throw power into the hands of Administration, and of a majority of the House of Commons, than a neglect of, or departure from, its rules; that the forms of proceeding, as instituted by their ancestors, operated as a check and control on the actions of ministers, and were a shelter and protection to a minority against the attempts of those in power.” And the accurate and judicious Hatsell, who has recorded this memorable observation, very properly remarks that it is founded in good sense, for that “it is always in the power of the majority, by their numbers, to stop any improper measures proposed on the part of their opponents;” but “the only weapons by which the minority can defend themselves against similar attempts from those in power are the rules of proceeding, by a strict adherence to which the weaker party can only be protected from those irregularities and abuses which these forms were intended to check, and which the wantonness of power is but too often apt to suggest to large and successful majorities.”

Now, sir, it must be admitted, that the ordinary and correct course of legislation is, to afford a fair opportunity for a free interchange of opinions. “Dieu deliberandum quod semel est statuentum” is the old maxim, which, in Hakewell’s quaint but expressive language, is thus paraphrased: “That which is to bear the stamp of a law must be a long time moulding; there must be previous debates, bandings of arguments, and clashings of opinions, pro and con, go before; for as we find that fire issueth forth from the concussion of flint and iron, so truth comes forth out of the eventillations and clashings of several opinions.” It cannot be denied, too, that it is in the regular order of all deliberations to weigh and dispose of amendments before a final decision on the main subject. Yet the express end and aim of our previous question rule is, to prevent an interchange of opinions and to forbid amendments. Its purpose is to reverse everything like correct legislation, and to enable a “successful majority” in the “wantonness of power,” unchecked “by forms of proceeding,” unopposed by “the legitimate weapons of defence,” to deprive the minority of every right, and to make its capricious will stand for reason, its passion for law. Surely strange notions have been broached at this inventive spot. It is right to subject the majority to the restraint of parliamentary rules, except when it chooses to be free from them! The majority shall not be permitted to oppress the minority, unless it have the inclination! Thus, also, a national bank is unconstitutional in good times, and oaths are registered in Heaven, but if the Government needs a bank, and the times prompt to a usurpation of power, then the Constitution accommodates itself to the exigency, and oaths are no longer troublesome. Constitutions and rules of proceeding are binding so long as there is no temptation to transgress them.

I have said, sir, that there is no precedent to be found in the annals of any free deliberative body for such a rule as our “previous question,” and although I feel almost as great a repugnance to pledges as has been expressed by my eloquent friend from Virginia, (Mr. RANDOLPH,) yet I pledge myself to maintain this position. In the English House of Commons the previous question has been known as a form of proceeding for more than two centuries, but it differs radically and essentially from our detested rule, which bears the same name. In England it can never be used so as to deprive any member of his right to discuss or to amend the question under debate. Ours is used avowedly for these purposes.

The origin of the previous question in the English House of Commons is hidden in obscurity. In Grey’s Parliamentary Debates it is remarked by Sir Thomas Littleton, that Sir Henry Vane was the first that ever proposed putting a question “whether the question should be now put;” in consequence of which, the Speaker, Mr. Seymour (afterwards Sir Edward Seymour) observes: “No man can find any precedent of Sir Henry Vane’s question. By that question we can never come to an end in any business. The question in being may be the next day put, and so you usher in an impossibility of bringing things to a period;” and Sir Robert Howard adds, in the spirit of prophecy, “This question is like the image of the inventor, a perpetual disturbance.” The debate which gave rise to these remarks (March, 1672) turned upon the question whether a bill of supply should be engrossed before certain grievances were redressed. There is a debate (January, 1674) recorded in the same volume, wherein the previous question was used, and which respected the inquiry whether the House should proceed to the consideration of the King's speech, before it should ascertain by an address to the Crown whether, by the peace mentioned in the speech, is intended a separate or a joint peace. From these it would seem that an early, perhaps the first, use of the previous question was to postpone one subject in order to take up another. But whatever might have been its original use, it was early discovered to be susceptible of a service very convenient to ministers and their adherents, and to which they have since frequently applied it—that of getting rid of an unpleasant motion which it was not convenient to reject. The first instance I have seen of this application of the previous question, was in the case of this very Mr. Speaker Seymour, in October, 1673, who, probably afterwards, entertained a more favorable opinion of the previous question than what he had expressed about eighteen months before. Sir Thomas Littleton submits a motion to remove the Speaker and appoint a Speaker pro tempore, on the ground that the Speaker holds an office incompatible with the faithful discharge of his duties to the House—the office of privy counsellor to the King. This motion is supported by others on a different, and, what was then perhaps deemed a delicate ground, that the Speaker “exposed the honor of the House in resorting to gaming houses with foreigners as well as Englishmen, and to ill places.” The last is treated by the Speaker's friends (fashionable men and courtiers) as a trivial objection, and the first is resisted by precedents. Upon the whole, however, it is found expedient to get rid of the motion by the previous question, and therefore “on the question being propounded that Mr. Speaker do leave the Chair, a Speaker pro tempore be appointed, the question being put ‘that the question be now put,’ it passed in the negative.” It will be observed that in the instances cited of the use of the previous question, and in all others which may be resorted to, it never prevented full debate of the main question. The ancient practice was, as we learn from Hakewell, “if the matter moved to receive a debate, pro and contra, in that debate, none may speak more than once to the matter. And after some time spent in the debate, the Speaker, collecting the sense of the House upon the debate, is to reduce the same into a question, which he is to propound; to the end, that the House in the debate afterwards may be kept up to the matter of that question, if the same be approved by the House to contain the substance of the former debate.” It was the right of every member to speak once, if he wished it, to the matter moved, and of this right he could not be deprived by any use of the previous question. Hakewell proceeds to state: “If upon a debate it be much controverted, and much be said against the question, any member may move that the question may be first made whether that question shall be put or ‘shall be now put, which usually is admitted at the instance of any member, especially if it be seconded and insisted on; and if that question being put pass in the affirmative, then the main question is to be put immediately, and no man may speak any further to it, either to add or alter. But before the question whether the question shall be put, any person who hath not formerly spoken to the main question, hath liberty to speak for it or against it, because else he shall be precluded from speaking at all to it.” The previous question was simply a demand that when the main question should be ripe for decision, the House should first pronounce whether it was then expedient to decide it. It was no matter at what period of the debate on the main question this demand was made, the previous question could only be put when the main question was about to be put, and the main question could not be demanded while any person who had not spoken wished to speak upon it. “It is a great mistake,” says Sir Thomas Lee, “that the previous question, if asked, must necessarily be put, for you may do it all at one time, and not at another.” In fact, when the previous question was demanded, there were two questions before the House—the one whether the main question should be decided, the other what should be the decision on it. If the first were determined negatively, it of course precluded the necessity of determining the other; but if the first were answered affirmatively, the other was to follow immediately. Before, however, either branch of this double question was put, every member had a perfect right to be heard. In later times the previous question has been frequently resorted to, but never to destroy this right of speaking to the main question. For instance, let us take the debate on the motion of Sir James Lowther, (November 3, 1775,) “that the introducing of Hanoverian troops into any part of the dominions belonging to the Crown of Great Britain, without the consent of the Parliament first had and obtained, is contrary to law.” The affirmative of this proposition was maintained by Gov. Johnson, Mr. Sergeant Adair, and others, and the negative by Lord Barrington and Mr. Stanly; when Mr. Gordon declared his opinion to be that the measure was illegal, but well meant and highly expedient, moved the previous question. Then it was that the Solicitor General, Mr. Wedderburne, entered fully upon the subject. In opposition to the main question, he contended for the legality of the practice, and stated numerous precedents by which it was sanctioned; and in support of the previous question he entered into a variety of circumstances and arguments to show the propriety of the measure. He was followed by Mr. Burke, Lord North, and others, expressing their sentiments fully, as well in relation to the original motion, as to the previous question demanded on it. The advantage which the ministry gained in this instance by the previous question, was not to silence the minority and prevent a discussion of the main question, but to rally round their standard those who would desert them if compelled to vote directly on the main question. They sought by this measure to strengthen their main body of well-trained troops, by the accession of the irregular militia who could not be relied on in a desperate charge. Take, for another instance, Mr. Burke's motion for leave to bring in his famous bill "for composing the present troubles and for quieting the minds of His Majesty's subjects in America." After the previous question is moved, the whole subject opened by the motion is debated by the great champions on either side who entered on the controversy.

I believe, sir, that some confusion has been thrown on the subject of the previous question (a confusion, from which even the luminous mind of the compiler of our Manual, Mr. Jefferson, was not thoroughly free) by supposing it designed to suppress unpleasant discussions, instead of unpleasant decisions. The fact is, that formerly the discussions in the English House of Commons were not designed at all for the public ear, but solely for the members of the House. There are various orders, collected by Hatsell, forbidding the Clerk and his assistants from taking notes, or permitting copies to go forth, of any arguments or speeches made in the House. And we know that when Dr. Johnson first published those specimens of British Parliamentary eloquence, which spread its fame through the world, he was compelled to throw over his design the veil of fiction. They were announced as the debates of "the Senate of Lilliput," and the speakers were designated by the most barbarous appellations. To this day a publication of speeches made in either House of Parliament is, in strictness, regarded as a contempt, and may be punished as such. In a body, whose discussions were not designed for the public, and whose proceedings were known only by their final votes and orders, composed of men who had ever some grievances to allege, who claimed the privilege of free speaking, so essential for the exercise of that right, and whose plain habits of discourse were free from the fastidious delicacy of latter days; all subjects, from which the fear of royal indignation did not restrain them, were freely bandied to and fro, until the House was ready to act or to declare its determination not to act upon them. The previous question could not be used to prevent the discussion of an unpleasant subject. For, whether the previous question was called or not, every member had a right to be heard once on the main question.

The previous question in the English House of Commons deprived no member of the right to amend the main question. It has indeed been made a doubt whether an amendment could be received, if offered after the previous question had been moved and seconded, and proposed from the Chair. Among the arguments by which this doubt was repelled, it has been observed that to refuse the amendment because not before offered, would be to put it "in the power of any two members by moving and seconding the previous question, immediately after the main question is proposed, to deprive the House of that power which they ought to have in all instances of amending and altering any question proposed to them." On the other hand, those who entertained this doubt answered, "no inconvenience can arise from the doctrine; for, if before the previous question is proposed from the Chair, though it should have been moved and seconded, any member should inform the House that he wished to make amendments to the main question, he will then certainly be at liberty to do it, and the Speaker, supported by the House, will give that priority to the motion for amending, to the motion for the previous question, which common sense requires." However this doubt may be decided, all concur in declaring that in the English House of Commons the previous question cannot preclude the exercise of the undoubted right "in all instances of amending and altering any question proposed to them," nor can it supersede that "priority for amendments" which "common sense requires." No, sir, it was reserved for us in this age of illumination, and in this freest of all free Governments, to adopt a rule which sets common sense at defiance, and prohibits the exercise of undoubted Parliamentary right. It was reserved for us to declare that the previous question shall have priority of a motion to amend.

If we can find no sanction for our rule in the previous question of the British Parliament, let us examine how far it is founded on American precedents. Here we shall discover an early departure from the European management of the previous question; but a departure strictly consistent with the legitimate purpose of such a question, and which far from shackling legislative freedom, simplified the rule, while it afforded full latitude for discussion and amendment. If we will examine the journals of the Continental Congress, we shall perceive their practice to have been to regard the previous question, as a motion to set aside the main question, which was of course a distinct proposition, and open like all others for free debate. To this proposition the debate was confined. If the main question was set aside, the debate proceeded no further. If the motion to set aside the main question did not prevail, it was then before the House unaffected by this motion, and necessarily in a situation to receive such a disposition as the House thought proper to give it. Postponement, amendment, debate, were then as completely in order, as before the unsuccessful motion had been made. This was truly an improvement of the old rule; an American graft upon the British stock. Simplicity of debate was promoted by confining the controversy, in the first instance, to the propriety of taking the main question—not only unpleasant decisions, but unpleasant and unnecessary discussions might be thus prevented. If on the preliminary inquiry, the subject was pronounced a proper one for the decision of Congress, there was then scope for the exercise of their unshackled wisdom in regard to it. Two instances will be sufficient to show this American usage of the previous question, in the Continental Congress. "A motion was made to resolve that the members of this House keep secret from all but the members of this House, under like obligations of secrecy, such information as may be derived from an inspection of the papers of the committee of secret correspondence, or from hearing the same read." After debate, the previous question was moved by Mr. Duer—ten States voted in the affirmative, "and so it was resolved in the affirmative, and the main question was set aside." Again, on Friday, July 25th, 1788, "the following proposition being under debate, viz: that the Secretary at War direct the detachment of troops marching to the westward, to rendezvous at Easton in Pennsylvania, and from thence into the county of Luzerne, for quelling the disturbances in that county, provided the Executive Council of Pennsylvania, shall find the assistance of those troops necessary, and provided that the said troops shall not be delayed in their march to the Ohio, more than two weeks; the previous question was moved by the State of Virginia, and seconded by the State of Massachusetts, viz: 'that the main question be not now put,' and on the question to agree to the previous question, the question was lost—on the question to agree to the main question, it was resolved in the affirmative."

In the year following, Congress convened under the present Constitution. In the House of Representatives one of the first acts was to establish rules of proceeding; and the committee on whom this duty was imposed, consisted of gentlemen, many of whom had served their country in the Continental Congress, and among whom, with high claims to distinction, was the present Chief Magistrate of the United States. It is manifest that this committee and the House regarded the previous question precisely as it had been viewed in the Old Congress, as a preliminary inquiry into the propriety of the main question, which, if decided favorably to a hearing of that main question, left it perfectly free to the sound discretion of the House. They, indeed, altered the form of putting the previous question, from the negative to the affirmative style of interrogation. "The previous question shall be in this form, Shall the main question be now put?" They also required that five members should concur in asking for it. "It shall only be admitted when demanded by five members." They limited the debate on this preliminary inquiry: "On a previous question, no member shall speak more than once without leave," whereas, on other questions, he had a right to speak twice; but, in the full spirit of the established American practice, they confined the debate to the previous question until that was decided, and only until then—"Until the previous question is decided, it shall preclude all amendment and further debate of the main question"—unequivocally evincing that "amendment and further debate of the main question," might take place after decision of the previous question. And this, sir, was the clear, settled, undeviating exposition of this rule, for upwards of twenty years after its adoption by this House. I will prove this position by irrefragable testimony. In the second session of the Third Congress a resolution was moved, "that the President of the United States be requested to cause an ascertainment to be made of the losses sustained by the officers of Government, and other citizens, on their property, (in consequence of their exertions in support of the laws,) by the insurgents in the western counties of Pennsylvania." Upon this resolution "the previous question was called for by five members, to wit, Shall the main question to agree to the said resolution be now put? It was resolved in the affirmative—yeas 52, nays 31. The said resolution was then amended at the Clerk's table; and the main question being put that the House do agree to the said resolution, amended to read as followeth: 'Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to cause an ascertainment to be made of the losses sustained by the officers of Government, and other citizens, by the actual destruction of their property (in consequence of their exertions in support of the laws) by the insurgents in the western counties of Pennsylvania, together with a representation of the particular condition of the respective sufferers in relation to their ability to prosecute their several claims, and recover at law satisfaction from the insurgent aggressors.' It was resolved in the affirmative." Here was amendment after a decision that the main question should now be put. We had no Sir Henry Vane then to explain to us this emphatic now. In the second session of the Fifth Congress, (Thursday, 5th April, 1798,) a motion was made, "that the instructions and despatches from the Envoys Extraordinary to the French Republic, communicated on the 3d instant by the President of the United States, be published." The motion was referred to the Committee of the whole House on the state of the Union, who reported a disagreement to the proposition. The report being under consideration, a motion was made and seconded, that the House concur with a Committee of the Whole. Whereupon the previous question was called for by five members, to wit: "Shall the main question, to agree to the said motion, be now put? It was decided in the affirmative. And then, debate arising on the said main question, an adjournment was called for; whereupon the several orders of the day were postponed, and the House adjourned." On the succeeding day, "the House resumed the consideration of the said main question; whereupon ordered, that the further consideration be postponed until this day week." Here the main question was not only debated, but postponed, after a decision that it should now be put. This, sir, was in 1798, in the days which have been falsely called "the days of terror;" but which I feel a pride in showing were the days of correct principles. We had not then discovered how to construe away the rights of the people or their representatives, by a verbal criticism on the adverb "now." This illustrious discovery was reserved for the genius of modern republicanism.

The first attempt that was ever made to destroy the freedom of debate by a perversion of the previous question, was resisted as it should be—I speak it to the honor of this House—was resisted by a solemn and almost unanimous protest. It was on the 15th December, 1807, when the Speaker's chair was occupied by a gentleman from Massachusetts, who perhaps on that account claimed to be regarded as the lineal successor of Sir Henry Vane, and therefore the best expositor of his invention. On a motion for referring the memorial of sundry merchants of Philadelphia to a Committee of the whole House, the previous question was called for, and on being taken in the form prescribed, "Shall the main question be now put?" it was resolved in the affirmative. The main question on the reference of the memorial then occurring, "Mr. Ely, one of the members from Massachusetts, addressed the Chair, and was proceeding in some remarks touching the merits of the said main question, when Mr. Speaker called the member from Massachusetts to order, and decided, as the opinion of the Chair, that after the previous question is called for and answered in the affirmative, it precludes all debate on the main question; whereupon an appeal to the House, from the decision of the Chair, was made by Mr. Randolph, seconded by Mr. Bibb;" and the said decision being again stated, "that after the previous question is called for, and determined in the affirmative, it precludes all debate on the main question," the question was taken thereon, to wit: "Is the said decision of the Chair correct?" and passed in the negative by yeas and nays—yeas 14, nays 103. The principle of freedom asserted in this decision, was reasserted with equal solemnity and union of opinion in the next session of Congress. On the 1st December, 1808, a resolution was pending in the following words. "Resolved, That the United States cannot, without a sacrifice of their rights, honor, and independence, submit to the late edicts of Great Britain."

"On motion of Mr. Gardenier the previous question thereon was demanded by five members, to wit: Shall the main question be now put? and the said previous question being taken, it was resolved in the affirmative. A question of order being then called for, to wit: Is the main question open to further debate? Mr. Speaker declared that; conformably to the determination of the House on the fifteenth of December last, it did not preclude debate on the main question. From which decision of the Chair an appeal was made to the House by Mr. David R. Williams, and, the same being seconded, the question was stated by Mr. Speaker, to wit: Is the decision of the Chair correct? and, debate arising thereon, the House adjourned." On the next day the House resumed the consideration of the question of appeal, and the decision of the Chair being again read, the question was put "Is the said decision of the Chair correct? it was resolved in the affirmative by yeas and nays—yeas 101, nays 18." It was impossible that any rule should be more completely settled, both by uninterrupted usage and solemn deliberate adjudications, than was the rule of the previous question in this House. It was a rule perfectly consistent with good sense, with the requisite independence of the members of the House, and with the right of the free people whom they represented. It preserved decorum; it had a tendency to prevent unnecessary discussions; it superseded improper questions, while it left perfectly untouched the fundamental principles of parliamentary and political freedom. Thus, sir, it continued the more firm, for the impotent attempts which had been made to pervert it—and the better understood, from the blunders which its examination had exposed. Such was the state of things when, on the memorable night of the 27th February, 1811, the monster, which we now call the previous question, was ushered into existence, and utterly supplanted the harmless, useful being, whose name it usurped.

Sir, of the proceedings of that night I have no personal knowledge. The Journals, however, record them with a fidelity which, however to be lamented on other accounts, is essential to the interests of truth. The House, after a busy day, and a short recess for dinner, met at six o'clock in the evening; they then resumed the consideration of certain amendments, reported by a Committee of the Whole to a supplemental bill prohibiting commercial intercourse with Great Britain, and the question recurred to concur with the last amendments reported by the Committee. "Debate arising, the previous question was called for by Mr. Gholson, and, being demanded by five members, was taken in the form prescribed by the rules and orders of the House, to wit: 'Shall the main question be now put?' and resolved in the affirmative. After which Mr. Gardenier, one of the members from the State of New York, was proceeding to state the main question, when a member from Virginia (Mr. Gholson) objected to the right of the member from New York to debate the main question, after the previous question had been demanded by five members, taken and decided in the affirmative; on which Mr. Speaker decided that, according to the practice of the House, it was in order to debate the main question after the previous question had been taken. From which decision of the Chair an appeal was made to the House by Mr. Gholson, seconded by two members; and debate arising on the appeal, a question of order was moved by Mr. P. B. Porter, whether the said appeal could be debated? on which Mr. Speaker decided that, conformable to the practice of the House, it was in order to debate the said appeal. From which decision of the Chair an appeal was made to the House by Mr. P. B. Porter, and seconded by two members. And on the question, 'Is the said decision of the Chair correct?' it was determined in the negative—yeas 13, nays 66. The question recurred on the appeal first stated; and on the question, 'Is the said decision of the Chair correct?' it was determined in the negative. The main question was then taken, to concur with the Committee of the Whole in their last amendment, and resolved in the affirmative."

The Journal then proceeds to state, that two successive amendments were moved by Mr. Gardener, on which, on motion of Mr. Ringgold, the previous question was immediately called, debate prohibited, and the amendments rejected. A motion was then made by Mr. Ringgold that the bill be engrossed and read a third time; on which motion the previous question was called by Mr. P. B. Porter, and resolved in the affirmative, and the bill forced to a third reading instantly. On the third reading, on motion of Mr. Ringgold, the previous question was again demanded, and, being decided in the affirmative, the bill was passed. Here we have the great precedent which has furnished the rule for the subsequent use of the previous question; a precedent which nothing could induce me to examine and lay bare to the public inspection, short of an overruling sense of duty; a precedent stamped with every mark of error, oppression, and abuse of power. It is perfectly apparent that this night session was holden for the purpose of carrying this supplemental non-intercourse bill through all its stages. This was the holy end that was to sanctify the requisite means. "Debate arising," on agreeing to an amendment reported by the Committee, "the previous question was called for by Mr. Gholson." Now, sir, it is a settled principle in parliamentary practice, that the previous question cannot be put on an amendment. The very question on an amendment is, whether "certain words shall be inserted into, or remain part of a question." The decision of the amendment "determines that they shall or shall not stand in a particular place, and has, therefore, all the effect of a previous question." So says Mr. Jefferson in his manual—"Suppose a motion to postpone, commit, or amend the main question, and that it be moved to suppress that motion by putting the previous question on it. This is not allowed, because it would embarrass questions too much to allow them to be piled on one another several stories high, and because the same result may be had in a more simple way, by deciding against the postponement, commitment, or amendment." A previous question on an amendment is an absurdity. It is a previous question mounted on a previous question. But parliamentary usage was of no consequence. "Debate" had arisen on the amendment, and this debate was to be put down, or the bill might not be passed that night. The previous question was therefore called. It being decided that the question on the amendment was to be put as the main question, debate was proceeding on this main question; but this did not consist with the will of the majority, and debate was objected to as out of order. The Speaker declared it in order, for he had received too impressive a lesson on this point, to commit again the error which had been so solemnly corrected. It was expedient, however, to overrule this decision. An appeal was therefore taken. On this appeal a debate arose, and the Speaker was called on to pronounce whether debate on an appeal was in order. To such a question he could return but one answer; he knew, every man in the House knew, debate was in order. The rule is unequivocal and express, "on an appeal no member shall speak more than once without leave of the House." But debate was inconvenient, and, rule or no rule, debate should not be tolerated. A second appeal was then taken. Without a reason urged it was decided, in the face of a known and positive rule, there could be no debate on an appeal. It was next decided, without argument, in opposition to twenty-two years of uninterrupted usage, confirmed by the most solemn decisions made after a full hearing and on deliberation, that there could be no debate on the main question. Thus liberated from every restraint, and armed with the newly forged weapon of the previous question, a mad majority, in the wantonness of power, at midnight, when all that was not passion was stupor, proceeded in their career of legislation. The call of "previous question" negated amendment; a second cry of "previous question" engrossed the bill; a third shout made it a law. Yet this is the precedent on which our present exposition of the previous question rests for its basis! True, we reject every part of it, but that which the majority now finds an interest in retaining. We deny its propriety in forbidding debate on an appeal, for three days have not passed since we solemnly debated an appeal from the Speaker's decision. We hold it erroneous in applying the previous question to an amendment, and cause it to take effect on the bill or resolution itself, stepping over the amendment. But we follow it as a guide for prohibiting discussion on the main question. It is, sir, a well known rule of evidence founded on common sense, that if a witness manifest a disregard for truth in any part of his testimony, the whole of what he says is discredited. You can, in such a case, have no security that he relates the truth at all. And by the same reason, when a precedent is cited for the exposition of a rule of action, which bears on its face a violation of rule, it should be thrown aside altogether.

Full well do I remember the first instance in which I witnessed the use of this newly expounded previous question, and never shall I forget the feelings which it then excited in my bosom. It was at the first session of last Congress, and on a bill to impose a direct tax of three millions of dollars on the people of the United States. In that bill we had undertaken to assess, without any valuation, the precise sums which were to be paid by the several counties in each State. To remedy the injustice which this hap-hazard assessment must necessarily produce, a gentleman from Tennessee, of great influence in the House, (Mr. GRUNDY,) moved an amendment, restricted in its terms to the State of Tennessee, authorizing a correction of such injustice by the board of assessors after a valuation. The amendment was about to be adopted by an almost unanimous voice, when some gentleman moved to amend it, so as to extend its application to another State. This was agreed to by the House. It was then moved to amend it further, by extending its provisions to the parent State of Tennessee, to North Carolina. Sir, the previous question was called and carried. The main question was ordered to be put; the amendment first proposed—the amendment to it, which was accepted, and the further amendment to it, when the previous question was called, were declared to be swept away by this besom of destruction; and without debate, without an opportunity of amendment, the bill was engrossed. Such a mode of laying taxes was so abhorrent from all my notions of freedom, that new as I was here—an unfledged member—I dared to join in an appeal to the House from the decision of the Chair, and vainly, yet zealously, exerted all my powers to reverse it. Use, sir, has rendered the previous question more familiar to me, but it has not diminished my abhorrence of it. On the contrary, use has but the more fully explained the detested ends which it can be made to answer. Six times at least was the previous question used in the last session to put down discussion, and the exercise of representative freedom. Once on a bill giving arbitrary powers to the deputies of collectors; twice in relation to the conscription project; three times upon the mammoth bank bill. Thank God! it once recoiled with salutary violence on those who used it. The last stupendous scheme of political folly and wickedness, (such I deemed it,) owed its failure to the use of the previous question. Many gentlemen on both sides of the House know this to be the fact.

By what argument is this innovation—this outrage on parliamentary law—thus hostile to the spirit, if not the letter of the Constitution, to the rights of the people, to the independence of their representatives, to the very purpose for which law is needed—by what argument is its justification attempted? They may be all comprised in one word—“necessity.” Necessity! the excuse for every folly, the pretext for every crime. Necessity! which the miserable culprit, who steals a loaf to feed a starving family, pleads in vain at the bar of your criminal courts, but which successful tyrants in every age have made the apology of their usurpations on freedom—necessity requires this previous question. I deny it, sir! Centuries have rolled away in England since the forms of free debate belonged to their Parliament, yet the necessity of a resort to this instrument of coercion never has been there discovered. Our Continental Congress managed the momentous affairs of this nation during many years of war and revolution, and they found not this necessity. Twenty-two years had passed under our present form of Government before the necessity was pretended. No instance can be shown of a fair exercise of legislative power being prevented by the want of an unlimited authority to silence discussion. And unquestionably before forfeiture is decreed, of the fairest and best privilege belonging to the people and their Representatives, one offence, at least, ought to be clearly proven. “But a case may be imagined, in which it might be necessary to have this supreme control over the right of speech. Suppose the last day of the session, and a law highly salutary about to be enacted, which a few obstinate members are resolved to defeat by protracted debate, it would be necessary in this case to silence them.” Sir, there is no species of political empiricism more dangerous than to make rules of ordinary application, with a view to extreme and barely possible cases. It is, in the language of the immortal Burke, “to make the medicine of the Constitution its daily bread.” Extreme cases carry their remedies with them. But I see no such necessity in the case supposed. If the law be essential the next Congress may pass it; and, if the ordinary delay be injurious, it may be immediately convened. But, then, “laws cannot be enacted with convenient despatch.” Let us not indulge the chimerical hope of a Government exempt from every political inconvenience, more than of an animal existence free from the infirmities of nature. The ponderous strength of the elephant, and the swiftness of the greyhound, are not found united. The vigor and promptitude of despotism accord not with the freedom and public virtue of republican Governments. While we enjoy the invaluable blessing of liberty, let us not murmur at the trivial price we pay. Despatch, in law-making, is inconsistent with deliberative freedom. Fortunately it is not in itself a quality of great value. Despatch is essential in the execution of laws, but salutary caution should preside in the making of them. Five times in the course of the last session this “necessity” for speedy legislation forced the previous question on the bank and conscription bills; yet so purely imaginary was this “necessity,” that no legislation took place upon them—none were enacted into laws. An intelligent individual is now scarcely to be found in the United States who will not admit that the non-intercourse project, to establish which, with convenient expedition, was the justifying end of the first outrage on free debate, was beyond measure silly and mischievous. Legislate in haste, and you are sure to repent at leisure. But it is “necessary there should be a power to correct abuses of the right of speech.” I admit you have the legitimate power to correct abuses, but you have none to abolish the right. You may correct them, if it is found expedient, by restricting still more the frequency of speeches; by permitting wide and general discussions only on subjects which fitly bring into view the state of the nation; by admonition from the Chair against casual wanderings; by the censure of the House for obstinate and contemptuous abuses of its patience; by assigning specific days for specific business, and continuing the session until the business be done; and, above all, by the most powerful of all correctives—by marked inattention to the effusions of vanity and folly. The two last remedies which I have mentioned, have been found all-sufficient in the British House of Commons. A debate there, on an interesting subject, takes place at the appointed day, and is scarcely ever adjourned over. If the prolongation of debate here, from day to day, be injurious to the public business, why do we adjourn it from day to day? Say not that you put down freedom of speech from “necessity,” when you are governed merely by the fear of a cold dinner. Inattention to vanity and folly I hold also to be a justifiable and an effectual remedy. Not that I would consent to put down a speaker by conversation, rude noises, or any such indecent expressions of dissatisfaction, but when the love of talking evidently got the better of modesty and good sense, and this superiority was often manifested, the orator should declaim to empty benches. Every man has a right to speak, but every man has also an imprescriptible right to rescue his ears and his brain from the invasion of nonsense. This remedy might not produce an instantaneous cure, but it would prove efficacious in the end; at least as efficacious as most remedies for the disorders which infest a political community. It is not more essential to the well-being of this body to prevent abuses of the freedom of speech, than to the well-being of the State to prevent abuses of the freedom of action. Because crimes occasionally escape unpunished from defects, either "in the evidence in the law, or the application of the law," does it therefore become "necessary" to abolish civil liberty through the land? So with all your correctives there will be occasional trespasses on decorum, by unnecessary and tedious harangues. But is it on that account necessary to put the House under martial tyranny? Will you cure a wen by cutting off the head? Redress abuse by annihilating right?

"But the majority have a right to govern. It is for them to say when discussion shall end and action begin." If by right, sir, he meant power, the assertion is correct. Or, if by government be meant only regulation within the compact of association, it is equally correct. But that a numerical majority of any society has a perfect right to do as it pleases, is the most impious of political heresies; and a majority, acting on such an assumption, is the most dreadful of all despotisms. The primary object of law is an association, of equals, the fundamental principle of the compact is to restrict the physical sovereignty within moral limits. In a Republican Government this is done by Constitutional charters, by specific delegations of power to distinct and accountable agents, by oaths, by the influence of patriotism, and love of fame. In Governments not republican, it is effected by creating a political distinct from the physical sovereignty; by vesting the power of the Government in a king or an aristocracy. Sir, a majority uncontrolled by rule—unlimited in power—unembarrassed by impediments to action—find it where you may, in a nation, in a village, in a deliberative body—is misrule, tyranny, oppression, caprice, cruelty and confusion; anything but free government. The majority here, like majorities elsewhere, where civil and political liberty prevails, have a right to govern according to the prescribed rule; and when a rule is about to be formed for limiting their action, it should be a rule which may indeed protect the rights of which it affects to have a care. Not a nominal rule, which imposes no restraint. Not a rule which leaves every right to the mercy of unlimited sway. "Strike," said the illustrious Athenian to his commander, "but hear me." The first may be your right, the second is mine.

Such is the language to the majority. It is your privilege to decide, but the minority have a right to be heard.

Mr. Chairman, it is a maxim in the bill of rights of the Constitution of that State, to which you, (Mr. YANCEY) and myself, have the honor to belong, that "a frequent recurrence to fundamental principles is necessary to the preservation of political liberty." In the bustle of incessant action, in the animated contests of parties, goading and goaded by each other, in the paroxysms of political fever, these principles will be forgotten. It is prudence, it is duty, to avail ourselves of a season when passion is lulled and reason is free to act, when the preternatural excitement has abated; to review past errors and guard against their recurrence. The rule in question ought not to exist. No majority should be trusted with it. A majority never can be found who will use it discreetly. The day you make a man a slave, it has been said, you deprive him of half his virtue. The day you make him a despot you rob him of all. Human nature cannot endure unlimited power, and bodies of men are not more discreet in their tyranny than individual tyrants. This rule is not needed for any legitimate purpose. Every one of its fair objects may be answered either by a motion to postpone to a day certain, or by the motion for indefinite postponement. I speak in this respect from experience. Ten years since, on a revival of the rules of order in the most numerous branch of the Legislature of North Carolina, the previous question was expunged. It has never since been known there, nor has any subsequent Legislature experienced inconvenience from the want of it.

This moment is peculiarly favorable for an impartial decision on the proposition before us. The return of peace has brought about a new order of things, which must be followed by modifications of parties impossible to be distinctly foreseen. Interests which have been heretofore opposed will be found acting in concert; and jealousies and enmities, which a common feeling has suppressed, will be roused into activity. There are few, perhaps there is no intelligent member of this body, in whose theories and maxims of political philosophy, the changes and trials through which we have passed, have not produced some alteration. Besides, an event approaches, which in every free country is necessarily accompanied by party mutations; the Executive power is about to change hands. At this moment no one can confidently pronounce whether before this Congress closes he will be found among the majority or minority of the House. This then is the auspicious moment for putting down, with one consent, this odious tyranny. The victims of oppression should disdain to become its instruments; the possessors of arbitrary power know not how soon they may be compelled to feel its injustice.

The Committee rose, without coming to any decision on the question; and the House adjourned.

The Revenue.

JANUARY, 1816.

SATURDAY, January 20.

Mr. ATHERTON presented a petition of the owners of six cotton spinning mills, in the towns of New Ipswich and Mason in the State of New Hampshire, praying that the importation of cotton goods from places beyond the Cape of Good Hope may be prohibited, and that additional duties may be imposed on cotton goods imported from other places.—Referred to the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures.

Mr. BURWELL presented a memorial of Dr. James Smith, the agent appointed in pursuance of the act of the 27th of February, 1813, "to encourage vaccination," containing such representations as he believes will induce Congress to give that further and more ample encouragement to vaccination which the welfare and happiness of our country so imperiously demand, accompanied with the outlines of a plan for the more effectual encouragement of vaccination in the United States; which was referred to Messrs. BURWELL, CONDUCT, CRAWFORD, GOLDSBOROUGH, and HANSON.

Mr. CONDUCT, from the Committee of Revisal and Unfinished Business, made a report, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Commissioner of the General Land Office, transmitting a report of the land commissioners for the western district of the late Territory of Orleans, now State of Louisiana; which was referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

A Message received yesterday from the PRESIDENT, was opened and read. It transmits a statement of occurrences at Fort Jackson, in 1814, during the negotiation of a treaty with the Indians, and recommends a compliance with the wishes of the friendly Indians, in granting certain lands to General Jackson and others. The Message was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate disagree to the bill from this House, entitled "An act to regulate the commerce between the United States and the territories of His Britannic Majesty, according to the convention concluded the 3d day of July 1815, and the ratifications of which were exchanged on the 22d day of December, 1815.

On motion of Mr. RANDOLPH, the Secretary of the Treasury was required to lay before the House an account of the receipts and expenditures of the Treasury, (distinguishing the duties on imports and tonnage, and the sales of public lands, from the other sources of revenue; and distinguishing the expenditures on account of the Army, of the Indian Department, of the Navy, and of Foreign Intercourse,) from the 3d day of March, 1789, up to the last accounts made up at the Treasury.

The House resumed the consideration of the bill from the Senate respecting the convention to regulate commerce between the territories of the United States and Great Britain, which bill Mr. FORSYTH had moved to reject, Mr. HANSON had moved to postpone indefinitely, and which was finally ordered to lie on the table.

The question on Mr. HANSON's motion was decided in the negative; Mr. FORSYTH withdrew his motion; and the bill was twice read, and referred to a Committee of the Whole.

THE REVENUE.

The House, on motion of Mr. LOWNDES, again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the remainder of the report of the Committee of Ways and Means, embracing sundry propositions in respect to the revenue.

The resolve first in order having been read, in the following words:

Resolved, That is expedient so to amend the act, entitled "An act to provide additional revenues for defraying the expenses of Government and maintaining the public credit, by laying a direct tax upon the United States, and to provide for assessing and collecting the same," passed on the 9th January, 1815, as to reduce the direct tax to be levied for the year 1816, and succeeding years, to three millions; and, also, so to amend the act, entitled "An act to provide additional revenues for defraying the expenses of Government and maintaining the public credit, by laying a direct tax upon the District of Columbia," passed on the 27th of February, 1815, as to reduce the direct tax to be levied therein, annually, to $9,999 20.

Mr. LOWNDES entered into a defence of the measure; the effect of which, he said, was nothing else than to take away certain taxes of the people, and to substitute in their stead others that would be less severely felt. In answer to an assertion made by Mr. RANDOLPH on a former day, that the permanent duties would be sufficient for the public exigencies without resorting to double ones, he begged the House to recollect that, in the year 1818, the demands upon the public Treasury would be ten millions and a half, for the Naval and Military Establishments, while the revenue from imposts could be estimated at no more than twelve millions—so that there would remain only one million and a half to answer the other expenditures of the Government.

Mr. LOWNDES, in the course of his speech, but much of which was intended as a reply to Mr. RANDOLPH's late speech, which indisposition compelled him to make much shorter than he originally intended, ascribed to Mr. RANDOLPH a change of opinion respecting the expediency of paying off the public debt.

Mr. RANDOLPH denied the change of opinion imputed to him; he held the same opinions respecting public debts, and the application of the public funds, that he ever had done; but the benefits of experience would be lost upon him if he did not know that whenever a Ministry, no matter whether it was the Ministry of an elective President or an hereditary King, chose to supply the deficiencies created by their own incapacity or profusion, they were never at a loss to conjure up pretences for laying their hands on the public money. So far from objecting to the payment of the public debt, he would wish to pay it up to the very day, for he thought that neither a nation with a great public debt, nor a nation that had a great overgrown revenue to be collected, could possibly be free. The facility of borrowing, rendered Ministers profuse, and enabled them to involve their nation in inextricable embarrassments, by obtaining more money than could be drawn from the fair resources of the country, and he mentioned the case of Britain as one in point. That nation, he said, was once considered by some statesmen as likely to sink under the weight of its debt; how came it, then, that she was since able to increase that debt so enormously, and that after that, she was able to keep on foot a navy the most numerous and powerful in the world, and an army of eight hundred thousand men; and that she was not only able to maintain all this, but to subsidize all the nations of Europe whom she could prevail upon to fight against France? For his part, he could not but look with affright and abhorrence at the debt created by the war, yet he would vote to pay it to the last cent; but what a picture of waste and prodigality must that be which rendered the proposed system of taxation necessary! It was not, he said, in the power of any argument of his to place the mismanagement of public affairs in so strong a light as was afforded by the simple fact, that the old impost and tonnage duties were not sufficient to defray the public expenses without internal taxes to a commensurate amount. If the honorable gentleman would apply all the revenues from the impost and tonnage to the liquidation of the public debt, and more should be found wanting, Mr. R. said he would go any length to pay whatever more should be wanting; but he was averse to tax the people for an enormous Peace Establishment, which he thought not only unnecessary, but mischievous. Respecting the payment of the debt, he was not disposed to draw favorable inferences from the past. If in twenty-three years they had not been able to pay seventy millions, in what time could they hope to pay one hundred and many odd millions; and what probability was there that peace would last long enough to make an impression of any consequence on the public debt, while the country was loaded with such expensive establishments?

He was averse to so vast a Military Establishment, not only on account of the expense, but of the danger. If Ministers wanted war, there were no means so likely to procure it for them as an overgrown Military Establishment. Military men were fond of glory, the constituent elements of which were blood and taxes; and if Government were ambitious of a second Punic war, their Military Establishment was the direct road to it; he would therefore, he said, apply the whole of their resources to the extinguishment of the national debt. And here he remarked, that Mr. LOWNDES' calculation of twelve millions, being the amount of the impost duties, must be a mistake. The reports from the New York custom-house put down that estimate. Such an estimate might, indeed, answer the purpose of inducing them to adopt the system of internal taxation, which he considered as the introduction of certain ruin to the country. Much as he had deprecated the war, if it was made a pretext to saddle the country with internal taxation—if it was only a device to make the people take the yoke more kindly, and to fill the country with a host of excisemen, vermin the most noxious to the eyes of freemen—he said his opinion of the war would be changed, and changed much for the worse. The House had been tried with internal taxation before the war, but were restive and would not take to it; so to make them fall into it kindly, war was declared—for, was it not known that the war was defended on that very principle?

Well, war was declared; the coast of the country was ravaged by the enemy; and the majority swallowed the physic, bitter as it was, for the sake of the war; but still it was on the condition that when the war should cease, the physic should be changed. The war had ceased, and was the bitter potion changed? No! haustus repetendus—the draught was to be repeated, and it was now held to their lips. This however was, he feared, but the beginning; the colt was too young yet awhile to carry full weight at the first backing; he might grow restive if they put on twenty stone till he was a little better broke in; but if the House bore this, they would soon hear of more being necessary. Before another three and twenty years should elapse, there would be another harvest of glory to be reaped; and the same song would be sung over and over again, till at last it would fare with the United States as it fared with Great Britain, who was saddled with a debt which sent her laborers at night supperless to bed.

Mr. R. pointed out the dangerous bearing of a great public debt upon republican institutions, and dwelt particularly on the ascendancy which the handling of public money gave to individuals; to collect money, he said, was power, wisdom, happiness, influence, everything. The possession of that influence had ever been fatal to nations, and what exemption had we from it? It was about the period of the Revolutionary war, that one of the most splendid of English writers gave this definition of monarchy: speaking of that anomaly presented by the Government of Rome under the second Emperor, Augustus, when the forms of the old Roman commonwealth were preserved, and there were tribunes and consuls, as well as in the time of Scipio, he says, that "every Government in which a single magistrate, by whatever title he may be called, is intrusted with the execution of the laws, the command of the military, and the distribution of the public revenues, is a 'monarchy.'" It remained, then, for the House to determine whether they would abandon the principles contended for at the Revolution, and make this measure the corner-stone, upon which they would build up a system of taxation which would send the American as well as the British did the European laborer, supperless to bed.

Mr. R. declared, that his opinions of men had undergone no radical change; he had the same faith in sinking funds as ever—but very little when in the hands of that being which a philosopher had defined to be a two-legged unfeathered animal. He had great respect for religion ; but that respect was not drawn from inquisitions, nor from the sanguinary zeal of Queen Mary, nor from the disposition of every sect to persecute all others. So it was with regard to sinking funds ; he knew their history from the time of Sir Robert Walpole down to the present incumbent of the Treasury, and he knew that they were always perverted from their just destination to answer the purposes of every Minister, when necessity required it. When the prodigality or incapacity of Ministers rendered a supply expedient, the sinking fund was resorted to, and necessity was the plea. Were money wished for, and no plausible necessity were immediately at hand, why then create a necessity. He must be a very bungler in his trade who could not do that. That physician must be a botch, indeed, who could not keep the patient in bed. Provided the money be desired, this necessity never will be wanting ; for never was there a being in the shape of a Minister so contemptible as not to be able to find or to create it. Mr. R. concluded with saying, that the honorable gentleman's estimating the annual produce of the impost and tonnage at twelve millions must be a mistake, since it was as much as that fifteen years ago. The country had in that time doubled in population, and more than doubled in wealth. And if they who held the reins of Government would only dispense with over regulation, instead of being obliged to lay new taxes for resources, they would have had a considerable overplus in the Treasury.

The question being about to be put on the first resolution—

Mr. CLAY said, he approved of the general system contained in this report, and, with some modifications, should give it his support ; but he thought it was susceptible of amendment. He thought the amount of the land tax too high for the ordinary season of peace. It was not necessary to go into an inquiry at this moment, whether the land does not eventually pay all taxes, in whatever shape levied or collected ; but he laid down the general principle, that in time of peace we should look to foreign importations as the chief source of revenue ; and in war, when they are cut off, that it was time enough to draw deeply on our internal resources. Mr. C. said, he thought we ought to reduce the land tax still lower than proposed, and also some other of the taxes which appeared most burdensome in their nature ; retaining enough to keep the system of internal taxation so organized, as that an addition to the existing taxes only would be necessary to produce immediately such an accession to the revenue as should make it adequate to the necessities of the country. Mr. C.'s plan was to make up for his proposed decrease of the direct tax, by an increase of the duties on imports. He wished to reduce the direct tax to two millions, or to a million and a half ; and when that proposition was decided on, he was desirous of proposing another, that the tax should be limited to one year, so as to make it a tax from year to year, instead of a tax without limitation.

Mr. HARDIN desired to strike out the whole amount proposed, so as to leave the sum blank ; which blank he should be opposed to filling at all. He was opposed to any direct tax for the purpose of expensive Military and Naval Establishments ; and said he should offer some day next week, if no other member would, a motion that the Army Establishment be reduced.

Mr. CLAY so varied his motion, to accommodate his colleague, as to move to strike out the sum entirely, and leave in the resolution a blank, to be filled as the House should think proper.

Mr. RANDOLPH was opposed to the motion to reduce the direct tax. Although opposed to any part of the system, he preferred the direct tax to the excise, because, every man then knew and felt what he had to pay. He was in favor of making the direct tax an annual bill, as proposed by the Speaker, but expressed his surprise at the Speaker's opinion that, in peace, we should rely on the imposts for revenue, and, in war, on internal taxation, &c.

Mr. DESHA spoke in favor of a repeal of the direct tax, and, in support of it, urged some arguments not distinctly heard by the reporter.

Mr. CLAY made a few remarks in reply to Mr. RANDOLPH and Mr. HARDIN, and went on to remark :—It had been said, that this was a time of profound peace. It was true, we were happily at peace with all the world ; but who knew how long it would be our good fortune to remain so ? What was the present state of our relations to Old Spain ? Who could now say, with certainty, how far it might be proper to aid the people of South America in regard to the establishment of their independence ? He did not know how other people thought on those subjects, but they made a serious impression on his mind. We have recently heard, said he, and I believe the information came from the Minister himself, that a demand has been made by the Minister of the Spanish Government of the surrender of a part of the soil of the country ; he meant that part of the country formerly known by the name of West Florida, which lies west of the Perdido, and part of which is now incorporated in the State of Louisiana. Mr. C. said, he would not speak, in the terms in which he might be authorized to speak, of the impudence of such a demand ; but he considered it indicative of the general disposition of the Government which that Minister represented. Besides, he asked, was the state of Europe settled ? Every one had heard of the proceedings of the Congress of European potentates at Vienna ; we heard, too, that their ideas of legitimate government were carried to an extent destructive of every principle of liberty ; we have seen these doctrines applied to create and overthrow dynasties at will. Do we know, said he, whether we shall escape their influence ? Do we not know, though no such intention may exist at present, we shall, by adopting that policy which recommends a reduction of the Army and Navy, invite their attention to our weakness ? Mr. C. said, he was for preserving the system of internal revenue, on a reduced scale. He wanted to see Europe settled; to see the relations between this country and Spain placed on a footing which would insure tranquillity on our borders. Until he saw these things, he was not for exhausting the purse of the country of the funds necessary to enable it to vindicate its rights at home, or, if necessary, to aid in the cause of liberty in South America.

Mr. McKEE said he was in favor of leaving the resolution blank as to the amount of direct tax. He perfectly concurred with his colleague, (Mr. HARDIN,) that unless a disposition should be manifested in Congress, different from anything indicated either by the proceedings of this body, or by conversations out of the House, he should be opposed to filling the blank at all. Let me, said he, ask the Speaker (Mr. CLAY) whether we should have dared in 1812 to have laid a direct tax of three millions of dollars, or any tax at all, for the purpose of supporting the Peace Establishment we now have? When particular circumstances in 1812 demanded an increase of our Army, and of the resources necessary to support it, what was the course which the National Legislature resorted to, to render those measures palatable? Did we not say, those measures should exist only during war? Did we not say that, within one year after the return of peace, the nation should be relieved from taxation? Now that peace was restored, ideal dangers were to be conjured up, to justify the maintenance of large establishments; and where was the Government that could not at any time conjure up reasons such as these? Against the doctrines which his colleague (Mr. CLAY) had expressed, and no doubt candidly and honestly entertained, Mr. McKEE said he as sincerely and candidly and honestly entered his protest, as he (Mr. CLAY) had against the opinions of his colleague (Mr. HARDIN.) The doctrines of this report, Mr. McKEE said, occupied the very ground which was taken in Great Britain a century ago, and would certainly produce the same effects here as they had done there, if like causes produce like effects. Show me the nation, said he, with large expenditures of money, large taxes to support it, and I will show you a people who have no substantial freedom, whose liberty is a mere phantom, and has no substance in it. Would any one say that the liberties of the people of Great Britain were not as well secured now as they were a century ago? Their rights exist with the same guarantees; they have the freedom of press and of speech: why then do we say, and truly say, the people of Great Britain are the subjects of an unrelenting tyranny? Because they are oppressed by a system of taxation, taking from the mouth of labor its bread, and depressing the industry of the country. Like causes would produce like effects in this country. Were gentlemen not now hunting up causes of alarm as motives for maintaining those expensive establishments? Had any individual in the House proposed to reduce the national expenditure? He had expected the Financial Committee would have begun its operations by promising to lop off some of those excrescences which have grown up out of the necessity of the times. There is not a tax on the statute book for which, Mr. McK. said, he did not vote; but he did so to meet the occasion which demanded them. He did not vote for taxes or for Military Establishments at those times to saddle the American people with them forever. They had now answered the occasion for which it was said they were created, and he was for repealing them; though he agreed with the gentleman from Virginia, if any internal tax was to be retained, it ought to be the land tax. It was a preferable tax, because it comes home to the feelings of the poor and the rich, every man feels it; it does not slip unnoticed through society. But, if it were continued, with other taxes, unless better reasons were assigned for them than had been, Mr. McK. said he was much mistaken if gentlemen would not soon hear of it in a manner infinitely more authoritative than any argument he could urge.

Mr. RANDOLPH moved that the Committee should rise; because, he said, a fact had fallen from the Speaker (Mr. CLAY) which would have much weight on the proceedings of the House when it came properly before them. According to the genius of this Government, none of its Ministers had seats on the floor of this House, and consequently those members become the medium of communicating its sentiments who stand high in the confidence of the Executive. Who should stand high in its confidence if the Speaker of this House did not?—and he had made a declaration, with a view to influence the vote of the House, on a money bill too, involving matter of deep and high import. Mr. R. said, he did not wish that the opinion and influence of the Speaker should have that effect on the deliberations of this House, which it ought not to have in case the negotiation, if there was one pending, between us and Spain, should be in a better state than that of which the gentleman had spoken. If such were the relations between us and Spain as he had represented, Mr. R. said it might have, and perhaps he might say, ought to have, considerable weight on the great questions now pending. For his part, however, Mr. R. said, he, like the gentleman from Kentucky, (Mr. McKEE,) could not be frightened with the raw head and bloody bones of Old Spain. He believed that General Andrew Jackson and the Tennessee militia would give a good account of all the Spaniards who will ever show themselves west of the Perdido, and their red brethren the Creeks, the Choctaws, and Seminoles, to boot. — [Here Mr. CLAY rose to explain, and Mr. RANDOLPH gave way for the purpose.]

Mr. CLAY said that, when up before, he had not said nor intimated, nor did he intend to be understood, as communicating any fact which the Executive was in possession of in relation to the views of Spain. He had had no conversation with any member of the Administration on the subject. He alluded to a rumor, equally he presumed, in the possession of the gentleman from Virginia as of himself; he had heard it as coming from the Minister himself at a public entertainment. Mr. C. denied that he had any relation with the Executive, the Cabinet, or any of its members, other than any other member of the House had or might have. He had not now, nor ever had, any other relation. Whilst up, if the gentleman would permit, he would make a single remark on that part of the gentleman's argument. The gentleman had shown, by the latter part of his remarks, that this motion was wholly unnecessary; for, though the gentleman had commenced by saying that a fact had been communicated which would have an important bearing on the question before the House, he had ended by saying that, if the fact were true, he would trust to General Jackson and the Tennessee militia to drive all intruders from the soil in that quarter. Mr. C. said he believed the bravery, the heroism of those citizens would be a safe reliance; but he was disposed, if necessary, to afford them auxiliary aid, &c., without drawing too largely on their patriotism.

Mr. RANDOLPH resumed the floor. Although the fact communicated by the honorable Speaker to this House might not have come from any member of the Cabinet, nothing could be more natural than for Mr. R. to suppose it might; for, he said, when he was intimate with the members of the Cabinet, he had been let into their secrets, and perhaps too deeply into them. Although this rumor, which had come, as the honorable Speaker had told them, from the Spanish Minister, might not have any influence on his vote, he doubted whether it would not have considerable influence on the votes of other gentlemen. It was not logical—in the fashionable phrase it was a non sequitur, to say, that because the rumor did not affect him, it might not affect the opinions of others; for perhaps the honorable Speaker will allow, said Mr. R., that I am impregnable to arguments of such a nature. With respect to this rumor, Mr. R. said he was at the first of it. He never had had any communication with any Minister, domestic or foreign, but at his instance; he never had, nor ever would he. He was now, he repeated, at the first of this rumor. Stated as this rumor had been, was it no cause why the Committee should rise? He thought it was—he knew that the Speaker had not intimated that he had obtained his information from this or that source; that, Mr. R. said, was an inference of his own—but, as far as language can convey ideas, he was both deaf and stupid if the Speaker had not intimated that the state of our relations with Spain, combined with the reported demand of the Spanish Minister, would influence his opinion on the subject before the House. As for South America, Mr. R. said, he was not going a tilting for the liberties of the people of Spanish America—they came not to our aid—let us mind our own business; let not our people be taxed for the liberties of the people of Spanish America. Above all, Mr. R. said, he did not mean to pour out the blood and treasure of his constituents for the sake of the people of Caraccas and Mexico. In fact he did not want to go in the track of Aaron Burr or Jonathan Dayton—he did not want any of the territories in that region by conquest, purchase, or voluntary cession. If they established an independent government, he would maintain with these people, as with all other nations, the relations of peace and amity. This struggle for liberty in South America, Mr. R. said, would turn out in the end something like the French liberty, a detestable despotism. You cannot make liberty, he said, out of Spanish matter—you might as well try to build a seventy-four out of pine saplings. What ideas, he asked, had the Spaniards of rational liberty; of the trial by jury; of the right of habeas corpus; of the slow process by which this House moves and acts? None—no, said he, none; expediency, necessity, the previous question, the inquisition—these were among the engines belonging to their ideas of government. The honorable Speaker Mr. R. said, had told the House on a late occasion, that he saw instances of this or that in the British House of Commons; the honorable gentleman had been sent on a late occasion by our Government to Europe—he had been near the field of Waterloo—Mr. R. said he was afraid, the gentleman had caught the infection; that he had snuffed the carnage—and when a man once catches that infection, like that of ambition or avarice, whether taken in the natural way or by inoculation, the consequences are permanent. What! said Mr. R., increase our standing army in time of peace on the suggestion that we are to go on a crusade in South America? Do I not understand the gentleman? [The SPEAKER here intimated a negative to this question.] I am sorry I do not, said Mr. R. I labor under two great misfortunes—one is, that I can never understand the honorable Speaker; the other is, that he can never understand me—on such terms an argument cannot be maintained between us—therefore, for his share, Mr. R. said, he should put an end to it.

Mr. CLAY then rose, and said, that he did not know how the gentleman could possibly have understood him as desiring to augment the Army at this time, or as desiring to undertake a crusade to South America? [Mr. R. intimated across the House, that he had inferred his views, and not quoted his language.] Mr. C. said as the question was for the Committee to rise, he was precluded from going into the general argument, which he deferred till a proper opportunity.

Mr. CALHOUN was in favor of the motion for the Committee to rise; because, he said, this was a question involving momentous considerations. On the ways and means depended every measure of the Government. On the decision of the questions now before the Committee depended the question whether a liberal and enlightened policy should characterize the measures of the Government. Gentlemen ought therefore to proceed with caution. If gentlemen were of opinion that our navy ought not to be gradually improved; that internal improvements should not be prosecuted; if these were their sentiments, they were right in desiring to abolish all taxes. If they thought otherwise, it was absurd, it was preposterous to say, that we should not lay taxes on the people. Mr. C. said gentlemen ought not to give into the contracted idea, that taxes were so much money taken from the people; properly applied, the money proceeding from taxes was money put out to the best possible interest for the people. He wished, he said, to see the nation free from external danger and internal difficulty. With such views, he could not see the expediency of abolishing the system of finance established with so much labor and difficulty. It was a subject which ought to be approached seriously and deliberately. The broad question was now before the House, whether this Government should act on an enlarged policy; whether it would avail itself of the experience of the last war; whether it would be benefitted by the mass of knowledge acquired within the few last years; or whether we should go on in the old imbecile mode, contributing by our measures nothing to the honor, nothing to the reputation of the country. Such would not be his course. He believed this great people, daily acquiring character and strength, would excite the jealousy of foreign Powers. He had no hostility to the Power to which he had particular reference; but he had a friendship for his own country. He thought it due to the wisdom of its councils, and to its security, that it should be well prepared against possible assaults from abroad. If danger should come, we shall then be ready to meet it. If it never come, we shall derive a sufficient consolation from a knowledge of our security. In this view of the magnitude of this topic, and to give gentlemen on every side an opportunity of speaking on the question which is now opened, which is to decide whether we are to travel downward, or to raise the nation to that elevation to which it ought to aspire, he should vote for the Committee's rising.

Mr. CLAY intimated that, under similar considerations, he also should vote for the Committee to rise.

Mr. LOWNDES expressed his wish that the Committee should not rise; and Mr. SERGEANT spoke in favor of its rising in order to obtain some official information which he deemed necessary to a correct decision of the question before the House.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, spoke strongly against the Committee's rising, on account of the great time already consumed in debate on other topics, the rapid progress of the session, and the multitude of topics demanding the attention of the House, &c., which required that less time should be consumed in debate.

Mr. HARDIN said he wished also to express his sentiments on this subject, as well as other members, who had perhaps consumed less of the time of the House in debate than the gentleman from Kentucky, (Mr. JOHNSON.) He wished to know, he said, what the gentleman from South Carolina meant by national glory? Whether he meant by it large standing armies and navies, and tens of millions of debt and taxes? He wished to ascertain these and other things. [The Chairman here reminded Mr. H. that the question for the Committee to rise did not admit a debate on the merits of the main question; and that his observations were not in order.] Mr. H. said, being a new member, he knew little of what was called order in the House, and did not mean to violate it; he had heard a great deal about it, but seen very little of it since he took his seat. He concluded by saying he was in favor of the Committee's rising, to afford an opportunity for a free debate on the subject.

The Committee rose, and the House adjourned.

MONDAY, January 22.

Another member, to wit, from New York, WILLIAM IRVING, appeared, produced his credentials, was qualified, and took his seat.

Mr. TUCKER presented a petition of the commissioners appointed at a meeting of sundry inhabitants of the town of Alexandria, in the District of Columbia, for the establishment of a bank in said town, to be called "The Real Estate Bank of the United States," praying that the said bank may be incorporated by an act of Congress.—Referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

Mr. TUCKER, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, made a report on the petition of the Mechanic Relief Society of Alexandria, praying to be authorized to raise money by lottery for the purposes of the society. The report recommends, on the ground of hostility to lotteries, that the prayer of the petition be not granted.

This report was opposed by Messrs. LEWIS and WRIGHT, on the ground of justice to the District, the people of which, they contended, ought, in self-defence, against the inundation of tickets from other States, to be permitted to raise money for public purposes, as was permitted for many purposes by the States. To this argument Mr. TUCKER replied, that, being under the conviction (as no doubt a majority of the House was) that lotteries were a species of gambling of the most extravagant and injurious kind, he could not consent to do what he considered a positive evil to produce a possible good, and therefore did not consider the argument as of any force against the report, &c.

The report was concurred in without a division.

Mr. TUCKER reported a bill to authorize the President and Directors of the Potomac Company to acquire certain lands by purchase, and to dispose of water rights; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the whole House to-morrow.

On motion of Mr. LOWNDES, the Committee of the whole House, to whom is committed the bills reported by the Committee of Ways and Means on the 19th instant, were discharged from a further consideration thereof, and they were committed to the Committee of the whole House on the report of the Committee of Ways and Means of the 9th instant upon the subject of revenue.

Mr. YANCEY, from the Committee of Claims, made a report on the petition of John T. David; which was read; when Mr. Y. reported a bill for the relief of John T. David; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. YANCEY also made a report on the petition of Joseph Wheaton; which was read; when Mr. Y. reported a bill for the relief of Joseph Wheaton; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

On motion of Mr. JENNINGS, the Committee on the Public Lands were instructed to inquire into the expediency of authorizing the officers of the land office for the district of Jeffersonville to expose to public sale, at the said land office, such tract or tracts of land as have or may become forfeited to the United States for nonpayment.

On motion of Mr. NELSON, of Massachusetts, the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures were instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing by law for the repairs and support of piers situated in the harbor of Newburyport, in the State of Massachusetts.

On motion of Mr. WRIGHT, the Committee on Military Affairs were instructed to inquire into the reduction of the Army as directed by law, and when the Peace Establishment was completed; and also, whether the officers of the Peace Establishment retained are out of those in office during the war, or appointed since the peace, and report the list of officers, if any, appointed since the peace, that are retained, and the State or Territory of their residence.

On motion of Mr. ATHERTON, the Secretary of the Treasury was directed to lay before this House a statement of the amount of the valuation of real estate and slaves in the several States, made by virtue of the act of the 22d day of July, 1813, for the assessment and collection of direct taxes, separately designating in such statement the amount of the valuation of the buildings, lands, and slaves, in each State.

The following letter, received on Saturday by the SPEAKER, was now laid by him before the House:

GENERAL POST OFFICE, Jan. 20, 1816.

SIR: Having this morning heard that reports were in circulation unfavorable to the character of this Department, in relation to its fiscal concerns, I respectfully request that a committee of the honorable House may be appointed to investigate these concerns.

Respectfully, I am your obedient servant,

R. J. MEIGS, Postmaster General.

HON. HENRY CLAY, Speaker H. R.

The letter was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

DUTIES ON MERCHANDISE.

Mr. LOWDES presented to the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury to the Chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, containing an estimate of the whole amount of duties on merchandise which accrued in the year 1815.—Referred to the Committee of the Whole on the report of the Committee of Ways and Means upon the subject of revenue.

The letter is as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, Jan. 20, 1816.

SIR: I have received your note, requesting a statement of the whole amount of bonds given for duties on importations which accrued in 1815. The portion of the duties on merchandise imported, for which no bonds are given, is probably not more than one per cent. of the whole amount, and cannot, without difficulty, be distinguished from that portion for which bonds are given. It is so small that I have not thought it necessary to make any separate estimate of it, and shall, therefore, give in answer to your note an estimate of the whole amount of duties on merchandise imported, which accrued in the year 1815.

The estimate contained in the annual report was made in the month of November, before returns for any part of the fourth quarter of the year, except from the smallest and most inconsiderable districts, had been received, and before the large importations of that quarter were known at the Treasury to have taken place. At the present moment the returns from the larger districts, for the third quarter of the year, are not complete, and for the fourth quarter of the year are still more deficient. The great pressure of business in the custom-house has, doubtless, occasioned this unusual delay. The consequence is, that it is only for the first and second quarters of the year 1815, that a correct statement can be given. For the third quarter an estimate can be given nearly correct; but for the fourth quarter it can be formed only by comparison with the preceding, the returns of bonds taken being deficient from some of the most considerable districts for the whole quarter, and from nearly all the most considerable districts for the two last months of the quarter.

After making this explanation, I have to state, that the amount of duties on merchandise, imported during the first quarter of the year 1815, amounted to—

And during the second quarter of the same year to - - - - - 10,434,275 56

From the returns received, it is believed that the duties for the third quarter of the year will somewhat exceed those for the second. They are, therefore, estimated at - - - - - 10,700,000 00

The returns for the fourth quarter are so imperfect as to afford little or no means of estimating the total amount. It is known generally that the importations in the month of November were large, and that in the months of October and December they were less considerable. It is supposed that for the whole quarter the duties will equal those of the third quarter, say 10,700,000 00

Estimated amount of duties on merchandise imported during the whole year - - - - - 32,697,120 83

The tonnage duties, light money, and duties on passports and clearances amounted, during the first and second quarters of the year 1815 to - 251,136 99

During the third and fourth quarters, as fewer foreign vessels were employed in our commerce, these branches will be proportionally less productive, and are estimated at - - - - - 300,000 00

551,136 99

The Revenue.

H. OF R.

Gross proceeds of the customs, as estimated for the year 1815 - - - 33,348,257 82

The drawbacks, bounties, allowances, and expenses of collection, are to be deducted from this sum in order to ascertain the net amount which will be receivable into the Treasury.

The debentures for drawbacks issued during the first quarter of the year 1815, amounted to - - - 76,274 41

And during the second quarter of that year, to - - - 323,086 39

During that period the re-exportations were very small, compared with those which took place during the third and fourth quarters.

As the markets became glutted with foreign merchandise, the quantity sent abroad for better prices would naturally increase. It is believed that the drawback on the portions thus re-exported, during the third and fourth quarters of 1815, will amount to the sum of - - - 3,500,000 00

The bounties and allowances actually payable during the year 1815, will be small, probably not exceeding - 100,000 00

The expenses of collection will be augmented by the cost of several new revenue cutters, to replace those lost during the war. The whole amount may be estimated at - - - 900,000 00

And will leave for the net amount of the revenue of customs, accruing in the year 1815, the sum of - - - 28,348,897 02

This exceeds the sum stated in the annual report by an amount of $3,348,897 02; an excess produced by the extraordinary importations during the fourth quarter of the year, beyond what had been anticipated; and in relation to which it may not be improper to remark, that, as those importations have surcharged the market with many articles, a proportionate diminution in the importation of those articles, and consequently of the duties upon such importations during the ensuing year may be expected.

It ought also to be observed, that this excess will be wholly absorbed by the deficit, as stated in the annual report of the moneys receivable into the Treasury during the year 1816; and, indeed, will be insufficient to meet the whole of that deficit. But it will relieve the Treasury from the necessity of borrowing money, or of issuing Treasury notes, or of leaving Treasury notes already issued in circulation, for making good that deficit to an extent equal to the sum of $3,348,897 02, above stated.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, &c.

A. J. DALLAS.

HON. WILLIAM LOWNDES, Chairman, &c.

THE REVENUE.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the report of the Committee of Ways and Means upon the subject of revenue; as also on the bill "to continue in force the act for imposing additional duties upon all goods, wares, and merchandise, imported from any foreign port or place;" also, on the bill "to continue in force the act laying a duty on imported salt, granting a bounty on pickled fish, exported, and allowances to certain vessels employed in the fisheries;" also, on the bill "to repeal so much of the act passed on the 23d of December, 1814, as imposes additional duties on postage;" also, on the bill "to continue in force certain acts therein mentioned;" and on sundry petitions.

The bill for continuing the present rates of duties (that is, what are commonly called the double duties) to the 30th day of June next, was first taken up; and having been read—

Mr. LOWNDES proposed to amend the bill by adding thereto a new section, enacting, that from and after the 30th June next, there shall be laid, levied, and collected, in the manner now proposed by law for the collection of duties on foreign goods, wares, and merchandise, forty-two per cent. on the amount of duties then existing, until a new tariff of duties shall be established by law.

Mr. CLAY, (Speaker,) desirous to increase this rate of duty, in order to allow the diminution of the direct tax, when that question should come up, moved to strike out of this section the words forty-two, and in lieu thereof to insert fifty per cent.—which addition of eight per cent. to the proposed amount, he calculated, would produce an additional million of dollars to the revenue, and allow a diminution by so much of the amount of the proposed direct tax.

Considerable debate took place on this motion; in the course of which the comparative expense of the mode of collection of this amount of tax in one way or the other was discussed.

The motion was opposed on the principle of preference of the direct tax, in its proposed extent, to increasing the duties on imports, by Messrs. LOWNDES, SERGEANT, HUGER, and MINOR; and supported on the opposite ground by Messrs. CLAY and DESHA.

Mr. CLAY's motion was negatived, 80 to 64.

Mr. RANDOLPH moved to strike out of the section proposed by Mr. LOWNDES, the words referring to a new tariff to be established, considering them as mere surplusage; in which view he was supported by Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. The motion was objected to by Mr. LOWNDES, who vindicated them on the ground of their holding forth to those concerned an indication that these duties were not to be permanent, but limited in their continuance. The motion was negatived by a large majority.

The question on adding the new section (above described) was decided in the affirmative—yeas 85.

On motion of Mr. THROOP, a new section was added to the bill, calculated to give greater security to the collection of the duties established by the bill.

Mr. REED moved to amend the bill so as that the rate of duties proposed to be established to take effect after the 30th June, shall take effect from and after the 18th day of February next.

H. of R.

Proceedings.

JANUARY, 1816.

This motion was negatived by a considerable majority.

The bill for continuing the duty of twenty cents per bushel on salt was then taken up.

Mr. RANDOLPH moved to strike out a vital part of the bill; which was, in effect, a motion to reject it.

This motion was supported with much earnestness by Messrs. WRIGHT, PICKENS, JEWETT, RANDOLPH, and STANFORD, and opposed by Messrs. PICKERING and HARDIN.

The debate, so far as it applied to the question actually before the House, embraced the arguments which have been repeatedly urged on the floor of Congress pro and con. this tax.

The motion to destroy the bill was negatived.

Mr. RANDOLPH then made three successive attempts to amend the bill: 1st, so as to limit its duration to one year; 2d, so as to reduce it to the old rate of twelve and a half cents per bushel; 3d, so as to add to the bill a provision for an additional duty of five cents per bushel on imported coal, with a view to encourage the home trade in that article.

These several motions were supported by Mr. RANDOLPH, but all rejected; the first by a vote of 76 to 46, the others by considerable majorities.

The Committee then rose and reported the bills to the House; and had leave to report to sit again upon the remainder of the subjects above specified.

TUESDAY, January 23.

Mr. SOUTHWARD presented a petition of sundry freeholders and inhabitants of the State of New Jersey, praying for the establishment of a National Bank.

Mr. JACKSON presented a petition of Robert Lowe Stobie, praying that he may be permitted to take out a patent for a ship's rudder, and a pump for extracting foul air from the holds of vessels, of which he is the inventor, as at present he is unable to do so, because of his not being a citizen of the United States.—Referred to Messrs. JACKSON, ROSS, and WARD of Massachusetts.

Ordered, That the letter from William Lambert, with abstracts of calculations relative to the establishment of a first meridian at the Seat of the General Government, received on the 14th ult.; together with the memorial of the said Lambert heretofore presented, and the accompanying papers upon the subject of the establishment of a first meridian, be referred to Messrs. NELSON of Virginia, MIDDLETON, RANDOLPH, PITKIN, and IRVING of New York.

Mr. LEWIS presented a petition of sundry inhabitants of the State of Virginia, praying that the Merchants' Bank of Alexandria may be incorporated by Congress.—Referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

Mr. NELSON, of Virginia, presented a petition of William Tatham, setting forth the services he has rendered the nation in laying the foundation of a topographical establishment, and praying that justice and equity may be administered in his case, that his materials may be purchased at a fair price, and that his remaining years and experience may be employed in such pursuits as the President may direct for the public good.—Referred to the Secretary of War.

Mr. ROBERTSON, from the Committee on the Public Lands, reported the bill from the Senate "confirming to the Navigation Company at New Orleans the use and possession of a lot in the said city," without amendment; and the bill was committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. ROBERTSON, from the Committee on the Public Lands, made a report on the petition of the Legislature of the Mississippi Territory, presented on the 29th December last, upon the subject of fractional sections of land; which was read, and the resolution therein contained was concurred in by the House, as follows:

that the Senate have passed a bill, "authorizing the sale of a lot of ground belonging to the United States, situated in the town of Knoxville, in the State of Tennessee," in which they ask the concurrence of this House.

THE REVENUE.

The House resumed the consideration of the amendments reported by the Committee of the Whole, to the bill to continue in force the act for imposing additional duties upon all goods, wares, and merchandise, imported from any foreign port or place; and the said amendments being again read, the first thereof was concurred in by the House.

The question was then stated to concur in the second amendment, which proposes to insert the following section as the second in the bill:

"SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That, from and after the 30th day of June next, there shall be laid, levied, and collected, in the manner now prescribed by law, for the collection of duties on foreign goods, wares, and merchandise, the sum of 42 per cent. on the amount of the duties which shall then exist on foreign goods, wares, and merchandise, until a new tariff of duties shall be established by law."

A motion was made by Mr. GROSVENOR to amend the said amendment, by striking out these words: "a new tariff of duties shall be established by law," and inserting "the first day of February, 1817, unless a new tariff of duties shall, before that time, be established by law."

This motion was supported by Mr. GROSVENOR, opposed by Mr. LOWNDES, and negatived—ayes 57, noes 87.

A motion was then made, by Mr. DESHA, to amend the said amendment, by striking out the words "forty-two," and inserting "fifty;" and the question being taken, was determined in the negative—yeas 68, nays 80, as follows:

Mr. REED renewed the motion he made yesterday, as stated before; which motion was again negatived.

The amendments made in Committee of the Whole having been agreed to, the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The bill for continuing the duty on imported salt, was next taken up. An amendment was proposed, by Mr. BRIGHAM, to commute the duty to fifteen cents on every fifty-six pounds of salt, but was negatived. The bill was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the revenue subject.

The bill first taken up, was the bill to continue in force the acts therein mentioned, being those embracing the duties which the House had determined by resolution to continue, viz: the duty on stamps, and that on sugar refined within the United States.

Mr. BURNSIDE moved to amend the bill in that part embracing the continuation of the duty on stamps, so as to exempt from taxation discounted notes and bills of exchange. This motion was supported by Messrs. BURNSIDE and MILNOR, opposed by Mr. INGHAM, and negatived by a large majority.

The other bill, for repealing so much of an act laying certain duties as relates to the additional duties on postage, was next taken up. A proposition was made to amend the bill, by Mr. WARD, so as to include a modification of the duty on sales at auction; which was negatived.

The Committee then rose, and reported the bills to the House.

The engrossed bill to continue the double duties on imports, was read a third time, and passed without a division.

The bill to continue in force the bill laying a duty on imported salt, was read a third time. The yeas and nays on its passage having been required by Mr. STANFORD—a debate arose on its passage, which was opposed by Messrs. ROSS, STANFORD, RANDOLPH, BRIGHAM, and C. KING.

The opposition to the bill was on various grounds, but the debate turned principally on the liability to abuse of the privilege of drawback to those vessels employed in the fisheries. The tax was also opposed as oppressive, and as being one of the war taxes, which it was said ought not to be continued. The field of debate was entirely relinquished to the opponents of the bill, except by those who defended the bounty to fishermen, &c.

Mr. STANFORD declared that he considered it the most iniquitously unequal tax that ever was imposed. The Western country, he said, paid none; and one State paid nearly one hundred and fifty thousand dollars, while the whole produce of the tax was fixed at five hundred thousand; so that that one State paid almost a third of the whole tax; and, in the fishing countries, they smuggled the salt they used, and yet received a drawback or bounty equal to the amount of the tax upon it.

Mr. PICKERING said, the gentleman from Carolina labored under a mistake. He wished the honorable gentleman would produce his evidence of the charge. Smuggling salt was, from the very nature of the thing, so improbable that the idea of it was ridiculous. The fishing vessels were small, and the owners knew what salt was required, and took enough to sea to cure their fish; they were not so foolish as to depend upon a precarious supply—none of them would run the risk of defeating their voyage, by going out upon the bare chance of meeting a vessel from abroad laden with salt. He said that every encouragement was now, more than ever, necessary to fishermen; the town of Marblehead was almost destroyed by the effects of the war. A hundred fishing vessels sailed out of it, carrying about a thousand men, before the war; but now there were but thirty-three; at the same time the people were so impoverished that they were not able to build vessels, and their right to fish on the coast of Labrador, Newfoundland, and the Gulf of St. Lawrence, was taken from them in consequence of the war.

Mr. RANDOLPH said, it was stated by a late Secretary of the Treasury, that the allowance paid to the fisheries in lieu of drawback, surpassed the duty accruing from the tax upon the salt they used; the reason was, that the fishermen received salt from vessels at sea, and sold their drawback debentures to purchase rum and other articles. He went much at length into this abuse, an account of which he had received that very morning, from a very respectable and intelligent informant.

Mr. REED observed, he rose principally to correct some errors which the honorable gentleman from North Carolina, (Mr. STANFORD,) and the honorable gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. RANDOLPH) had fallen into, in relation to the drawback on the salt duty, allowed to persons engaged in the fisheries.

I approve, said he, of the bill now under discussion, and hope I may be indulged a few minutes in offering some reasons in favor of the vote I shall give.

We are deeply in debt, and need considerable amount of revenue to meet our engagements and support our credit. From what sources shall we obtain the revenue we need? A duty on salt was imposed at the commencement of the Administration of WASHINGTON, and was twice increased during the first nine years of the Federal Government. This duty was continued until 1806. Can we have a stronger expression of the opinion of former legislatures on the subject?

It is true the salt tax falls on all classes of men, but it is also true (with the provisions of this bill) it oppresses none.

It is a tax which operates, in many respects, justly. Salt is so bulky, and comparatively of so small value, that it cannot be smuggled. The honest man pays no more than the dishonest and dishonorable. But we have been informed by an honorable gentleman from Vermont, (Mr. JEWETT,) that salt is smuggled into Vermont from Canada, and he mentions the fact as a reason against imposing a duty on salt.

Sir, to me, this information was truly surprising. I never before heard of smuggling salt. If the information be correct, and it comes from such a source that I do not doubt it, on what article of importation shall we impose a tax? I have long been of opinion that the great difficulty in smuggling salt, and evading the duty, was a sound reason for imposing it, and so far from being persuaded to change my opinion by the statement of the honorable gentleman, I am more than ever convinced of the expediency of the duty. No doubt, great changes have of late taken place in this country, in relation to the payment of duties. I fear many are not influenced by those honorable and honest principles which ought to govern any man. If we cannot collect a duty on salt, on account of smuggling, on what, I ask gentlemen, can we collect revenue? Can we collect it from a duty on silks and broadcloths? Can we collect it from valuable goods of small bulk?

But the bill is opposed because it operates unequally. The land tax is probably most equal in its operation, yet many gentlemen, perhaps a majority, are dissatisfied with it. I beg gentlemen who complain of the inequality of this duty, to examine for a moment the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, as it respects the comparative amount of the internal duties paid by different States. I hold the report in my hand. The State of Massachusetts paid of the carriage tax $33,995 24; Vermont paid of the same tax $2,890 24. The whole tax amounted to the sum of $225,178 47. Massachusetts paid of the auction tax $35,350 04; Vermont paid $14 25; New Hampshire paid $776 67; North Carolina paid $1,237 62; Virginia paid $4,079 37. I will proceed no further. It must be manifest to all, that any one of the above taxes operates extremely unequal. Some press harder on one place and class of people, and some on another. We ought as far as possible so to impose taxes as to operate equally on all, and oppressively on none. The high price of salt in some places is not owing to the duty, but to the expense of transportation.

It has been observed by some gentlemen in the course of this debate, that the inhabitants on the seacoast pay much heavier taxes than those in the interior of the country. Most of such persons are seamen, or engaged in commerce. They cannot raise their own wool and flax, and manufacture their own clothes, nor can they live almost wholly on the produce of their farms. They live principally on imported articles, as coffee, tea, sugar, molasses, &c., which can hardly be dispensed with at sea. From their situation and circumstances, therefore, they use much more of foreign and imported articles than those who live in the interior of the country on farms, and they of course pay much more of the double duties.

JANUARY, 1816.

The Revenue.

H. OF R.

Some gentlemen seem to speak as if salt were the only necessary of life, and the salt duty the only tax felt by the poor. This, I think, a mistake. Most of the taxes imposed fall on the poor as well as the rich. The poor must be fed and clothed. They will use many imported articles which we may consider necessities; on all these articles heavy duties are imposed.

Sir, notwithstanding all I have heard against manufacturers, in my opinion they merit our attention. I would not encourage them to the injury of any other interest. We ought to consult the real interest of all—of the farmer or planter—of the mechanic or manufacturer—and of the merchant. What was the situation of the United States and of New England during the Revolutionary war? Did not the inhabitants of this country, at that time, suffer for the want of many necessary manufactures? The price of salt at that time in New England, on the seacoast, was four or five dollars. After the duty on salt was imposed and continued a number of years, some of our citizens, believing the duty would be continued, erected salt-works, at great labor and expense, vats and covers to make salt or sea water by evaporation. It has been considered as a manufactory highly useful. It has been encouraged by the Legislature of Massachusetts, and, no doubt, all purchasers have derived an advantage from the competition and consequent reduction of the price of salt. When the law imposing a duty on salt was repealed, in 1806, the manufacturers suffered extremely. What has been the effect of the salt manufactories during the late war in Massachusetts? Salt has been sold in their neighborhood for less than one dollar per bushel. Similar salt-works may be erected almost anywhere, where there is salt water. Some who complain of the salt duty have probably derived an advantage already from the manufactory, greater than all the duty they have ever paid.

The amount of drawback, mentioned by the honorable gentleman from North Carolina, (Mr. STANFORD,) paid some years ago, probably includes the drawback then allowed on salted provisions, on which a drawback is not now allowed. If not, it has not been proved that the drawback at that time exceeded the duty paid on salt actually used in the fisheries.

The sum of four dollars per ton allowed to fishing vessels, which have been employed four months, in lieu of a drawback, may, in some instances, exceed the duty on salt used; but, I do not believe, on the whole, it is an equivalent.

In the year 1792, a number of petitions were presented to Congress on the subject of the fisheries. They were referred to Thomas Jefferson, then Secretary of State. He examined the subject, and gave a detailed report. The result of his investigation is, that no nation was ever able to carry on the fisheries without supporting them from the Treasury; but is of opinion that the advantage of our situation "would place our fisheries on a ground somewhat higher; such as to relieve our Treasury from that necessity, but not to permit it to draw support from them. nor to dispense the Government from the obligation of effectuating free markets for them." What was his opinion as to the importance of the fisheries? What has been the opinion of European nations, and of the wise men of our own? "If (said he) our fisheries be suffered to decay, the loss of seamen, unnoticed, would be followed by other losses in a long train. If we have no seamen, our ships will be useless, consequently our ship timber, iron, hemp, and ship-building be at an end; ship carpenters go over to other nations; our young men have no call to the sea; our produce be carried in foreign bottoms, be saddled with war freight and insurance in time of war, and history will prove that the nation which would be our carrier has, for one hundred years past, had three years of war for four years of peace."

I am desirous to answer the honorable gentleman from North Carolina, (Mr. STANFORD,) and the honorable gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. RANDOLPH,) because I think their statements erroneous, and yet I am at a loss how to reply. Their charges consist of surmises and suspicions. They say they have been informed that vessels frequently go to sea, on a fishing voyage, without salt, expecting to meet vessels at sea loaded with salt, and there supply themselves and evade the duty.

The gentlemen are totally mistaken. I have been, for some years, well acquainted with a number of men engaged in the fisheries, and I never, until this day, heard it suggested. I believe gentlemen in an error, for the reason offered by my honorable colleague, (Mr. PICKERING.) What rational man would ever act so unwisely? Go a thousand miles to sea with a vessel and seven or eight men after fish without salt? Without salt they could do nothing. What man, in his senses, would run such a hazard to defraud the Government of $40? I assure gentlemen they have no occasion to apprehend any danger from the case mentioned. I hope their honor and honesty would be sufficient security, if not, their interest certainly will.

We are told by the honorable gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. RANDOLPH,) that he has been informed by a respectable and intelligent man that the fishing business failed after the repeal of the salt duty; that, perhaps, the debenture certificate might be very convenient for those poor men, engaged in the fisheries, to purchase whatever they might need for the voyage, or for their families.

In the first place, it is not a fact, that, on the whole, the fisheries declined, in consequence of the repeal of the salt duty.

There were more vessels engaged in the fishing business in 1807 than at any former period. Since that period other causes have destroyed the fisheries. But had the honorable gentleman been correct in his information on the subject, he himself in the close of his statement offered a sufficient reason for their decline, to wit, that poor men engaged in the fisheries wanted ready money, which was obtained by their debentures during the continuance of the duty on salt, and not as has been intimated that the drawback exceeded the duty. Indeed from what I have been able to learn on the subject from men engaged in the business, I do not believe the drawback exceeds the duty. I believe those engaged in the fisheries have paid this year as much duty on salt over and above the drawback as farmers who possess property of equal value.

I feel happy to agree with the honorable gentleman from North Carolina, (Mr. STANFORD,) respecting the character and importance of this class of citizens. I fully concur with him in opinion that the fisheries, as a nursery of hardy, intrepid, good seamen, are of vastly more consequence to this nation than military academies.

It seems now, by the consent and approbation of all, we are to have a navy. Indeed the result of our late wars has demonstrated its utility. It then behooves us to act wisely, and foster the fisheries, that, should war unfortunately again happen, these fishermen (wholly without employment in time of war) may enter on board our armed ships, and do as they always have done, bravely fight in defence of their country. During the Revolutionary war and late war, they have suffered more than any other class of citizens; still they expect no favors. They now pay heavy taxes unknown to others, such as duties on hooks and lines, duck, cordage, naval stores, and tonnage.

I am not disposed to comment upon the late war with Great Britain, or the late treaty. I trust, however, it will not be improper on this occasion to state, that previous to the late war, we enjoyed important privileges which are now lost. I particularly allude to the privilege of taking fish at Newfoundland, and also on the coasts, bays, and creeks of all other of His Britannic Majesty's dominions in America, and to dry and cure fish in any of the unsettled bays, harbors, and creeks of Nova Scotia, Magdalen Island, and Cape Labrador, so long as the same shall remain unsettled. This nation once esteemed it an important privilege. After our Revolutionary war, our Ambassadors absolutely insisted on the right of the fisheries. They would not sign even a treaty of peace unless that right was secured. It deserves to be noticed that our privilege to the fisheries was secured by the 3d article of the Treaty of Peace. It also constitutes the 3d article of the definitive treaty of 1783.

I forbear at this time to go into considerations of the value of the privilege we have lost, because I trust we are now treating for it. I hope it will yet be obtained, that we may be placed in this respect in as favorable a situation as we were previous to the late war with Great Britain.

Mr. KING expressed his disbelief of the information given to Mr. RANDOLPH. No man, he said, would go to sea on the bare hope of meeting a vessel from Turks Island casually sailing with a cargo of salt.

Mr. RANDOLPH said that if large vessels sailed from the New England ports to the West Indies, and men ventured in them three thousand miles without a compass, rather than go to the expense of one, they would feel no difficulty to go to sea on the hope of getting salt, particularly if they calculated upon the salt vessels from Turks Island, running purposely in the track of the fishing vessels.

A motion made by Mr. STANFORD to postpone the bill to Monday, was negatived.

The question was then taken by yeas and nays, on the passing of the bill, and carried, at a late hour.—Yeas 89, nays 52, as follows:

WEDNESDAY, January 24.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have disagreed to the bill from this House, entitled "An act authorizing the discharge of James Jewett from his imprisonment."

The bill from the Senate "authorizing the sale of a lot of ground belonging to the United States, situated in the town of Knoxville and State of Tennessee," was read twice, and committed to the Committee on the Public Lands.

Mr. TAYLOR, from the Committee of Elections, made a report on the credentials of the members of this House, declaring them sufficient, &c.; which was read.

CANADIAN REFUGEES.

Mr. THROOP, from the select committee to whom was referred the petition of Abraham Markle and Gideon Frisbie and their associates, reported a bill for the relief of certain Canadian refugees, who joined the American Army during the late war with Great Britain; which was read twice, and committed.—The report is as follows:

JANUARY, 1816.

Relations with Spain—The Revenue.

H. OF R.

That, on due consideration of the memorial, and of the evidence of the facts therein contained, they are satisfied that the memorialists and their associates were residents in Upper Canada at the commencement of the late war between the United States and Great Britain, to which they had migrated from the United States; that, unwilling to take up arms against their native country, being attached to the principles and forms of its Government, and encouraged by the hopes of success and protection held out to them by the commanders of the several American armies which appeared on their frontier and invaded their province, they abandoned their families and their fortunes, and joined the American standard; that these acts incurred a forfeiture of their estates to the British Government, which were seized to the use of that Government by its officers, in pursuance of laws passed for that purpose. It further appeared to your committee that the memorialists and their associates joined the American Army at a period when their services were much wanted, and that they were with the Army in all its important actions and operations on the Niagara, during the campaign of 1814, under General Brown, and contributed much to its success by their bravery, their acquaintance with the inhabitants of the Canadas, and the knowledge they imparted of the local situation of the country; that, in consequence of their adherence to the American cause, some of them were reduced from opulence, and all of them to want.

Your committee are therefore of opinion that the case of the memorialists and their associates presents a strong claim on the equity of this Government, and have instructed their chairman to present a bill for their relief.

RELATIONS WITH SPAIN.

Mr. ROBERTSON offered for consideration a resolution to this effect:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to lay before this House such information as he may possess, which he may not think it improper to communicate, relative to the demands said to have been made by the Government of Spain for the cession of a part of Louisiana.

Mr. R. said, he felt it his duty to make this motion, in consequence of the reports with which the papers in various parts of the nation teemed in respect to this subject. If it was a topic highly interesting to the people of the United States generally, it was particularly so to the people of the State which he represented, (Louisiana.) They had been sufficiently annoyed and vexed, for the last fifteen years, by frequent changes and rumors of changes of their form of Government; and whether this report were true or not, it was proper that the minds of his constituents should be quieted in regard to it. The immense distance at which they were situated from the Seat of Government would make them more anxious to know the truth on this head; and he should feel that he neglected their interests if he failed to make the effort which he had done, to remove all doubts from their minds on the subject.

The motion was agreed to without debate, and without a division; and Messrs. ROBERTSON and CLAYTON appointed a committee to lay the same before the President.

THE REVENUE.

The engrossed bill to continue in force the acts therein mentioned—the act laying a duty on bank notes and notes discounted, and the bill laying a duty on sugar refined within the United States—was read a third time. The question on the passage of the bill was decided in the affirmative—Mr. RANDOLPH having required the yeas and nays thereon, in order, as he said, to record his vote against it. For the bill 103, against it 43, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adgate, Alexander, Archer, Ather-ton, Baker, Bassett, Bateman, Bennett, Betts, Birdseye, Blount, Boss, Breckenridge, Brooks, Burnside, Burwell, Cady, Caldwell, Calhoun, Cannon, Chappell, Chipman, Clarke of N. Ordered, That the title be "An act continuing in force certain acts laying duties on bank notes, refined sugars, and for other purposes."

An engrossed bill entitled "An act to repeal so much of an act, passed on the 23d of December, 1814, as imposes additional duties on postage," was read a third time, and passed.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the remainder of the report of the Committee of Ways and Means.

The question before the House on the last adjournment, and which now recurs, was on a motion of Mr. CLAY to strike out three millions, the amount of the direct tax proposed to be levied annually on the United States.

Mr. CLAY, considering the decision of the House yesterday, in regard to a proposed increase of the duties on imports, as decisive against his object, which was to substitute for a part of the proposed direct tax a small additional duty on imports, calculated to produce the same amount—withdrew his motion. He then moved to amend the resolve respecting the direct tax, so as to limit it to one year, with a view to place it annually under the control of this House. This motion was agreed to by a large majority.

Mr. HARDIN then moved to amend the resolve, so as to declare it expedient to repeal the direct tax laws altogether, except so much as is necessary to enforce the collection of the tax already due.

Mr. HARDIN said that, on Saturday last, he had notified the House that, in some shape or other, he intended to bring the question before them as to the expediency of repealing the direct tax; that on that day, he had made one or two efforts to bring the question directly before the House when in Committee of the Whole, but every attempt failed, because, as alleged by the Chair, it was not in order. It ought not to have been a matter of importance to the Chair, in his endeavors on that day to present the question for consideration, whether he was or was not exactly in trim order; because if a man be entitled to admission, his bowing at the door like a Frenchman or an Englishman, a beau or a clown, as long as he behaved decently, did not add to nor diminish his right. Nor did he believe that this want of a little of the ceremony deemed important by the Chair, ought to have prevented him from being heard upon a great national question, when he was solicitous to address the House on the subject; or that because he had had at that time the complaint so common to some gentlemen in this House, to wit: the speech-making fever. Mr. H. said that the amendment to the resolution of the Committee of Ways and Means having been offered by him, it laid him under some obligations to the House to assign the reasons which had induced him to do it. Mr. H. said he approached the subject with great diffidence and reluctance; diffident he was, because he distrusted his own capacity to do the subject justice; and reluctant he was, because, to his great regret, he had witnessed in that House an unconquerable indisposition to alter, change, or modify anything reported by any one of the Standing Committees of the House. He said the manner in which the legislative business was conducted destroyed the freedom of legislation altogether. The President signified his will to the Heads of Departments—they made their annual report to the House, recommending the adoption of certain measures; it was pretty well understood that what they recommended was the will of the Executive; the reports of the Heads of Departments were referred to the Standing Committees, a majority of whom were followers of the Executive; they kept in secret conclave for a month or two, until the House became all anxiety, and solicitude was on tiptoe. Each day an inquiry would be made when they would report? Not ready yet, would be the answer. The members of the committee looked grave, pensive, and melancholy, as if oppressed with a mighty weight of thought. At last they would burst upon the House with their report; and what was it when made? A mere echo, a mere response to Executive will, with small and immaterial variations, intended for the purpose of inducing the House to believe that they had matured the subject well, when, perhaps, they had never thought about it; predetermined, from the first, to re-echo back in substance Presidential will; and when the report thus made finds its way into the House, it is fixed. Right or wrong, it must not be altered. Each member of the committee adheres to it, each hanger-on supports it, and all, as the poet says, "Who live and never think," support it. Mr. H. said that independent of the disadvantages he labored under as above stated, he also felt a little chagrined at the manner in which these questions respecting the taxes, direct and indirect, are brought before the House. Each item of taxation being separately discussed, each wheel of the machinery is separately presented, and we are admonished not to touch it, because the whole work will be stopped if you touch one of the wheels. I have heard of many manœuvres in military and naval tactics. This, sir, may, for what I know, be a system of legislative manœuvre, and it is a most admirable one to answer the object intended for. I know of many who would gladly make alterations in the system, but do not attempt it for fear of breaking up its foundation. The committee have had it under consideration for a month or two, and we ought not to meddle with it. Mr. H. said the task was too Herculean for him to believe that he could effect and procure the adoption of the amendment proposed by him. Hence arises, said Mr. H., my reluctance, Mr. Chairman, to address at this time this honorable committee; but as I pledged myself to the House on Saturday last I would make this effort to repeal the direct tax, I now proceed to redeem that pledge—to perform that promise.

It is contended by those in favor of the continuance of the direct tax, among whom I am sorry to see my colleague, the honorable Speaker, first, that the direct tax is necessary, in aid of the present and prospective receipts of the Treasury, to enable the Government to meet the demands against her, which consist of the necessary expenditures for the civil, diplomatic, and miscellaneous expenses; the Military and Naval Establishments; the interest on the national debt contracted before the war, and so much of the interest as we are bound to pay annually, and also the interest on the debt contracted since the war. It is furthermore contended, even should the sum proposed to be raised by the continuance of the direct tax be not actually wanting for the purposes and objects above alluded to, yet, that the system itself ought to be preserved, and ought never hereafter to be abolished, because it will enable Government to extend her internal improvements, add a large sum to the Sinking Fund, and, also, by preserving the system, the machine can readily be put in motion, whenever another war, or the energies of Government may demand.

The first point which I shall endeavor to prove, Mr. Chairman, will be, that the sum contemplated to be raised by the direct tax for the purposes mentioned by those who are in favor of the tax, is not necessary to effectuate those objects. Secondly, even if it should be necessary, sooner than the tax should continue, it would be better to reduce the standing army from ten to six thousand, which reduction would relieve the Treasury from an annual demand to the amount of nearly the net proceeds of the direct tax. I shall also endeavor to show that if the tax be not necessary to enable the Government to meet the demands against her, that it ought to be repealed as an unwise, an odious tax; one oppressive in its collection to the Government, and oppressive to the people. I shall, in discussing the several points, in passing along, notice such observations as occur to me, and I deem materially pertinent to the point, which were made in opposition to the doctrine I now contend for. And lastly, as we have in this House heard much of national glory, and in what it consists, particularly from the gentleman from South Carolina, I shall give, as briefly as I can, what constitutes the national glory of a republican Government. As to the first point I propose to establish, permit me, before I enter into an enumeration of facts relating to the demands against the Government, and which she will be bound annually to pay, and also of the probable receipts of the Treasury, to inform this House that I have no data to make my calculations from except those furnished by the Secretary of the Treasury; and I am induced to believe that his statement of facts, so far as I rely upon them, to prove the points I contend for, will not be doubted, for when he makes his estimates from conjecture, they are made, it is evident, as unfavorable to my side of the question as he could possibly make them. For, turning your attention, Mr. Chairman, to the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, and to the system of revenue he proposes, his object and that of the President cannot be misunderstood; that is, internal taxes, direct and indirect; large standing armies in time of peace, with a continual outcry of danger where none exists; large sums of money to be disbursed in a variety of chimerical projects, to increase instead of lessen the demands against the Government. All this for the purpose of enhancing their own ideal glory, continuing and extending public patronage, and running the road of power in the same way that President Adams did, except to attempt and succeed in those measures which Adams, when most invested with power never dreamed of, measures calculated to oppress the people and destroy the republican form of Government.

According to the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, the amount of the national debt, contracted before the war, was, on the last of September, 1815, $39,135,484 96; the interest and annual reimbursement of that debt, as much as we are bound to pay by contract, is $3,460,000; the amount of the funded debt since the war, as liquidated and funded up to the last of September, 1815, is $70,000,000; the interest which Government is bound annually to pay on that debt, is $4,200,000; the amount of the civil, diplomatic and miscellaneous expenses, is estimated at the sum of $1,800,000; for the Military Establishment, at ten thousand men, $5,112,159; for the Naval Establishment, including $200,000, annually appropriated to the increase of the Navy, $2,716,510; the total amount for all the expenditures, as estimated by the Secretary, is $17,288,669. These estimates are all made upon a predication that the Army will always have their complement of men and officers, and no one lacking; and what is somewhat astonishing, and would be more so, if in these days there was not so many strange things to wonder at, that the civil list of next year, in times of peace, is estimated at $540,000 more than was the estimate for 1812. So much for dexterity in working hard to waste public money! But, Mr. Chairman, it is only one item in my proofs going to show that the Secretary of the Treasury, to effectuate the great administration system of public patronage, arising from taxes, armies, navies, &c. extended his estimates higher than was necessary. Let us now examine the supposed receipts of the Treasury, given by the Secretary, bottomed upon the principle that the double duties are to be continued until June, 1816, and the system of indirect taxation adopted as recommended. The greater part of the bills have either passed, or the House, by resolutions, has already expressed its determination to pass them. As to the amount arising from tonnage and customs, after the double duties cease, and forty-two per centum is added to the old duties, as is contemplated, the receipts of the Treasury will be $17,000,000; internal duties, as estimated, $4,500,000; sales of public lands, $1,000,000; postage, and incidental receipts, $400,000; making in the whole, exclusive of the direct tax, $22,900,000; leaving in the Treasury, after paying off every demand against Government, a surplus of $5,611,331 annually. But it is contended, that the receipts of the Government are precarious, and may fall short of what they are estimated at. I do not believe that will be the case, but, instead of falling short, will greatly exceed what they are estimated at; for I do verily believe, they are estimated too low—and if I was to say by design, perhaps I would not say too much; for, when I am speaking of design, it will be remembered by this House, that in the annual report of the Secretary, he informed us that the sum received and receivable into the Treasury for last year, from duties, was only $25,000,000; but when, by a resolution of this House yesterday, calling on the Secretary to state, specifically, the amount of each quarter, he this morning sent to the House this report, which I hold in my hand, in which he is compelled to acknowledge his mistake, and, no doubt to his unspeakable regret, further to acknowledge that the receipts of the Treasury, instead of $25,000,000, as stated, is $28,848,897. In passing along, the House must pardon these little digressions; for I cannot omit pointing out those little inaccuracies in the report, by way of showing that the whole soul and energies of the Executive and his Ministers are devoted to this favorite system of taxation, standing armies, &c. The net amount of our revenue, arising from tonnage and customs, after the double duties, and forty-two per centum is added to the old duties, is estimated, as I have said before, at $17,000,000; that is a sum sufficient to establish the position I set out to prove. But it is contended, that the estimation is too high. To prove it too low, in the years 1807 and 1808, when our trade was embarrassed by the restrictive system, the amount of tonnage and customs were somewhere about $15,000,000. Now, if our trade in imports and tonnage only equals either of these years, when you add forty-two per centum thereto, instead of customs and tonnage netting $17,000,000, as estimated, it will net upwards of $20,000,000. This estimate which I have made is fortified by this additional circumstance: in 1815, with the double duties on, the tonnage and customs amounted to $28,348,897. Take off the double duties, and in lieu thereof add forty-two per centum, and if our imports and tonnage for years to come only equal last year, it will bring into the Treasury $20,127,717. But it is said we have lost the carrying trade, and all the tonnage employed in it, and the amount of duties arising in consequence of some goods being obliged to be landed here to enable the vessels to clear from our ports. It is also alleged we have lost some of our tonnage in being restricted, limited, and circumscribed, in our fisheries, (one of the acquisitions obtained by the war.) I am not, Mr. Chairman, acquainted with those branches of trade, and, therefore do not know what will be the probable loss the revenue will sustain on account of the causes before mentioned; but I have conversed with gentlemen who are, and they inform me that the probable loss on account of the loss of the carrying trade and part of the fisheries, will not exceed more than two millions per annum. But admit it to be two, nay, three millions, do you not believe that the increase of population and wealth in this country, since 1807 and 1808, more than equals those partial losses to our revenue, and also the additional loss the revenue may sustain by the demand for goods being to a small extent supplied by home manufacture? The sales of public lands are estimated at $1,000,000, because the receipts from that source last year amounted to that sum. But I am informed by a member of this House, that the amount of sales last year, was upwards of $2,000,000; and this House must know, Mr. Chairman, that now the Indian war is over, what a vast population is now, and will be for years, rolling from the East to the West—so much so, that I should not be astonished, if the sales of land, instead of one, are three or four millions per annum. This House will not, I trust, forget this further particular, that each year the demands against the Government will be diminished to the amount of the interest upon each instalment of principal that is paid, and the sources of revenue will increase, and surely it would be wise and sound policy, that if the first year we were only able to meet the demands against Government, seeing that the second year we will have a surplus, which will increase each succeeding year, to ease the people from the burden of taxation, as much as possible; for they have already suffered in various ways greatly, in consequence of the war. But it is also alleged, that the taxes should be continued to put into our coffers large sums of money, to be appropriated to the Sinking Fund, to extinguish the principal of the new debt when it becomes payable, which I believe is in 1825, 1826, 1827? To that course of argument I answer that long before that time the old national debt will be extinguished, which will leave a surplus of money in the Sinking Fund, and which can be supplied to the extinguishment of the principal of the new debt as it becomes due; and also, the surplus that will remain from the revenue without the direct tax. These two several items can usefully be applied to the total extinction of the principal of the new debt, when it becomes due and payable. Mr. H. said, that he would remind this House, that when our revenue, in 1814, amounted only to $11,826,807, that the domestic debt, independent of the foreign debt, which was several million, amounted, after the purchase of Louisiana, to $80,691,120, and then it was not deemed necessary by the President and Congress to have either a direct or indirect tax; and which debt, both domestic and foreign, was by the last of September, 1815, all paid off but $39,000,000; and now we must have both direct and indirect taxes to a great amount, and forty-two per centum added to the duties and tonnage—all for what purpose? because we want it now? no, but to apply it now to a sinking fund, there to remain until the first of the debt becomes due in 1825. To get the money, Mr. Chairman, into the public coffers is the object; to apply it to the Sinking Fund is the pretext for getting it; thus the real object in collecting the money may be three or four fold. First, to have money at command to squander it away upon flatterers and favorites; secondly, to keep up the system of taxation to strengthen the Executive by the additional means of distributing offices, and perhaps added to these reasons there may be some little reluctance at seeing some favorites go out of office who are now in, and who must be turned out should this law be repealed; or peradventure, though the idea I acknowledge is somewhat romantic, to give the heir apparent, when he fills the Presidential Chair—for you all know who I mean by the heir apparent, (Mr. Monroe)—the popularity attendant upon the repeal of such odious laws, which will be the means of insuring his re-election. But we are told, Mr. Chairman, that this resolution, to which I propose the amendment, is only for one year; this is only sugaring the pill to make us take the medicine the better—if it be necessary for one year it is necessary for years to come. It will be recollected by the House, that on account of the peace the receipts of the Treasury for 1815 were upwards of $13,000,000 more than the demands against the Government, and also the receipts which will accrue before the double duties expire, which is in June, 1816, will bring such a sum into the Treasury as will enable the Government to meet the extraordinary demands against her, which demands consist in the appropriations this session to pay off the demands due the Army, and the Treasury notes now in circulation. The Secretary, in his report, says that it is not necessary to legislate for one year only; that the Treasury is competent to meet all the extraordinary demands against it this year.

But, if it were otherwise, and it was necessary to reduce our expenses within the income from duties on commerce, Mr. H. said, he would reduce the Army. He was aware that, in approaching this subject, he touched a hornet's nest, and perhaps should be stung. The Army, which in 1802 was deemed so hurtful, was now the favorite, because by its means our friends can get into office, and we must have an army of 10,000 men, that is, on paper; it was not cared whether we had the men, so that we have the officers, and the surgeons, contractors, &c.; so that we have the hulk of this mammoth, we care little for the blood and sinews. No, Mr. H. said, the ranks of the Army are not filled. During the late war, though we had sixty thousand men on paper, we had at no time twenty-five thousand in the field. We had plenty of officers, so many of them, that he had heard a suggestion, that they ought to be reduced and organized so as to assist to fill the vacant ranks. He was, he said, for reducing the Army to six thousand men. But the House was told, the Army must not be reduced; that the defence of the nation ought to be regarded as a primary object. Certainly; but was it to depend upon a standing army? Let me remark, said he, that this argument is inconsistent with the genius of our Government, which requires us to depend on the militia for our defence; for that object every citizen is a soldier. Whenever this people cannot defend their liberties, then has the body politic become rotten, then may we bid farewell to liberty. But it is said these ten thousand men are necessary for garrison service. Where, he asked, were garrisons necessary? If they were necessary for the whole country from the District of Maine to the mouth of the Mississippi, there ought to be a hundred thousand instead of ten thousand men. What are three or four hundred men in this or that spot for the purposes of defence against an invading enemy? Mr. H. said he should like to see a garrison at New Orleans, and at one or two posts on the frontier. But of what account would be a few at one place, and a few at another? There was a regiment at Prairie du Chien—of what account are they? These Indians have no dread of permanent garrisons, but of mounted riflemen. What could a few decrepid men do against a horde of active and vigorous Indians? But we are to have not only this force, but the Executive project of an invalid corps of two thousand men, to be used for garrison service; and we are to put these one-legged and one-armed men to watch the Indians on the Wabash, who flit about like ghosts—here to-day, there to-morrow—who can travel an hundred miles in a night on an emergency; who have an open frontier, if they wish to come, to which garrisons at two hundred miles apart afford but little protection. These Indians dread a contest with the United States; they know the people of the West only wish an opportunity to crush them; and that they have the ability to do it. Where, then, said Mr. H., are we to employ our ten thousand men? Against Spain, says the Speaker; for, somewhere or other, either at a ball, party, sleighing match, or in a hack, the Spanish Minister had signified something about the Floridas. What did he say, or where did he say it, no one knows. The story about this talk of the Spanish Minister's, put him in mind of the preacher who gave notice that he should begin at such a point on Kentucky river, and preach all the way down, from day to day; and the particulars of the story about the Spanish Minister were about as well defined. But, if it were true, was this to be held up as an object of terror to us? Proclaim, said Mr. H., to the people, that Mexico is free spoil; that the land on Red river will be theirs if they conquer it, and the Western people will swarm upon it like the locusts upon Egypt. These ten thousand regulars are not wanted for that purpose; the Spaniards would not be a breakfast for us. But these men are to be kept up. Why? Because the Spanish people have rebelled against their own Government in the provinces? What have we to do with that? The Government of Old Spain being opposed in the provinces, the very circumstance of the rebellion is the strongest reason why Spain should be friendly towards us. She knows, if the United States were to march its forces there, the standard of liberty would be everywhere erected. This, then, is no reason for keeping up the Army. But, it is said, the affairs of Europe are unsettled. When were they ever more settled? When the Army was reduced during Jefferson's Administration? Mr. H. said he believed not. We were under no obligations to engage in every contest which arises in Europe. What Power in Europe, he asked, has a disposition to invade us? None. What danger menaces us from any quarter? None. Why then keep up an army to fight windmills? Are the double and triple alliances to be the order of the day, such as those of George the First? Mr. H. said he abhorred them, and we had no business with them. But the gentleman from Kentucky (Mr. CLAY) had said, instead of diminishing, he would have increased the Army. Was it possible that the gentleman had lost his old ideas on this subject? Was it necessary to the safety of this Republican Government to maintain large standing armies? Or was it, Mr. H. said, that the gentleman had snuffed the tainted gales from the plains of Waterloo, and was disposed to fight and to negotiate with every nation? During WASHINGTON's Administration the Army had never been as high as even eight thousand men; and there was less danger now than then. The Powers of Europe had as little regard to justice then as now. We were then weak, compared to what we are now, and more inviting to foreign invasion, as being an easier prey. When we have increased from three to eight millions, can we be in greater danger than we were then, when a smaller force was deemed sufficient? Every means of offence and defence have proportionately increased with our population. The importance and magnitude of the establishments in Europe have increased, it is said. In name they may, but they are not in effect as strong: we shall soon see the military Powers, drawn together by a common object, to put down Bonaparte, plunge their daggers in each other's bosom. Mr. H. said his hair did not stand on end at the glimmer of moonlight through the trees. Those fears which had been expressed by other gentlemen in debate might arise from minds a little distempered by too great a desire to preserve the nation. Mr. H. said he was opposed to a standing army on principle; and the more so, because all the train of bloodsuckers about it were to be sustained by taxes on the people. Down with the whole system! said he; down with it, like Lucifer, never to rise again! and let us depend on militia, well trained, well disciplined—on militia, happy at home; not a militia who are ground down by taxes—a militia, not like dogs and spaniels, that the more you chastise them the more they like you. Militia must be disciplined; but they will not fight without affection to their country, created by an attention on your part to their interests. There are two kinds of patriotism, Mr. H. said—the clamorous whip-syllabub patriotism—one rain will wash it all off; and the other, that of the man who reaps his own harvest, cuts his own grain, and uses it after it is cut; the man who has a fireside and farm of his own, who like the Scythian refuses to go from home to fight, but will fight till death if an invader comes to his father's tomb. Carthage had a standing army, and she fell. Rome had but a militia, and defended herself. The instant she established a standing army, disorder, confusion, and mobs, ensued, and she soon became, by means of her military champions, a prey to the veriest despots the world ever knew. These are the effects of standing armies, to maintain which here, the direct tax is to be retained. I have made these remarks with a view of showing that we ought to get rid of these taxes, even at the expense of this governmental favorite. If necessary, let us strangle it. Mr. H. said, however, he would not go the length of some gentlemen in their ideas of economy. He was in favor of a gradual increase of the Navy, one consistent with our means, and for all those expenditures which a liberal, not a profuse policy, will require.

Mr. H. proceeded to examine the merits of this tax, to show, that if it could at all be dispensed with, it ought to be put down. The money arising from the direct tax was the most expensive that ever came into the Treasury; it is put down as costing three hundred thousand dollars in the collection; but, Mr. H. said, he would venture to say that the actual cost of collection would be found to be not less than four or five hundred thousand dollars, what with your collectors, commissioners of the revenue, and a hundred other officers. Was it not important that contributions should not be levied in this inconvenient and expensive mode? If the money must be collected, why not find a way of loosing the purse-strings more conveniently? If money be collected by indirect taxes, the consumer has the option whether or not he will buy the articles so taxed, whether he will run his stills or not. He has an option, and this sweetens his feelings. But, when the proud, official, strutting, consequential character, the deputy collector, waits upon him with his saddlebags on his arm, and takes his bed from under him to pay the direct tax, he feels indignant, and wishes he had not been born in such a Government. Besides, the direct tax is that tax by which the State governments are and always must be supported. Is this mode of taxation selected in order to let the people know who protects them? Surely not. This was a tax, he said, hateful to the people, and subjecting them to innumerable frauds. The best half of the men employed in this business of collecting a few cents from one, a few from another, and so on, were scoundrels, and cheats, and would not stop at doubling the amount of the tax they ought to collect from a man who was not well enough informed to detect their roguery. Fortunately or unfortunately, Mr. H. said, it had been his duty as a professional man, to detect practices of this kind. These collectors, he said, were something like the man's son whose father told him to make money, honestly if he could, but to make money. Most of them cared but little how they made it. The direct tax, he said, is a costly, odious, and oppressive tax, which strengthened the arm of the Government, by oppressing the people. He had witnessed, with some regret, the rapid increase of Executive patronage; he had witnessed, with pain, the efforts to make the arm of the mighty stronger—to extend that Executive influence which had already swollen to a mighty torrent, carrying devastation before it. Instead of seeing the streams which fed this mighty river, increased—by what? this mammoth bank—by what more? by military academies, invalid corps, direct taxes, and all the energies of power; instead of seeing this, he wished to see the streams reduced, dried up as fast as they could, so that this river, instead of carrying destruction to every one coming in contact with it, should be confined within its banks, as in the time of General Washington—he wished to see it used in the good old way; and the good old way, believe him, was at last the best.

Mr. H. said, he had heard a great deal, since he came here, about what is called the national glory. What it meant precisely, he knew not. If the glory acquired in the late war was meant, he begged to distinguish Congress and the President from the sailors and the Army, who fought our battles. The latter, he said, had acquired glory, by land and sea, which would last until the history of these times should be no more. As to the President and Congress, said he, we had better say nothing about the glory they have got. I know several gentlemen in Congress who obtained in the war imperishable fame, who carry about them the honorable scars they obtained in war. But their merit does not attach to Congress. Congress met in October, 1811, to prepare for war; it was declared in June following—and their first troops, in a month after they went out, had to come back and beg for clothing from the ladies of Kentucky. How will Johnny Congress feel, when the pen of history tells this fact? When the pen of the historian narrates the disgrace of the affair at Bladensburg, how will the President and Secretary of State feel? How will the members of the Executive feel, when it is recorded that men, draughted in August in Kentucky, sent down in November, were drawn up on the west bank of the Mississippi river, without arms? It was something like a crop he once heard of on a plantation: the overseer had a share and a half, and every other hand had a share but Jim, and he had none—he was afraid that Johnny Congress would come out about the glory of the war, as Jim did in the crop. He was astonished to hear gentlemen talk about glory gained by the Government in the war. Many of our soldiers and sailors had acquired glory, and more than one member of this House had distinguished himself in a manner to do them honor, and make their children proud of their name to the third or fourth generation. But the Government had gained none. We had not, he said, gained any one point for which we went to war, and we lost a part of our fisheries, part of our tonnage, &c., and this is the amount of our gain. He differed from gentlemen in their views of national honor and glory. It did not consist, he said, in a standing army, but in the reduction of the national debt, and the expenses of Government also, so as that every citizen should be enabled to enjoy the fruits of his industry, and be ready on occasion to defend his own fireside. It seems we are to have national glory by opening great military roads, from here to New Orleans—one in this direction and one in that. Whenever a farmer in the country, said Mr. H., purchases more than he can pay for, we suspect he is going to ruin, and that a commission of bankruptcy will soon issue against him. Whenever a Government lavishly disburses money, more than her income, it equally proves that the Government is going to ruin. The national debt of Great Britain has made a limited Government a despotic one. Establish a moneyed aristocracy, separate and distinct from the body of the people—which will be the effect of your system—and in the course of a few years the axe will be laid to the root of the tree of liberty, and the last stage of freedom in this world, and when it falls, it will fall with a mighty crash, never again to rise. Such will be the end of this mighty glory, these mighty prejudices and expenses. How can we pay off the national debt, if we give in to these projects of invalid corps, military academies, turnpike roads, canals, &c., which are to consume so much money? The national glory consists in the pristine principles of this Government, in the blessings of tranquillity and comfort at home, and peace with all foreign Powers. Mr. H. concluded his remarks, by observing that his remarks were not intended to give offence to the gentlemen who preceded him—his observations were directed to their arguments only, and not meant in disrespect to them.

Mr. CONNER, of Massachusetts, rose and said that the honorable gentleman from Kentucky, who had just sat down, (Mr. HARDIN,) had, in the course of his remarks, acknowledged that the Army had nobly fought and bled in defence of our country; that it had covered itself with glory; this would prevent him from noticing the acrimonious epithets which the gentleman had previously bestowed on that honorable and highly useful body of men, for whom he had the greatest respect, farther than to say, that he should leave the honorable gentleman to struggle with that sentiment of strong disapprobation, which such a course of proceeding was calculated to excite in that House, and in this nation.

Mr. C. said, that they were then in committee of the whole House on the state of the nation; that this involved in itself subjects of primary importance: our foreign relations; the propriety of augmenting the Navy; the quantum of military force to be retained; and, what was the substratum of military and naval force, taxation. The subject, indeed, admitted of a widely extended range, but he should only take a cursory, a rapid glance.

Mr. C. differed materially from opinions which he had heard advanced on that floor, with regard to abolishing internal taxation, reducing the Army, or dismantling any part of the Navy. He was for gradually increasing the Navy, and placing the Army in such a state of organization as would admit of its being suddenly enlarged in the event of danger and emergency. He was far from looking on the world as in a state of settled and permanent tranquillity. The subjugation of France, he said, had rendered our natural rival the most formidable Power, perhaps, the world had ever seen. History was reversed; Carthage had conquered Rome, and Hannibal had made his triumphal entry in her gates. We were now happily at peace with that nation; but he confessed, and he sincerely hoped he might be mistaken, that the best reflection he had been able to give that subject, the best observation he was capable of forming of the circumstances and character of the two nations, led him to distrust its durability. There was a political necessity of England's being at war; her agricultural interest was as clamorous for it as her military or naval; her financial system had been wound up to a state of such high excitement, that relapse would carry with it ruin. We were becoming a great commercial nation, a formidable maritime Power; and when, asked Mr. C., did England cease to view nations of that description with jealousy—with incessant, watchful, anxious solicitude and jealousy? When did she ever suffer as favorable opportunity of giving the fatal blow to the commerce of such Powers to pass by? Where were the navies of Spain, France, Holland, and Denmark? Who aimed the mortal blow at the commerce of these nations? Were we alone to be exempt from the effects of those passions and motives which were coeval with the fall of man, and had uniformly produced the same result in all nations and ages? Might not a secret cession of the Floridas, and a refusal to a peremptory demand of territory, be made a pretext of war? And yet honorable gentlemen talked as if it were in our power to perpetuate a state of peace. It had been said, that one nation could make war, but that it required two to make peace. Sir, said Mr. C., two nations can make peace, but it requires the will of many to prevent a state of war. It was true, that we had for several years enjoyed tranquillity, which resulted from the severe contest then carried on between the two great belligerents of Europe. The power at one time was so nicely balanced between these two nations, the efforts they exerted against each other were so incessant and tremendous, that they had neither leisure nor disposition to divert any portion of their hostility towards us; and consequently, we were permitted to reap the fruits of a rich commerce unmolested. These were pleasant hours, sir, said Mr. C. It was the May-morn of our political life; and the fallacy of hope is such, that we thought this serene sky was never to be overcast; that we were ever to be entertained with the dulcet strains of the pastoral pipe of peace. But the tempest of war soon brushed away these Arcadian images—the thunder of cannon interrupted this delicious repose. Peace had again returned; these Arcadian images were again revived; the poppy again hung heavy on our eye-lids. Under these circumstances, they were called upon by honorable gentlemen to reduce the Army. He thought that gentlemen who advocated this, must either believe that an army of ten thousand men was too large a force to garrison and defend a frontier of four thousand miles, or that an army was of itself totally useless and inefficient. He believed the former would hardly be contended for; he should therefore beg the indulgence of the House while he devoted a few minutes to the consideration of the comparative efficiency of regular troops and militia; on which subject, he believed, very erroneous impressions were generally prevalent in this country. Mr. C. indicated his surprise that such misconceptions should so generally prevail; he should have supposed that the experience of the Revolutionary war, and the war recently terminated—the experience of ages, and the solemn decision of General WASHINGTON, who said “if he were called upon to declare under oath whether militia had been most serviceable or prejudicial to the country, he should subscribe to the latter;” this accumulation of evidence, he thought, would have produced but one opinion on the subject. He did not deny that militia, under a different organization, should be relied on as a body of national guards; he did not deny that, individually, they were a finer body of men than those which constitute regular armies; but without that discipline, experience, and system—without that inurement to hardship and danger—without that artificial courage, which is a compound effect of habit, confidence, sympathy, and responsibility, and which in large bodies is much more uniform and phlegmatic than natural intrepidity—to say nothing of that military science of engineering, tactics, encamping, &c., which had occupied the attention of many of the greatest men, from the days of the Romans down to the era of Napoleon Bonaparte, they were vastly less efficient.

The honorable gentleman from South Carolina, for whose abilities, Mr. C. said, he had the highest respect, on a former occasion, when the bill for establishing military academies was before the House, seemed to think that the cadets of those schools, by training the militia, for a short time, would render them equal to regular troops; and the honorable gentleman alluded to General Scott's brigade on the Niagara frontier, which he supposed to have consisted principally of recruits which had been but for a short time in service. He said that General Scott's brigade, and that of General Ripley, which co-operated with him—which brigade constituted the division of General Brown—had received a large accession of recruits a short time previous to the commencement of operations. But the regiments composing those brigades had been for two years in service, and by frequent engagements, and constant exposure to hardship and danger, had acquired, in a great measure, the discipline and firmness of veterans. Mr. C. said, that it was well known to military men, that when recruits are arranged to veteran skeletons of regiments, consisting of officers and staff, non-commissioned officers and staff, and but a small part of its complement of privates, they soon acquire the discipline and skill to which the honorable gentleman from South Carolina alluded. This, perhaps, could be better illustrated by an allusion to the human frame: the skeleton was the bones, the nerves, and the muscles; the recruits were the flesh and blood. If the former had acquired consistency and strength, the latter would impart health and vigor, though but of recent origin. He said, that, in his humble opinion, the interests of the country would have been much better consulted, and the expense would not have been materially greater, if the Military Peace Establishment had been organized on this principle. We should then, in the event of hostility, have been able to display a formidable column on any point, that would at once carry terror to the bosom of the enemy, and secure from depredation an extensive inland frontier. Mr. C. remarked, that he was far from being disposed to withhold from the Western militia that tribute to their valor which had been so universally paid them. No one held in higher estimation the patriotism with which they took the field, the patience with which they endured privation, and the intrepidity they exhibited in action. No one had a greater respect than himself for a people who, when pressed into war, are fitted by occupation, climate, and nature, for deeds of chivalry and daring enterprise. But he appealed to those honorable gentlemen from the West to know whether, if the discipline, subordination, and experience, of veteran armies, had been superadded to their valor and perseverance, Kentucky would have mourned so many of her sons cut off by surprise and massacre, and perished by disease? Whether, in fact, the same exertions, the same privations, would not have insured the reduction of Upper Canada, and carried conquest to the walls of Quebec? Mr. C. thought that very unnecessary, and groundless apprehensions were entertained in this country with regard to the danger of a Military Establishment. He denied that the military ever destroyed the liberties of its country; it was only when the liberty and virtue of a country were extinct that the military usurped power; it was only when the great foundations of Government and morals were broken up, when liberty was a sound and virtue a name; it was when contending factions had imbrued their hands in each other's blood, and when the Government became rotten to the heart; it was in this unhinged, this corrupt, this debased state of things alone, when the military would attempt to usurp the functions of Government. It was immaterial, he said, whether it was the head of an army, or the head of an armed faction, who should be guilty of this usurpation. If a military were not already in existence, one would be created for the occasion. He remarked that, perhaps, it would be more for the interests of the people, (if anything could be for the interests of the people,) under such circumstances, that they should settle down early into despotism, than wade through seas of blood, and arrive at last to the same result. Mr. C. asked, whether there were liberty and virtue in England when Cromwell drove out his canting and hypocritical Parliament? Whether there were liberty and virtue in France when Bonaparte clothed himself with Consular power? Had not, said Mr. C., as a preparatory step to this usurpation, angry factions previously embattled themselves against each other on its plains, and flitted away in succession, like the blood-stained spectres of Macbeth? Rome, he said, was a military and free nation for centuries; it had nearly all that time powerful armies in the field. But Rome, at last, by that inevitable process of decay, to which all nations, as well as individuals, are subject, became corrupt. It was a mere contest of faction; its liberty and virtue were no more; it was a struggle for power between Sylla and Marius; between Cæsar and Pompey; and it appeared of little consequence which should prevail. It is strange indeed, sir, said Mr. C., that we should harbor such dismal forebodings of an army, officered from among our own citizens, and at the beck and disposal of Government, and still view with listless apathy and unconcern the overgrown veteran army of a nation, by nature and circumstances inimical to us, and which could be borne to our shores on the wings of the wind. He said, by nature inimical to us—he meant that nature had placed the two nations in such geographical, political, and commercial relation as to produce that rivalry, of course enmity; otherwise, he believed, there was neither natural love nor enmity between nations. Oderint dum metuant, he said, was a bad maxim for an individual; it was that of a tyrant; but it was a very safe one for a Republic in its relations with foreign Powers.

Mr. C. observed, that he believed no one truth was better established in that unerring school of wisdom, experience, than that large masses of untutored levies, (individually heroes, if you please,) in an open country, without works, could be easily defeated and dispersed by one-third the number of veterans. How often had it been witnessed on the plains of India, that great armies, but without military skill, of fifty or a hundred thousand men, supported by a numerous artillery, had been totally routed and scattered by five or ten thousand veterans. And yet these natives of India, he said, these Sepoys, when officered and organized, were said to exhibit more dauntless bravery, more unyielding, vigorous, phlegmatic firmness, than the British veterans in that country. Which, then, asked Mr. C., is the soundest policy, to expose your territory to be ravaged, your cities to be pillaged and sacked, and permit rapine and conflagration to do their worst work, or to establish the foundation of such a military force as could, on emergency, be suddenly enlarged to prevent these evils—not as the honorable gentleman from Virginia said, to emblazon the glory of our country in blood, but to prevent the glory of the enemies of our country being emblazoned in the blood of our citizens? It was this glance at some of our foreign relations, his conviction of the necessity of preparation, the expediency of rapidly reducing the public debt, the ruinous impolicy of diminishing the Army, the necessity of augmenting the Navy, which would influence him in voting substantially for the taxes proposed by the honorable the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means. Mr. C. said, he revered the precepts of WASHINGTON, not ostentatiously, but sincerely; that great man was never for prostrating the defences of the country, and permitting the wild beasts of the forest, or of Europe, to enter and satiate themselves in our beautiful pastures; he was for keeping up a regular, but not oppressive, system of taxation, and retaining a military and naval force proportioned to our means and the exigencies of the times. Mr. C. said, that in the course of the observations he had the honor to make on this floor, he had several times alluded to the prospect of collisions at some future time with a nation with whom we are now at peace. The minister of a monarch, sir, said Mr. C., would not find it necessary or politic to promulgate these opinions; but the people are our sovereign; we are their ministers; this hall is the cabinet chamber for consultation, and here we are bound freely to disclose our views and opinions, although we should be overheard by Europe.

When Mr. CONNER had concluded, at the suggestion of Mr. RANDOLPH, the Committee rose, and the House adjourned.

Mr. McL. presented a document in support of the claim presented by the foregoing resolution; which was referred to the Committee of Claims.

The resolution respecting the direct tax being under consideration, together with Mr. HARDIN's motion to declare it expedient to repeal the said tax—

Mr. RANDOLPH rose and spoke on the subject nearly four hours. He had not concluded, when, being requested to give way for the purpose, the Committee rose, on motion of Mr. ROSS. Mr. RANDOLPH opposed the direct tax and the system of internal taxation generally.

Referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

CAPTAIN MORGAN.

Mr. CHAPPELL reported a bill for the relief of the widow and minor children of Zacquille Morgan, late a captain in the Army of the United States; which was twice read, and committed.

The report is as follows:

That the petitioner states that her husband was a captain in the Army, and was engaged with his company in the defence of the City of Washington in August, 1814; that, by reason of the excessive heat of the weather, and the forced marches which he made to join the American forces before the battle at Bladensburg, and the exertions which he used to keep his company in order after the retreat of that day was ordered, he became completely exhausted, and fell dead in the road. She states that Captain Morgan left six small children, and prays that Congress will place her and her children on the same footing with the widows and orphans of those officers who died of wounds received in battle.

The material facts stated in the petition are supported by the testimony submitted, and show that although Captain Morgan did not die as gloriously as some other officers of our Army, yet he died in the service of his country, and, consequently, that this case is within the spirit of those provisions which have heretofore been made. Whether these provisions be viewed as mere inducements to tempt the citizen to engage in the service of his country, or as the charity of a grateful Government extended to the bereaved widow and orphan, or as both, they are no less applicable to this than the cases provided for. They think the relief prayed for should be granted, and for that purpose report a bill.

RECEIPTS AND EXPENDITURES.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting statements of the receipts and expenditure of the Treasury, from the third day of March, 1789, to the third day of March, 1815, in obedience to a resolution of the 20th instant; which were read, and ordered to lie on the table. MONDAY, January 29.

Mr. KING, of Massachusetts, presented a petition of Jabez Mowry, and others, citizens of the United States, stating that, upon the capture of Eastport by the British forces during the late war, a number of bonds given by them to the United States, to secure the duties on imported merchandise, fell into the hands of the British authorities; that suits have been commenced against some of them by the British Government at Halifax, and judgment rendered; that the cases are now pending before the higher courts in Great Britain; that some of them have been arrested and confined for three months at Halifax, and that others have been pursued by the British military force within the acknowledged limits of the United States, since the ratification of the Treaty of Peace; that the civil authorities of the United States have also commenced suits against them on said bonds; and praying the interposition of the Government of the United States between them and Great Britain; upon which they are prepared to pay the money into the Treasury of the United States.—Referred to Messrs. Mr. CANNON, after a pretty full explanation by him of the circumstances of this case, offered a resolution, which (having been modified on the suggestion of Mr. DESHA, to embrace the case generally of all militia who had been situated in the same manner as those of Tennessee, whom Mr. C. desired particularly to relieve) was agreed to in the following words:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of making provision by law for paying the different volunteers and militia corps, in the service of the United States during the late war with Great Britain, for the transportation of baggage, when such transportation was not furnished by the Government.

MONEY LOST BY A PAYMASTER.

Mr. YANCEY also made a report on the petition of Zachariah Schoonmaker; which was read, and committed to a Committee of the whole House to-morrow.

The report is as follows:

That the petitioner was a Paymaster to the second regiment of volunteer militia of the State of New York, a part of which was stationed at Fort Richmond, on Staten Island, and a part at Sandy Hook, in the month of October, 1813; that, on the 8th day of that month, the petitioner received of the district Paymaster a check on the Bank of America for the sum of $9,000, which was paid him at the bank in three and ten dollar notes; that he paid to the troops stationed at Fort Richmond the sum of $4,159 95, and immediately proceeded to Sandy Hook, for the purpose of paying the troops at that place; that, before he left the fort, he had put the money which remained in his possession into a small trunk, which, for safekeeping, he deposited in a large trunk, and kept the keys of the same himself. When he arrived at Sandy Hook he discovered that he had lost from his trunk the sum of $2,256, in which were included all the ten dollar notes and a part of the three dollar notes. Of that sum, $810, all in ten dollar notes, was afterwards found in a pile of sand in Fort Hudson; but the petitioner states that the balance, to wit, $1,436, he has entirely lost. The petitioner prays of Congress to be remunerated for the loss.

This case was presented at the second session of the last (thirteenth) Congress, and the committee were then of the opinion that the petitioner was not entitled to relief; [report 10th March, 1814, which was burnt at the destruction of the Capitol on the 24th August, 1814.] The principle has often been adopted, and which this committee are persuaded is correct, that, when a Paymaster has received money from the United States, to discharge a debt which the Government owes to its soldiery, and for which he receives an adequate compensation, he must be considered liable for the risk of the money, as well as its faithful and honest application. If the loss were produced by some inevitable accident, such as capture by an enemy, or some other unforeseen event, and which it would not be in the power of human diligence and wisdom to prevent or control, it would present a fit case for the equitable consideration and interference of Congress; but, in a case situated like the present, it is believed that sound policy and correct principles require that the party should abide by the contract he has made with the Government, and be held accountable for the money. The committee, therefore, recommend to the House the following resolution:

Resolved, That the prayer of the petitioner ought not to be granted.

INDEMNITY TO MILITIA.

Mr. YANCEY made a report on the petition of Daniel Gold, and others, militiamen, in the 20th brigade of Virginia militia, which was read; when Mr. Y. reported a bill for the relief of a company of the 20th brigade of Virginia militia, commanded by Captain Jonathan Walmsley; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

The report is as follows:

That, in the year 1814, the petitioners served a tour of duty in the military service of the United States, at and near Norfolk, and, after having faithfully served out their time, obtained an honorable discharge for the same; that the funds which had been placed in the hands of the district Paymaster not being sufficient to discharge the amount of their pay, they received, at the time of their discharge, each, the sum of twenty dollars and twenty cents, and requested of Captain Jonathan Walmsley (who commanded the company to which they belonged) to settle and receive the balance of their pay from the Paymaster, and carry it to them in the county of Randolph, in the State of Virginia, where they resided. Captain Walmsley received of the Paymaster at Norfolk a check on Robert Brent, Paymaster General, for the amount of the balance due to his men, and discounted it at that place at five per cent. On his way home, having taken a passage in the stage, he lodged at the Columbian hotel, in the city of Richmond, where his trunk was robbed of the money.

It appears to the committee, from the affidavits of John Mayce, Lieutenant John Brown, and Captain Walmsley, that they all arrived at the hotel together, and lodged in the same room; that, after getting into the room, it was thought by them that the money which Captain Walmsley had in his pocket would be equally safe, and more conveniently kept in a trunk which belonged to Brown and Mayce; that the money was accordingly placed in the trunk by Walmsley, in the presence of Brown and Mayce, and the key of the trunk given to Walmsley. On the next morning after the money was deposited, upon unlocking the trunk for the purpose of taking it out, it was ascertained by all three of them that the money had been stolen.

In the room in which the trunk was, Mr. Mayce lodged all night, and was at no time absent from the same, except a few minutes while at supper on that evening, and during that time he locked the door of the room upon starting to supper, and found it so locked upon his return to the same. The committee have the assurances of a member of the House of Representatives, that Walmsley, Brown, and Mayce, are all men of good character.

The petitioners ask of Congress to be paid the balance of the money due them for their services.

In this case Walmsley may, perhaps, be considered the agent of the petitioners. Admitting that he is so to be considered, the question would arise in this case, whether they are to be bound by his acts, and receive the misfortune of his conduct. It is certainly a correct rule of justice that, in ordinary cases, the principal is bound by the acts of the agent; but the committee conceive this to be an exception to the general rule, the justice and policy of which they are willing to admit. In this case it was the duty of the Government, pointed out by one of its own laws, to have paid the militia for their services at the time and place of their discharge. In consequence, however, of circumstances not to be foreseen, and which must often occur in this country, especially in times of war, it was found inconvenient, on the part of the Government, to pay the militia at the time and place of their discharge. Not having done this, it seems to the committee reasonable and just, and not subversive of any correct principle of justice or policy, that, in this case, the Government should bear the risk of the money until it was paid over to the petitioners. They, therefore, report a bill for their relief.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT.

Mr. INGHAM, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, made a report on the letter from the Postmaster General, of the 22d instant; which was read, and concurred in by the House, as follows:

The Committee of the Post Office and Post Roads, to whom was referred a letter addressed to the Speaker by the Postmaster General, requesting an investigation of the fiscal concerns of his Department, report: That they have had a conference with the Postmaster General on the subject of his letter, who states, that a rumor is in circulation with respect to the conduct of certain persons in his Department, which he considered was of such a nature as to require an investigation by a Committee of the House of Representatives. Your committee have ascertained that the rumor has proceeded from clerks in the General Post Office, and that it purports to indicate a suspicion, that some persons in that Department have been in the practice of selling draughts upon deputy postmasters for premiums, which have not been passed to the credit of the Department on the books. Your committee have not ascertained any fact to justify this rumor, but they consider it due to the character of the Post Office Department, as well as to the interest and policy of the Government, to comply with the request of the Postmaster General in recommending a more particular inquiry than would have been in their opinion compatible with the duties assigned to the Committee of Post Offices and Post Roads by the rules of the House. They, therefore, submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That a select committee be appointed, in conformity with the request of the Postmaster General, to investigate the conduct of the Post Office Department.

Messrs. INGHAM, BARBOUR, CREIGHTON, CADY, TALLMADGE, PICKERING, and FORNEY, were appointed the said committee.

THE REVENUE.

The House then again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the Revenue subject. The question still under consideration was the proposition, by way of amendment, to repeal the direct tax.

Mr. McKEE spoke in favor of this motion.

Mr. PARRIS, of Massachusetts, said:—I should not have risen in favor of the amendment proposed by the honorable member from Kentucky, had it not been for the unexpected opposition it met with from one of my honorable colleagues on yesterday; unexpected I say, sir, because, representing a people whose interests and sentiments are the same, I did not anticipate a difference in opinion on so important a subject. But, since I am so unfortunate as to differ from that honorable gentleman, with whom I usually act, it may be due to him, it certainly is to myself, that I should explain, in a few words, the reasons which will influence my vote.

I consider the object of the amendment to be a total repeal of the system of direct taxation upon the country; a total repeal of a measure obnoxious in itself, and to which this nation will never submit, unless under circumstances rendering it necessary for the purpose of defending its rights or protecting its liberties. Sir, when this tax was laid, such necessity was apparent; when it was increased its necessity was doubly so. What then was the situation of this country? Under what extreme pressure were these taxes submitted to? It is fresh in the recollection of every member of this House. Where, on the frontiers, were we not assailed? In the West, where were we not constantly alarmed by the depredations of the savages? In the North, where were we not threatened with immediate invasion? In the East, what part of our territory was in possession of the enemy? On the Atlantic, what coasts were not lighted by the flames of our ships; and I might ask, what was the internal situation of this country? An honorable member from Massachusetts, (Mr. HULBERT,) told us the other day, that the face of this nation had become pale. Sir, instead of a paleness being upon the face of the nation, the stupor, the coldness, and the inactivity of death were fast seizing upon some of its extreme members—a disease which threatened not so much the dissolution of the system, as the most fatal consequences to the parts disordered. Sir, under such circumstances, these taxes were submitted to. The people saw the necessity of placing in requisition the resources and energies of the nation, and of making a most powerful effort to save their country from the ravages of a vindictive enemy.

From the Administration that had declared war, not only by the consent, but at the imperative call of the people; from that Administration the same people would not withhold the means of its prosecution.

I ask gentlemen to recollect for what purpose these taxes were laid; I call upon them to consider the extreme circumstances under which they were laid, and I warn them of the consequences of continuing the system after that pressure and those circumstances are removed. If I believed this tax to be necessary for the purpose of defraying the expenses of the late war, if the faith of the Government could not be redeemed without it, or were it necessary to resuscitate the drooping credit of the nation, as odious as it is, as obnoxious as it is, as unequal as it is, it should have my warmest support, as should all other bills having the same object that might find their way to your table. Sir, in no section of this country have the people done more to aid the prosecution of the war, than in that which I have the honor particularly to represent. In none, have they been more ready to contribute the means or furnish the efficient force, and in no district of equal population are to be found more of those honorable but unfortunate testimonials which are the pride and the glory of the soldier. It is with peculiar satisfaction that I can assert, confidently assert, that the yeomanry of Maine are among the most firm supporters of your measures; and knowing them, as I do, respecting those with whom I have been intimate from my birth, I should hazard nothing in guaranteeing their future support. But, patriotic as they are, they do not expect that the taxes levied in consequence of the war will be continued as a system in peace. For what purpose do we want the product of this tax? To what use will we apply it? These are questions which the people have a right to ask us, and which we cannot avoid, but must answer. They pay the money, and of however little importance we may think the laying of this tax, believe me, sir, the farmer will not consider it so unimportant when he is paying it. Compare the receipts and expenditures as estimated by the Secretary of the Treasury in his official report, compare the same as estimated by the Committee of Ways and Means in their exhibit to the House, and granting those estimates to be perfectly correct, tell me if you can, where will be the deficiency. It will be nowhere, there will be no deficiency; your ways and means will be sufficient, amply sufficient, without the direct tax, without the furniture tax, and without the taxes on manufactures, the long catalogue of which I hope never again to see incorporated in our statute book. Why will this tax be odious?—because, as was the case in 1798, it may be difficult to convince the people of its necessity. Like causes produce like effects. The fate of the unfortunate Administration of that day should be held up as a memento to every succeeding, and the rocks on which that foundered ought never to be obliterated from our political chart. Another reason why this mode of taxation is odious, is the great expense of its assessment and collection, and the number of officers employed in aiding its passage from the pocket of the citizen to the vaults of our Treasury. The people are unaccustomed to this mode of taxation; instead of rendering the valuation and paying the assessment to officers of their own choice, and belonging to their immediate neighborhood, they are called upon by men with whom they have no acquaintance, and in whose selection they have no voice. To this may be added, another reason for repealing this tax, which, although the last, is by no means the least important; I refer to the great inequality of its operation, not only among the several States, but among individuals of the same State, which I will attempt to prove. Sir, on examining the books in the office of the Secretary of the Treasury, it will be found, that taxable property of a given value in one State, pays more than double the amount of tax that is paid on property of an equal value in another, and that too in States where the Constitutional provisions relating to direct taxation, have a similar operation. Take for example, Massachusetts, Rhode Island, Connecticut, and Vermont. The average of the tax contemplated by the resolution now under debate, will be in Massachusetts twenty-one cents on each hundred dollars of taxable property; in Vermont it will be thirty cents; in Rhode Island but sixteen; and in Connecticut but thirteen. The result will be this, that laying the proposed tax according to the provisions of the Constitution, the State of Massachusetts at the above rate of twenty-one cents upon each hundred dollars of taxable property will pay three hundred and sixteen thousand dollars, when at the rate as paid by Rhode Island, her proportion would amount to but two hundred and forty-two thousand dollars, and as paid by Connecticut only to one hundred and ninety-seven thousand dollars. Against Vermont, the inequality will be still greater; the quota of that State will be ninety-eight thousand dollars, while the same amount of property in Connecticut will pay but forty-three thousand. This great inequality, which cannot be avoided without a violation of Constitutional principles, is to my mind a sufficient justification for advocating an entire repeal of the system.

But, I have another reason for supporting the amendment proposed by the honorable member from Kentucky. Unless driven to the last resort,

I would not tax the poor and the honest laborer who supports a numerous family by the cultivation of a few acres of our soil. Such rather merit the fostering protection of this Government. I could stand in the door of my humble dwelling, and point you to men possessing a few hundred dollars of property, who will pay more of this tax, than their neighbors who own so many thousands; and yet, for all the purposes of defence and protection, you will find the former the most spirited and effective. This I believe to be the fact throughout this nation. No, sir, if taxes we must have, let them be paid by the wealthy, by the man who rides in the coach, and not by him who passes for the footman; let them be laid upon the luxuries and superfluities of life, and not upon those articles of necessity, without which it cannot be supported. If the receipts of the ensuing year will meet the expenditures, and I am constrained to believe so from evidence derived from official sources, now lying on our tables, how can we justify to the people the continuance of this tax? It cannot be done, its repeal is expected, confidently expected.

In that section of the country in which I am more immediately acquainted, it has been with extreme difficulty that the farmer could procure the cash to discharge this tax; I say cash, sir, for we, there, have nothing of that circulating medium which the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. RANDOLPH) denominates rags. Of the first tax of three millions, the whole has been paid; of the last tax of six millions, not a cent. Sir, I hope while our tax-gatherers are enforcing the collection of this tax, the like of which they have never known, we shall not be here preparing to follow them with another. Whatever may be the opinion entertained in this House or this nation of the disposition of that State, I feel myself not bound to refute it. I answer only for a part, for that people with whom I am immediately connected, a people who, I rejoice in the opportunity of assuring you, have not participated in that kind of loyalty for which their State has been so proverbial. I know them well, I know their attachment to your measures, an attachment which has been tried in the days of adversity and cannot fail to be respected in the days of prosperity. On this subject I know their wishes, their sentiments and their feelings, and in their behalf I call for a repeal of this tax.

Sir, much has been said in this debate about reducing the Army and dismantling the Navy; I confess myself not to be a favorite of large standing armies, they add nothing to the security of the citizen, little to that of the States. But why reduce the present Peace Establishment? it is not so large as to be dangerous in the hands of any Executive, nor so expensive as to be burdensome to the people. We have already dismissed from our service a host of officers, many of whom are equally brave, equally meritorious as those we have retained. Let us provide for those now in service, and while doing that forget not the claims of others who have served us with equal fidelity. The Navy—reduce the Navy!

no, sir, on that we depend not only for protection, but for negotiation; for the former more effectual than all our armies, for the latter more powerful than all our Ministers; instead of reducing I would increase the Navy; and while we have such men to command as grace the naval history of the late war, we have no cause to be apprehensive of the recurrence or the result of another.

Mr. CLAY (Speaker) said the course had been pursued ever since he had had the honor of a seat on this floor, to select some subject during the early part of the session, on which, by a general understanding, gentlemen were allowed to indulge themselves in remarks on the existing state of public affairs. The practice was a very good one, he said, and there could be no occasion more proper than that of a proposition to lay a direct tax.

Those who have for fifteen years past administered the affairs of this Government, have conducted this nation to an honorable point of elevation, at which they may justly pause, challenge a retrospect, and invite attention to the bright field of prosperity which lies before us.

The great objects of the Committee of Finance in the report under consideration are, in the first place, to provide for the payment of the public debts, and in the second, to provide for the support of the Government, and the payment of such expenses as should be authorized by Congress. The greater part of the debt, Mr. C. admitted, had grown out of the late war; yet a considerable portion of it consisted of that contracted in the former war for Independence, and a portion of it perhaps of that which arose out of the wars with Tripoli and Algiers. Gentlemen had on this occasion, therefore, fairly a right to examine into the course of the Administration heretofore, to demonstrate the impolicy of those wars, and the injudiciousness of the public expenditures generally. In the cursory view which he should take of this subject, he must be allowed to say he should pay no particular attention to what had passed before in debate. An honorable colleague, (Mr. HARDIN,) who spoke the other day, like another gentleman who preceded him in debate, had taken occasion to refer to his (Mr. C.'s) late absence from this country on public business; but, Mr. C. said, he trusted among the fruits of that absence were a greater respect for the institutions which distinguish this happy country, a greater confidence in them, and an increased disposition to cling to them. Yes, sir, said Mr. C., I was in the neighborhood of the battle of Waterloo, and some lessons I did derive from it; but they were lessons which satisfied me that national independence was only to be maintained by national resistance against foreign encroachments, by cherishing the interests of the people, and giving to the whole physical power of the country an interest in the preservation of the nation. I have been taught that lesson; that we should never lose sight of the possibility that a combination of despots, of men unfriendly to liberty, propagating what in their opinion constitutes the principle of legitimacy, might reach our happy land, and subject us to that tyranny and degradation which seems to be one of their objects in another country. The result of my reflections is the determination to aid with my vote in providing my country with all the means to protect its liberties, and guard them even from serious menace. Motives of delicacy, which the committee would be able to understand and appreciate, prevented him from noticing some of his colleague's (Mr. HARDIN's) remarks; but he would take the occasion to give him one admonition, that when he next favored the House with an exhibition of his talent for wit—with a display of those elegant implements, for his possession of which the gentleman from Virginia had so handsomely complimented him, that he would recollect that it is bought and not borrowed wit, which the adage recommends as best. With regard to the late war with Great Britain, history, in deciding upon the justice and policy of that war, will determine the question according to the state of things which existed when that war was declared. I gave a vote for the declaration of war, said Mr. C.—I exerted all the little influence and talents I could command to make the war. The war was made; it is terminated; and I declare, with perfect sincerity, if it had been permitted me to lift the veil of futurity, and to have foreseen the precise series of events which have occurred, my vote would have been unchanged. The policy of the war, as it regarded our state of preparation, must be determined with reference to the state of things at the time that war was declared. Mr. C. said he need not take up the time of the House in demonstrating that we had cause sufficient for war. We had been insulted, and outraged, and spoliated upon by almost all Europe—by Great Britain, by France, Spain, Denmark, Naples, and to cap the climax, by the little contemptible Power of Algiers. We had submitted too long and too much. We had become the scorn of foreign Powers, and the contempt of our own citizens. The question of the policy of declaring war at the particular time when it was commenced, is best determined, Mr. C. remarked, by applying to the enemy himself; and what said he? That of all the circumstances attending its declaration, none was so aggravating as that we should have selected the moment which, of all others, was most inconvenient to him; when he was struggling for self-existence in a last effort against the gigantic power of France. The question of the state of preparation for war at any time is a relative question—relative to our own means, the condition of the other Power, and the state of the world at the time of declaring it. We could not expect, for instance, that a war against Algiers would require the same means or extent of preparation as a war against Great Britain; and if it was to be waged against one of the primary Powers of Europe, at peace with all the rest of the world, and therefore all her force at command, it could not be commenced with so little preparation as if her whole force were employed in another quarter. It is not necessary again to repel, said

Mr. C., the stale, ridiculous, false story of French influence, originating in Great Britain and echoed here. I now contend—so I have always done—that we had a right to take advantage of the condition of the world at the time war was declared. If Great Britain were engaged in war, we had a right to act on the knowledge of the fact, that her means of annoyance, as to us, were diminished; and we had a right to obtain all the collateral aid we could from the operations of other Powers against her, without entering into those connexions which are forbidden by the genius of our Government. But, Mr. C. said, it was rather like disturbing the ashes of the dead, now to discuss the questions of the justice or expediency of the war. They were questions long since settled, and on which the public opinion was decisively made up in favor of the Administration.

He proceeded to examine the conditions of the peace and the fruits of the war—questions of more recent date, and more immediately applicable to the present discussion. The terms of the peace, Mr. C. said, must be determined by the same rule that was applicable to the declaration of war—that rule which was furnished by the state of the world at the time the peace was made. And, even if it were true that all the sanguine expectations which might have been formed at the time of the declaration of war were not realized by the terms of the subsequent peace, it did not follow that the war was improperly declared, or the peace dishonorable, unless the condition of the parties in relation to other Powers remained substantially the same throughout the struggle, and at the time of the termination of the war, as they were at the commencement of it. At the termination of the war, France was annihilated—blotted out of the map of Europe;—the vast power wielded by Bonaparte existed no longer. Let it be admitted that statesmen, in laying their course, are to look at probable events—that their conduct is to be examined with reference to the course of events which in all human probability might have been anticipated—and is there a man in this House in existence who can say, that on the 18th day of June, 1812, when the war was declared, it would have been anticipated that Great Britain would, by the circumstance of a general peace, resulting from the overthrow of a Power whose basements were supposed to be deeper laid, more ramified, and more extended, than those of any Power ever were before—be placed in the attitude in which she stood in December, 1814? Would any one say that the Government could have anticipated such a state of things, and ought to have been governed in its conduct accordingly? Great Britain, Russia, Germany, did not expect—not a Power in Europe believed—as late even as January, 1814, that, in the ensuing March, Bonaparte would abdicate, and the restoration of the Bourbons would follow. What then was the actual condition of Europe when peace was concluded? A perfect tranquillity reigned throughout; for, as late as the 1st of March, the idea of Napoleon reappearing in France was as little entertained as that of a man's coming from the moon to take upon himself the government of the country. In December, 1814, a profound and apparently permanent peace existed. Great Britain was left to dispose of the vast force—the accumulation of twenty-five years—the work of an immense system of finance and protracted war. She was at liberty to employ that undivided force against this country. Under such circumstances, it did not follow, Mr. C. said, according to the rules laid down, either that the war ought not to have been made, or that peace, on such terms, ought not to have been concluded.

What then, Mr. C. asked, were the terms of the peace? The regular Opposition in this country—the gentlemen on the other side of the House—had not come out to challenge an investigation of the terms of the peace, although they had several times given a sidewise at the treaty on occasions with which it had no necessary connexion. It had been sometimes said that we had gained nothing by the war—that the fisheries were lost, &c. How, he asked, did this question of the fisheries really stand? By the first part of the third article of the Treaty of 1783, the right was recognised in the people of the United States to take fish of every kind on the Grand bank and on all the other banks of Newfoundland; also in the Gulf of St. Lawrence, and at all other places in the sea, where the inhabitants of both countries used at any time to fish. This right was a necessary incident to our sovereignty, although it is denied to some of the Powers of Europe. It was not contested at Ghent; it has never been drawn in question by Great Britain. But, by the same third article, it was further stipulated that the inhabitants of the United States shall have “liberty to take fish of every kind on such part of the coast of Newfoundland as British fishermen shall use, (but not to dry or cure the same on that island) and also on the coasts, bays, and creeks of all other of His Britannic Majesty's dominions in America; and that the American fishermen shall have liberty to dry and cure fish in any of the unsettled bays, harbors, and creeks, of Nova Scotia, Magdalen Island, and Labrador, so long as the same shall remain unsettled; but, so soon as the same or either of them shall be settled, it shall not be lawful for the said fishermen to dry or cure fish at such settlement, without a previous agreement for that purpose with the inhabitants, proprietors, or possessors, of the ground.”

The British Commissioners, assuming that those liberties had expired by the war between the two countries, at an early period of the negotiation declared that they would not be revived without an equivalent. Whether the Treaty of 1783 does not form an exception to the general rule, according to which treaties are vacated by a war breaking out between the parties, is a question on which he did not mean to express an opinion. The first article of that treaty, by which the King of Great Britain acknowledges the sovereignty of the United States, certainly was not abrogated by the war; that all the other parts of the same instrument which define the limits, privileges, and liberties, attaching to that sovereignty, were equally unaffected by the war, might be contended for with at least much plausibility. If we determined to offer them the equivalent required, the question was, what should it be? When the British Commissioners demanded, in their projet, a renewal to Great Britain of the right to the navigation of the Mississippi, secured by the Treaty of 1783, a bare majority of the American Commissioners offered to renew it, upon the condition that the liberties in question were renewed to us. He was not one of that majority. He would not trouble the Committee with his reasons for being opposed to the offer. A majority of his colleagues, actuated he believed by the best motives, made however the offer, and it was refused by the British Commissioners.

If the British interpretation of the Treaty of 1783 be correct, we have lost the liberties in question. What the value of them really is, he had not been able to meet with any two gentlemen who agreed. The great value of the whole mass of our fishery interests, as connected with our navigation and trade, was sufficiently demonstrated by the tonnage employed; but, what was the relative importance of these fisheries, there was great contrariety of statements. They were liberties to be exercised within a foreign jurisdiction, and some of them were liable to be destroyed by the contingency of settlement. He did not believe that much importance attached to such liberties. And, supposing them to be lost, we are perhaps sufficiently indemnified by the redemption of the British mortgage upon the navigation of the Mississippi. This great stream, on that supposition, is placed (where it ought to be) in the same independent condition with the Hudson, or any other river in the United States.

If, on the contrary, the opposite construction of the Treaty of 1783 be the true one, these liberties remain to us, and the right to the navigation of the Mississippi, as secured to Great Britain by that instrument, continues with her.

But, Mr. C. said, he was surprised to hear a gentleman from the Western country (Mr. HARDIN) exclaim, that we had gained nothing by the war. Great Britain acquired, by the treaty negotiated by Mr. Jay, the right to trade with the Indians within our Territories. It was a right upon which she placed great value, and from the pursuit of which she did not desist without great reluctance. It had been exercised by her agents in a manner to excite the greatest sensibility in the Western country. This right was clearly lost by the war; for whatever may be the true opinion as to the Treaty of 1783, there can be no doubt that the stipulations of that of 1794 no longer exist.

It had been said, that the great object in the continuation of the war had been to secure our mariners against impressment, and that peace was made without accomplishing it. With regard to the Opposition, he presumed that they would not urge any such argument. For, if their opinion was to be inferred (though he hoped in this case it was not) from that of an influential and distinguished member of the Opposition, we had reason to believe that they did not think the British doctrines wrong on this subject. He alluded to a letter said to be written by a gentleman of great consideration, residing in an adjoining State, to a member of this House, in which the writer states that he conceives the British claim to be right, and expresses his hope that the President, however he might kick at it, would be compelled to swallow the bitter pill. If the peace had really given up the American doctrine, it would have been, according to that opinion, merely yielding to the force of the British right. In that view of the subject, the error of the Administration would have been in contending for too much in behalf of this country; for he presumed there was no doubt that, whether right or wrong, it would be an important principle gained to secure our seamen against British impressment. And he trusted in God that all future Administrations would rather err on the side of contending for too much than too little for America.

But Mr. C. was willing to admit that the conduct of the Administration ought to be tried by their own opinions, and not those of the Opposition. One of the great causes of the war, and of its continuance, was the practice of impressment exercised by Great Britain; and if this claim has been admitted, by necessary implication or express stipulation, the Administration has abandoned the rights of our seamen. It was with utter astonishment that he heard that it had been contended in this country, that because our right of exemption from the practice had not been expressly secured in the treaty, it was therefore given up! It was impossible that such an argument could be advanced on that floor. No member who regarded his reputation would, dared, advance such an argument here.

Had the war terminated, the practice continuing, he admitted that such might be a fair inference; and on some former occasion he had laid down the principle, which he thought correct, that if the United States did then make peace with Great Britain, the war in Europe continuing, and therefore she continuing the exercise of the practice, without any stipulation to secure us against its effects, the plain inference would be, that we had surrendered the right. But what was the fact? At the time of the conclusion of the Treaty of Peace, Great Britain had ceased the practice of impressment; she was not only at peace with all the Powers of Europe, but there was every prospect of a permanent and durable peace. The treaty being silent on the subject of impressment, the only plain rational result was, that neither party had conceded its rights, but they were left totally unaffected by it. Mr. C. said he recollected to have heard in the British House of Commons, whilst he was in Europe, the very reverse of the doctrine advanced here on this subject. The British Ministry were charged by a member of the Opposition with having surrendered their right of impressment, and the same course of reasoning was employed to prove it as he understood was employed in this country to prove our acquiescence in that practice. The argument was this: the war was made on the professed ground of resistance of the practice of impressment; the peace having been made without a recognition of the right by America, the treaty being silent on the subject, the inference was, that the British authorities had surrendered the right; that they had failed to secure it, and, having done so, had in effect yielded it. The member of the Opposition in England was just as wrong as any member of this House would be, who should contend that the right of impressment is surrendered to the British Government. The fact was, Mr. C. said, neither party had surrendered its rights; things remain as though the war had never been made; both parties are in possession of all the rights they had anterior to the war. Lest it might be deduced that his sentiments on the subject of impressment had undergone a change, he took the opportunity to say, that although he desired to preserve peace between Great Britain and the United States, and to maintain between them that good understanding calculated to promote the interest of each, yet, whenever Great Britain should give satisfactory evidence of her design to apply her doctrine of impressment as heretofore, he was, for one, ready to take up arms again to oppose her. The fact was, that the two nations had been placed in a state of hostility as to a practice growing out of the war in Europe. The war ceasing between Great Britain and the rest of Europe, left England and America engaged in a contest on an aggression which had also practically ceased. The question had then presented itself, whether the United States should be kept in war, to gain an abandonment of what had become a mere abstract principle, or looking at the results, and relying on the good sense and sound discretion of both countries, we should not recommend the termination of the war. When no practical evil could result from the suspension of hostilities, and there was no more than a possibility of the removal of the practice of impressment, if, as one of the mission, consented with sincere pleasure to the peace, satisfied that we gave up no right, sacrificed no honor, compromised no important principle. He said, then, applying the rule of the actual state of things, as that by which to judge of the peace, there was nothing in the conditions or terms of the peace that was dishonorable, nothing for reproach, nothing for regret.

Gentlemen have complained that we had lost the islands in the Bay of Passamaquoddy. Have they examined into that question, and do they know the grounds on which it stands? Prior to the war we occupied Moose Island, the British Grand Menan. Each party claimed both islands. America, because they are within the limits of the United States, as defined by the Treaty of 1783; and Great Britain, because, as she alleges, they were in the exception contained in the second article of that treaty as to islands within the limits of the province of Nova Scotia. All the information which he had received concurred in representing Grand Menan as the most valuable island. Does the treaty, in stipulating for an amicable and equitable mode of settling this controversy, yield one foot of the territory of the United States? If our title to Moose Island is drawn in question, that of Great Britain to Grand Menan is equally so. If we may lose the one, she may the other. The treaty, it was true, contained a provision that the party in possession, at the time of its ratification, may hold on until the question of right is decided. The Committee would observe that this stipulation, as to possession, was not limited to the moment of the signature, but looked to the period of the ratification of the treaty. The American Commissioners had thought they might safely rely on the valor of Massachusetts, or the arms of the United States, to drive the invader from our soil, and had also hoped that we might obtain possession of Grand Menan. It is true they have been disappointed in the successful application of the force of that State and of that of the Union; but it is not true that we have parted with the right. It is fair to presume that Great Britain will, with good faith, co-operate in carrying the stipulations into effect; and she has, in fact, already promptly proceeded to the appointment of Commissioners under the treaty.

What have we gained by the war? Mr. C. said he had shown we had lost nothing in rights, territory, or honor; nothing for which we ought to have contended, according to the principles of gentlemen on the other side, or according to our own. Have we gained nothing by the war? Let any man look at the degraded condition of this country before the war; the scorn of the universe, the contempt of ourselves; and tell me if we have gained nothing by the war? What is our present situation? Respectability and character abroad—security and confidence at home. If we have not obtained in the opinion of some the full measure of retribution, our character and Constitution are placed on a solid basis, never to be shaken. The glory acquired by our gallant tars—by our Jacksons and our Browns on the land—is that nothing? True, we have had our vicissitudes; that there were humiliating events which the patriot could not review without deep regret. But the great account, when it came to be balanced, thank God, would be found vastly in our favor. Is there a man, he asked, who would have obliterated from the proud pages of our history the brilliant achievements of Jackson, Brown, Scott, and the host of heroes on land and sea whom he would not enumerate? Is there a man who could not desire a participation in the national glory acquired by the war? Yes, national glory, which however the expression may be condemned by some, must be cherished by every genuine patriot. What do I mean by national glory? Glory such as Hull, of the Constitution, Jackson, Lawrence, Perry, have acquired. And are gentlemen insensible to their deeds—to the value of them in animating the country in the hour of peril hereafter? Did the battle of Thermopylae preserve Greece but once? While the Mississippi continues to bear the tributes of the iron mountains and the Alleghany to her Delta, and to the Gulf of Mexico, the 8th of January shall be remembered, and the glory of that day shall stimulate future patriots, and nerve the arms of unborn freemen in driving the presumptuous invader from our country's soil! Gentlemen may boast of their insensibility to feelings inspired by the contemplation of such events. But he would ask does the recollection of Bunker's Hill, of Saratoga, of Yorktown, afford them no pleasure? Every act of noble sacrifice to the country; every instance of patriotic devotion to her cause has its beneficial influence. A nation's character is the sum of its splendid deeds. They constitute one common patrimony—the nation's inheritance. They awe foreign Powers. They arouse and animate our own people. Do gentlemen derive no pleasure from the recent transactions in the Mediterranean? Can they regard unmoved the honorable issue of a war, in support of our national rights, declared, prosecuted, and terminated by a treaty in which the enemy submitted to a carte blanche, in the short period of forty days? The days of chivalry are not gone. They have been revived in the person of Commodore Decatur, who, in releasing from infidel bondage Christian captives, the subjects of a foreign Power, and restoring them to their country and their friends, has placed himself beside the most renowned knights of former times. I love true glory, said Mr. C. It is this sentiment which ought to be cherished; and in spite of cavils and sneers and attempts to put it down, it will finally conduct this nation to that height to which God and nature have destined it. Three wars, those who at present administer this Government may say, and say with proud satisfaction, they have safely conducted us through. Two with Powers which, though otherwise contemptible, have laid almost all Europe under tribute—a tribute from which we are now exonerated. The third, with one of the most gigantic Powers that the world ever saw. These struggles have not been without their sacrifices, nor without their lessons. They have created or rather greatly increased the public debt. They have taught that to preserve the character we have established preparation for war is necessary.

The public debt exists. However contracted, the faith of the nation is pledged for its redemption. It can only be paid by providing an excess of revenue beyond expenditure, or by retrenchment. Did gentlemen contend that the results of the report were inaccurate; that the proceeds of the revenue would be greater, or the public expenses less than the estimate? On these subjects, Mr. C. said, he believed it would be presumption in him, when the defence of the report was in such able hands, (Mr. LOWNDES,) to attempt its vindication. Leaving the task to that gentleman, he should assume for the present its accuracy. He would lay down a general rule, from which there never ought to be a departure, without absolute necessity, that the expenses of the year ought to be met by the revenue of the year. If in time of war it were impossible to observe this rule, we ought, in time of peace, to provide for as speedy a discharge of the debt contracted in the preceding war as possible. This can only be done by an effective sinking fund based upon an excess of revenue beyond expenditure, and a protraction of the period of peace. If in England the Sinking Fund had not fulfilled what was promised, it was because of a failure to provide such a revenue, and because the interests of peace in that country had been too few and too short. From the Revolution to 1812, a period of 124 years, there had been 63 years of war, and only 61 of peace; and there had been contracted £638,129,577 of debt, and discharged only £39,594,305. The national debt at the peace of Utrecht amounted to £53,681,076, and during the peace which followed, being 27 years, from 1714 to 1740, there was discharged only £7,231,503. When the operations of our sinking fund are contrasted with those of Great Britain, they would be found to present the most gratifying results. Our public debt existing on the 1st of January, 1802, amounted to $78,754,568 70, and on the 1st of January, 1815, we had extinguished $33,873,463 98. Thus in thirteen years, one-half the period of peace that followed the Treaty of Utrecht, we had discharged more public debt than Great Britain had during that period. In twenty-six years she did not pay much more than a seventh of her debt. In thirteen years we paid more than a third of ours. If, then, a public debt, contracted in a manner, he trusted, satisfactory to the country, imposed upon us a duty to provide for its payment; if we were encouraged, by past experience, to persevere in the application of an effective sinking fund, he would again repeat that the only alternatives were the adoption of a system of taxation producing the revenue estimated by the Committee of Ways and Means, or by great retrenchment of the public expenses.

The Revenue.

H. or R.

In what respect can a reduction of the public expenses be effected? Gentlemen who assailed the report on this ground have, by the indefinite nature of the attack, great advantage on their side. Instead of contenting themselves with crying out retrenchment! retrenchment!—a theme always plausible, an object always proper, when the public interest will admit of it—let them point the attention of the House to some specified subject. If they really think a reduction of the Army and Navy, or either of them, be proper, let them lay a resolution upon the table to that effect. They had generally, it was true, singled out, in discussing this report (and he had no objection to meet them in this way, though he thought the other the fairest course) the Military Establishment. Mr. C. said he was glad the navy had fought itself into favor, and that no one appeared disposed to move its reduction or to oppose its gradual augmentation. But the “standing army” is the great object of gentlemen’s apprehensions. And those who can bravely set at defiance hobgoblins, the creatures of their own fertile imaginations, are trembling for the liberties of the people endangered by a standing army of 10,000 men. Those who can courageously vote against taxes are alarmed for the safety of the Constitution and the country at such a force scattered over our extensive territory! This could not have been expected, at least in the honorable gentleman (Mr. Ross) who, if he had been storming a fort, could not have displayed more cool, collected courage than he did, when he declared that he would show to Pennsylvania that she had one faithful Representative, bold and independent enough to vote against a tax!

Mr. C. said he had happened, very incidentally the other day, and in a manner which he had supposed could not attract particular attention, to state that the general condition of the world admonished us to shape our measures with a view to the possible conflicts into which we might be drawn; and he said he did not know when he should cease to witness the attacks made upon him in consequence of that general remark, when he should cease to hear the cry of “standing army,” “national glory,” &c. From the tenor of gentlemen’s observations it would seem as if, for the first time in the history of this Government, it was now proposed that a certain regular force should constitute a portion of the public defence. But from the Administration of General WASHINGTON, down to this time, a regular force, a standing army (if gentlemen please) had existed, and the only question about it, at any time, had been what should be the amount. Gentlemen themselves, who most loudly decry this establishment, did not propose an entire disbandment of it; and the question, ever with them, is not whether a regular force be necessary, but whether a regular force of this or that amount be called for by the actual state of our affairs.

The question is not, on any side of the House, as to the nature, but the quantum of the force. Mr. C. said he maintained the position, that, if there was the most profound peace that ever existed; if we had no fears from any quarter whatever; if all the world was in a state of the most profound and absolute repose, a regular force of ten thousand men was not too great for the purposes of this Government. We knew too much, he said, of the vicissitudes of human affairs, and the uncertainty of all our calculations, not to know that even in the most profound tranquillity some tempest may suddenly arise and bring us into a state requiring the exertion of military force, which cannot be created in a moment, but requires time for its collection, organization, and discipline. When gentlemen talked of the force which was deemed sufficient some twenty years ago, what did they mean? That this force was not to be progressive? That the full grown man ought to wear the clothes and habits of his infancy? That the establishments maintained by this Government, when its population amounted to four or five millions only, should be the standard by which our measures should be regulated in all subsequent states of the country? If gentlemen meant this, as it seemed to him they did, Mr. C. said he and they should not agree. He contended that establishments ought to be commensurate with the actual state of the country, should grow with its growth, and keep pace with its progress. Look at that map, (said he, pointing to the large map of the United States which hangs in the Hall of the House of Representatives;) at the vast extent of that country which stretches from the Lake of the Woods, in the Northwest, to the Bay of Fundy, in the East. Look at the vast extent of our maritime coast; recollect we have Indians and powerful nations continuous on the whole frontier; and that we know not at what moment the savage enemy or Great Britain herself may seek to make war with us. Ought the force of the country to be graduated by the scale of our exposure, or are we to be influenced by the increase of our liability to war? Have we forgotten that the power of France, as a counterpoise to that of Great Britain, is annihilated—gone; never to rise again, I believe, under the weak, unhappy, and imbecile race, who now sway her destinies? Any individual must, I think, come to the same conclusion with myself, who takes these considerations into view, and reflects on our growth, the state of our defence, the situation of the nations of the world, and above all, of that nation with whom we are most likely to come into collision; for it is in vain to conceal it, this country must have many a hard and desperate tug with Great Britain, let the two Governments be administered how and by whom they may. That man must be blind to the indications of the future, who cannot see that we are destined to have war after war with Great Britain, until, if one of the two nations be not crushed, all grounds of collision shall have ceased between us. I repeat, said Mr. C., if the condition of France were that of perfect repose, instead of that of a volcano ready to burst out again with a desolating eruption; if with Spain our differences were settled; if the dreadful war raging in South America were terminated; if the marines of all the Powers of Europe were resuscitated as they stood prior to the Revolution of France; if there was universal repose, and profound tranquillity among all the nations of the earth, considering the actual growth of our country, in his judgment, the force of ten thousand men would not be too great for its exigencies. Do gentlemen ask if I rely on the regular force entirely for the defence of the country? I answer, it is for garrisoning and keeping in order our fortifications, for the preservation of the national arms, for something like a safe depository of military science and skill, to which we may recur in time of danger, that I desire to maintain an adequate regular force. I know that in the hour of peril our great reliance must be on the whole physical force of the country, and that no detachment of it can be exclusively depended on. History proves that no nation not destitute of the military art, whose people were united in its defence, ever was conquered. It is true that in countries where standing armies have been entirely relied on the armies have been subdued, and the subjugation of the nation has been the consequence of it; but no example is to be found of a united people being conquered who possessed an adequate degree of military knowledge. Look at the Grecian Republics struggling successfully against the overwhelming force of Persia; look more recently at Spain. I have great confidence in the militia, and I would go with my honorable colleague, (Mr. McKEE,) whose views I know are honest, hand in hand, in arming, disciplining, and rendering effective the militia; I am for providing the nation with every possible means of resistance. I ask my honorable colleague, after I have gone thus far with him, to go a step further with me, and let us retain the force we now have for the purposes I have already described. I ask gentlemen who propose to reduce the Army, if they have examined in detail the number and extent of the posts and garrisons on our maritime and interior frontier? If they have not gone through this process of reasoning, how shall we arrive at the result that we can reduce the Army with safety? There is not one of our forts adequately garrisoned at this moment; and there is nearly one-fourth of them that have not one solitary man. I said the other day, that I would rather vote for the augmentation than the reduction of the Army. When returning to my country from its foreign service, and looking at this question, it appeared to me that the maximum was 20,000, the minimum 10,000 of the force we ought to retain. And I again say, that rather than reduce I would vote to increase the present force.

A standing army, Mr. C. said, had been deemed necessary from the commencement of the Government to the present time. The question was only as to the quantum of force; and not whether it should exist. No man who regards his political reputation would place himself before the people on a proposition for its absolute disbandment. He admitted a question as to quantum might be carried so far as to rise into a question of principle. If we were to propose to retain an army of thirty or forty or fifty thousand men, then truly the question would present itself, whether our rights were not in some danger from such a standing army, whether reliance was to be placed altogether on a standing army or on that natural safe defence which, according to the habits of the country and the principles of our Government, is considered the bulwark of our liberties. But between five and ten thousand men, or any number under ten thousand, it could not be a question of principle; for, unless gentlemen were afraid of spectres, it was utterly impossible that any danger could be apprehended from ten thousand men, dispersed on a frontier of many thousand miles—here twenty or thirty, there an hundred, and the largest amount at Detroit, not exceeding a thin regiment. And, yet, brave gentlemen—gentlemen who are not alarmed at hobgoblins—who can intrepidly vote even against taxes, are alarmed by a force of this extent? What, he asked, was the amount of the Army in the time of Mr. Jefferson, a time, the orthodoxy of which had been so ostentatiously proclaimed? It was true, when that gentleman came into power, it was with a determination to retrench as far as practicable. Under the full influence of these notions, in 1802, the bold step of wholly disbanding the Army, never was thought of. The Military Peace Establishment was then fixed at about four thousand men. But, before Mr. Jefferson went out of power, what was done—that is, in April 1808? In addition to the then existing Peace Establishment, eight regiments, amounting to between five and six thousand men, were authorized, making a total force precisely equal to the present Peace Establishment. It was true that all this force had never been actually enlisted and embodied; that the recruiting service had been suspended; and that at the commencement of the war we had far from this number; and, Mr. C. said, we have not now actually ten thousand men, being at least two thousand deficient of that number. Mr. C. adverted to what had been said on this and other occasions of Mr. Jefferson's not having seized the favorable moment for war which was afforded by the attack on the Chesapeake. He had always entertained the opinion, he said, that Mr. Jefferson on that occasion took the correct, manly and frank course, in saying to the British Government—your officers have done this—it is an enormous aggression—do you approve the act, do you make it your cause or not? That Government did not sanction the act; it disclaimed it, and promptly too—and, although they for a long time withheld the due redress, it was ultimately tendered. If Mr. Jefferson had used his power to carry the country into a war at that period, it might have been supported by public opinion during the moment of fever, but it would soon abate, and the people would begin to ask, why this war had been made without understanding whether the British Government avowed the conduct of its officers, &c. If the threatening aspect of our relations with England had entered into the consideration which had caused the increase of the Army at that time, Mr. C. said, there were considerations equally strong at this time, with our augmented population, for retaining our present force. If, however, there were no threatenings from any quarter, if the relative force of European nations, and the general balance of power existing before the French revolution were restored; if South America had not made the attempt, in which he trusted in God she would succeed, to achieve her independence; if our affairs with Spain were settled, he would repeat, that ten thousand men would not be too great a force for the necessities of the country, and with a view to future emergencies.

He had taken the liberty the other day to make some observations which he might now repeat, as furnishing auxiliary considerations for adopting a course of prudence and precaution. He had then said, that our affairs with Spain were not settled, &c., that the Spanish Minister was reported to have made some inadmissible demands of our Government. The fact turned out, Mr. C. said, as he had presented it. It appeared that what was then rumor was now fact; and Spain had taken the ground not only that there must be a discussion of our title to that part of Louisiana formerly called West Florida, (which it might be doubted whether it ought to take place,) but had required that we must surrender the territory first and discuss the right to it afterwards. Besides this unsettled state of our relations with Spain, he said, there were other rumors—and he wished to God we had the same means of ascertaining their correctness, as we had found of ascertaining the truth of the rumor just noticed—it was rumored that the Spanish province of Florida had been ceded, with all her pretensions, to Great Britain. Would gentlemen tell him, then, that this was a time when any statesman would pursue the hazardous policy of disarming entirely—of quietly smoking our pipes by our firesides, regardless of impending danger? It might be a palatable doctrine to some, but, he was persuaded, was condemned by the rules of conduct in private life, by those maxims of sound precaution by which individuals would regulate their private affairs. Mr. C. said, he did not here mean to take up the question in relation to South America. Still it was impossible not to see that, in the progress of things, we might be called on to decide the question whether we would or would not lend them our aid. This opinion he boldly declared—and he entertained it, not in any pursuit of vain glory, but from a deliberate conviction of its being conformable to the best interests of the country—that having a proper understanding with foreign Powers—that understanding which prudence and a just precaution recommended—it would undoubtedly be good policy to take part with the patriots of South America. He believed it could be shown that, on the strictest principles of public law, we have a right to take part with them, that it is our interest to take part with them, and that our interposition in their favor would be effectual. But he confessed, with infinite regret, that he saw a supineness on this interesting subject throughout the country, which left him almost without hope, that what he believed the correct policy of the country would be pursued. He considered the release of any part of America from the dominions of the Old World, as adding to the general security of the new. He could not contemplate the exertions of the people of South America, without wishing that they might triumph and nobly triumph. He believed the cause of humanity would be promoted by the interposition of any foreign Power which should terminate the contest between the friends and enemies of independence in that quarter, for a more bloody and cruel war never had been carried on since the days of Adam than that which is now raging in South America—in which not the least regard is paid to the laws of war, to the rights of capitulation, to the rights of prisoners, nor even to the rights of kindred. I do not, said Mr. C. offer these views expecting to influence the opinions of others; they are opinions of my own. But, on the question of general policy, whether or not we shall interfere in the war in South America, it may turn out that, whether we will or will not choose to interfere in their behalf, we shall be drawn into the contest in the course of its progress. Among other demands by the Minister of Spain, is the exclusion of the flag of Buenos Ayres and other parts of South America from our ports. Our Government has taken a ground on this subject, of which I think no gentleman can disapprove—that all parties shall be admitted and hospitably treated in our ports, provided they conform to our laws while amongst us. What course Spain may take upon this subject, it was impossible now to say. Although I would not urge this as an argument for increasing our force, said Mr. C., I would place it among those considerations which ought to have weight with every enlightened mind in determining upon the propriety of its reduction. It is asserted that Great Britain has strengthened and is strengthening herself in the provinces adjoining us. Is this a moment when in prudence we ought to disarm? No, sir. Preserve your existing force. It would be extreme indiscretion to lessen it.

Mr. C. here made some observations to show that a reduction of the Army to from four to five thousand men, as had been suggested, would not occasion such a diminution of expense as to authorize the rejection of the report, or any essential alteration in the amount of revenue, which the system proposes to raise from internal taxes, and his colleague (Mr. McKee) appeared equally hostile to all of them. Having, however, shown that we cannot in safety reduce the Army, Mr. C. would leave the details of the report in the abler hands of the honorable chairman, (Mr. Lowndes,) who, he had no doubt, could demonstrate, that with all the retrenchments which had been recommended, the Government would be bankrupt in less time than three years, if most of these taxes were not continued. He would now hasten to that conclusion, at which the Committee could not regret more than he did, that he had not long since arrived.

As to the attitude in which this country should be placed, the duty of Congress could not be mistaken. My policy is to preserve the present force, naval and military; to provide for the augmentation of the Navy; and if the danger of war should increase, to increase the Army also. Arm the militia, and give it the most effective character of which it is susceptible. Provide in the most ample manner, and place in proper depots, all the munitions and instruments of war. Fortify and strengthen the weak and vulnerable points indicated by experience. Construct military roads and canals, particularly from the Miami of the Ohio to the Miami of Erie; from the Sciota to the Bay of Sandusky; from the Hudson to Ontario; that the facilities of transportation may exist of the men and means of the country to points where they may be wanted. I would employ on this object a part of the Army, which should also be employed on our line of frontier, territorial and maritime, in strengthening the works of defence. I would provide steam-batteries for the Mississippi, for Borgne and Pontchartrain, and for the Chesapeake, and for any part of the North or East where they might be beneficially employed. In short, said Mr. C., I would act seriously, effectively act, on the principle, that in peace we ought to prepare for war—for I repeat, again and again, that in spite of all the prudence exerted by the Government, and the forbearance of others, the hour of trial will come. These halcyon days of peace, this calm will yield to the storm of war; and when that comes, I am for being prepared to breast it. Has not the Government been reproached for the want of preparation at the commencement of the late war? And yet the same gentlemen who utter these reproaches, instead of taking counsel from experience, would leave the country in an unprepared condition.

He would as earnestly commence the great work, too long delayed, of internal improvement. He desired to see a chain of turnpike roads and canals from Passamaquoddy to New Orleans, and other similar roads intersecting the mountains, to facilitate intercourse between all parts of the country, and to bind and connect us together. He would also effectually protect our manufactories. We had given at least an implied pledge to do so by the course of administration. He would afford them protection, not so much for the sake of the manufacturers themselves as for the general interest. We should thus have our wants supplied when foreign resources are cut off, and we should also lay the basis of a system of taxation, to be resorted to when the revenue from imports is stopped by war. Such, Mr. Chairman, is a rapid sketch of the policy which it seems to me it becomes us to pursue. It is for you now to decide whether we shall draw wisdom from the past, or, neglecting the lessons of recent experience, we shall go on headlong without foresight, meriting and receiving the reproaches of the community. I trust, sir, notwithstanding the unpromising appearances sometimes presenting themselves, during the present session, we shall yet do our duty. I appeal to the friends around me—with whom I have been associated for years in public life, who nobly, manfully vindicated the national character by a war, waged by a young people, unskilled in arms, single-handed, against a veteran Power; a war which the nation has emerged from covered with laurels. Let us now do something to ameliorate the internal condition of the country; let us show that objects of domestic no less than those of foreign policy receive our attention; let us fulfil the just expectations of the public, whose eyes are anxiously directed towards this session of Congress; let us, by a liberal and enlightened policy, entitle ourselves, upon our return home, to that best of all rewards, the grateful exclamation—"Well done thou good and faithful servant!"

When Mr. CLAY had taken his seat—

Mr. HOPKINSON rose and said: My participation in the counsels of the country is of such recent date, that I may feel astonishment at occurrences which excited no surprise in more experienced politicians. The course which the business now under discussion has taken appears to me to be a phenomenon in legislation. This Congress, sir, assembled after the conclusion of a war which had called for vast efforts and expenditures, and accumulated a very heavy debt. At the commencement of the session the usual committees for the arrangement of the public business were appointed, and among the rest, most prominent and most important, the Committee of Ways and Means. It was the duty of this committee to examine into the state of the finances of the nation, to make accurate estimates of its wants, a judicious examination of its means, and fairly and impartially to apply the one to the necessities of the other. The committee then appointed, in due time, and it is presumed on due consideration, made their report upon these high matters to the House, and the debate we are now engaged in arises out of that report. In the usual course of Parliamentary affairs, it was doubtless to have been expected, that the opposition, if any, to the estimates and means thus furnished by the avowed friends of the Administration, would have come from what I find is called "the Opposition." But no such thing. We, on this side of the House, sat patient and silent, prepared to take our share of the burden, and endure our portion of the suffering. As far as we can judge from the indications in our knowledge, the system then matured and delivered, would have, generally at least, been adopted and carried into operation—when, behold, the storm of opposition rises, not with the Opposition, but the declared friends and supporters of the Administration, and of those measures which have called for these extraordinary burdens and supplies! I should have supposed that these gentlemen would have been willing to forget local interests, to surrender subordinate opinions, and to unite heartily in the great work of paying the national debt, and providing for future expenditures. But, I beg it may be distinctly remembered that the first assault upon the reported system of finance, that assault which goes to its vitality, and opened a breach which others—still declared friends of the Administration—have widened, was made by the honorable gentleman from Kentucky, the Speaker of the House. A motion was made by that gentleman to reduce the land tax from three to two millions. This motion failed. Not disheartened by the defeat, he followed up the attempt by a blow infinitely more deadly to the whole scheme, by moving that the land tax should be an annual tax; while every other tax reported is perpetual, and the whole together declared to be a permanent system of taxation. In this the gentleman was successful, and so great a part as three millions of a permanent system, has assurance of existence but for a single year. If this unfortunate, and I may say ill-judged movement, shall throw the whole into confusion, and the Government is thereby embarrassed, the public faith impeached, and the public establishments pinched, let it be remembered whence these evils have flowed; let them be traced to their true source, the friends of the Administration, and not to the Opposition. When the honorable Speaker had made this first step, it was natural to expect that some other gentleman, of the same side, should be ambitious to step before him, and accordingly we find that his colleague proposes to abolish altogether this odious land tax, and strike it out of the system; and, of course, to throw these three millions upon the shoulders of those who have been, or may be, kind enough to take the rest of the burden. Is this dealing fairly and equitably by all? But, sir, the cause of wonder does not stop here; the greater wonder is yet untold. No sooner does the honorable Speaker suggest his essential, his vital change in this system of finance, than the honorable chairman of the committee, by whom it was reported, surrenders it at discretion, without an effort to defend or a struggle to preserve it. Can it be expected that we, in opposition, however well disposed, can retain our confidence in a system thus solemnly reported, as the mature work of knowledge and deliberation, and thus abandoned as if the plaything of a child? I know not the reasons which have determined the honorable chairman to this course. His intelligence and candor oblige me to believe that he can give a satisfactory explanation of it, but until it is given I must pause in my confidence. For myself, sir, I assure you most seriously, that I took my seat here with a fixed intent to give all the aid in my power to extricate the country from her difficulties, and to provide for her future support; to place the resources of the nation fairly and liberally at the disposal of those whom the people have chosen to govern them, and to suffer no feelings of my own in relation to the Administration to interfere with the conscientious discharge of my duty as an American legislator. But how must I hesitate in the course which would bring me to these results, when I find those who are appointed to lead the way, and are presumed to have all the information necessary for the purpose, halting and receding in their steps, and uncertain whether the path lies in this or in that direction; in fact differing among themselves as to the measures to be pursued! While I would watch, with double scruple and care, the uses made of the public resources by an Administration not possessing my confidence, I could by no means feel justified in withholding those resources, and suffering the Government itself to fall into dissolution. I will not let my house go to decay, because I do not like the tenant.

On the subject of the motives, the policy, and the conduct of the war; the advantages and the glory of the peace; I had hoped to hear not a syllable within these walls, and certainly never intended to make them topics of discussion. I was willing to consider the war as an evil gone by, to be remembered no more as a source of irritation and reproach, and recurred to only for its lessons of wisdom and experience. I desired to look to the country in the actual situation in which we find her; to heal the deep wounds inflicted upon her; re-animate her powers, and restore her strength. My attention has not, therefore, been for a moment turned to the numerous considerations that belong to the questions of the war and the peace. But, sir, how has this moderation, for such I must call it, been received by the honorable Speaker, who has this moment sat down. He has gone into an elaborate and animated justification—nay, eulogium of the war, and a magnificent display of the glory and advantages of the peace. And, sir, not satisfied with this, he has said the Opposition, as he calls us, has not yet challenged either; and he challenges us to do so. Sir, I feel most fully the rashness of taking up this challenge on the instant, unarmed, unprepared, and without a moment's anticipation that I should be drawn into the contest. I will, however, venture upon it, taking the gentleman's own positions for my guide; and hoping to refute him on the very points and grounds he has chosen to place himself, in relation to the gains of the peace particularly. Let me, however, premise that this peace had, and has, my hearty approbation; and most grateful I am to those who made it. God forbid, that I should reproach a measure which I solemnly and conscientiously believe snatched my country from the brink of the gulf of ruin. The Federal Government was at the last gasp of existence. But six months longer, and it was no more. Yes, sir; trust me that but for this providential peace, you and I would not be here listening to proud declamations on the glory of the war; we should have heard nothing of a Congress at this time but as a thing that was; we should have had no profound plottings about a next President; no anxious longings for federal offices. The General Government would have dissolved into its original elements; its powers would have returned to the States from which it was derived, and they, doubtless, would have been fully competent to their own defence against any enemy. Does not everybody remember that all the great States, and, I believe, the small ones too, were preparing for this state of things, and organizing their own means for their own defence? When, therefore, I speak of our desperate condition, I speak only of the General Government, and not of the country, of which I never did despair, and never can. But, sir, as I believe that the strength, prosperity, and happiness of this country essentially depend upon the maintenance of the Federal Government, can I but be grateful for an event which has preserved it? This source of approbation, however, is obviously independent of the terms of this boasted treaty, in which I see none of the advantages so boasted of; and, indeed, no excellence but the redemption from evil.

The honorable Speaker has boldly and distinctly put the question, "What have we gained by the war?" and imposed upon himself the task of exhibiting and proving those mighty gains. But, to my astonishment, the whole of his argument was exerted to prove not what we have gained, for not an item of gain was produced, but what we have not lost. In what manner any gain is to be made out of this I cannot conjecture. To begin with the fisheries. The gentleman has told us that our right in them was held under the treaty of 1873; that in the late negotiation the British Commissioners contended that, by our war, we had forfeited all the rights held under former treaties, and, among the rest, the use of these fisheries. I do not understand from the gentleman that our Commissioners assented to this doctrine, but rather that they made their objections to it. But, still, I cannot see how all this proves we have not lost the fisheries; and whether we lost them by the argument or the war, the only important fact remains unquestioned, that we have lost them. As our present inquiry, to which we are challenged, is into the gains of the war, it seems to me that the loss of the fisheries, however lost, cannot add much to the account of our gains. Thus a physician may give a most learned and unanswerable detail of the reasons why and how his patient died; but I have never heard that the argument restored him to life, or satisfied anybody that he was not dead. The honorable Speaker, however, has endeavored to comfort us for this gain, by reminding us that the same argument which deprived us of the fisheries took from the enemy the navigation of the river Mississippi, which he held under a former treaty. If this set-off were even of a sufficient value to compensate for our loss, (and one gentleman thinks it essentially more valuable,) I still cannot see how it could aid the main point of this discussion, which is, to display our gains by war, and to place the loss of the fisheries on the list. But, unfortunately for his comfort, the gentleman has been candid enough to inform us that our Commissioners actually offered to renew the Mississippi right to the British if they would renew our right to the fisheries. The offer was rejected, and proves, at least, that our Commissioners thought the fisheries worth the navigation of the river, and that the British Commissioners did not think that navigation worth the fisheries.

The next attempt made by the honorable gentleman, in displaying our gains by the war, was on the subject of the impressment of seamen—this great bone of contention. What is the argument to show that we have gained anything here? The gentleman sets out with alluding to a letter, which has appeared in the papers, and excited much clamor with some people, written by a distinguished gentleman in the Opposition, as the honorable Speaker describes him. Now, says the Speaker, the writer of this letter fully adopts and justifies the British doctrine on the subject of impressment; and if the gentlemen in the Opposition hold the same opinions, surely it is not for them to complain that the treaty has done nothing in relation to it. This is the great argument. Now, in the first place, I deny that it is fair to urge upon us, on this floor, the sentiments or opinions of a letter, by whomsoever it may have been written. I am not now called upon to express any opinion upon the principles held by the respectable writer of that letter; at present I protest against members on this floor being called upon to be judged by a document of that description. But that the honorable gentleman may have the full benefit of this circumstance, I will agree that the Opposition maintain the doctrines of that letter. What inference can be drawn from it, to prove that the treaty in question has gained anything on that subject? We have no right to complain—be it so—but is anything gained by this? Is the American seamen more secure than he was before, or the American doctrine better established? If, indeed, the gentlemen who went to war for this principle have changed their opinion of it; if they also agree with the writer of this letter on the subject, I admit their justification of a treaty, which it does not surrender, at least leaves it as it was, is full and complete; for, why should they ask a principle to be recognised in a treaty, which they are convinced is erroneous, and ought to be abandoned? But if, on the other hand, those gentlemen adhere to their old opinions; if they still deny the right to search our vessels for British sailors, and to take such as they find there; if, in short, they still hold the principles, the recognition of which was the declared cause and object of the war, then, indeed, I cannot see how a war or a treaty which has gained nothing on this point, can be considered either successful or glorious. Certainly we can reckon nothing here in our account of gains. But, we are told such a change took place in the affairs of Europe, as to stop the practice of impressment; and this is all we need be concerned about. If it be so, we owe it confessedly, not to the success of our war, or the skill of our treaty, but to a change in the affairs of Europe, over which we had no control, and for which we can honestly claim no credit. How, then, is it an item in the account of our gain by the war and the treaty? We should have had the same gain in the same way, and at the same time, if we had had neither the war nor the treaty.

The Revenue.

H. or R.

But I must beg leave to correct the honorable gentleman in this part of his argument. A mere abstinence from the practice of impressment was not all the American Government asked and contended for; but an explicit relinquishment of the principle under which it was defended. Let me refer to the official declarations of the Cabinet, that the war would be in vain, without an express recognition of our principle; let me also refer to the speeches on the floor of Congress, of the honorable Speaker himself, in which, in the strongest language, he maintains the same ground. Besides, if a cessation of the practice was all that was required, why did an arrangement fail? Why was a treaty rejected, which would have prevented the abuse of the principle, and secured us from the dangers of the practice. At least, however, says the honorable Speaker, we are in statu quo, we stand as well on this subject, as we did before the war; we have given up nothing. To this, however, I cannot assent; and, if I did, I do not see how it would prove a gain by the war. How is the fact? Do we stand as strong on this point as we did before we took up arms for it? I think not; whatever may have been the strength of our claim before the war, it is weaker now. When a nation makes this last, this dread appeal, in support of an asserted right, and then concludes the war by a voluntary treaty without obtaining the right, or any recognition of it, the right is weakened by the unsuccessful attempt, followed by a voluntary abandonment, if not of the right, at least, of any acknowledgment of it. I may liken it to the case of an individual, who brings suit for a debt he alleges to be due to him, or a piece of land he claims as his own. If, after the commencement of the trial, he prosecutes it not to the issue, but suffers a nonsuit, and gives up his suit, if not his cause, nobody will think as well of his right as before. The man who abandons the prosecution of an asserted right will excite much distrust of the right itself, and even of his own confidence in it. We do not, therefore, stand in statu quo, on the question of impressment.

The next subject of gain, introduced by the honorable gentleman as resulting from the joint operations of the war and the peace, is in relation to the islands in Passamaquoddy bay. We have lost nothing here, says he; we have merely agreed that each party shall hold in that bay what he might be possessed of at the date of the treaty; and the right be afterwards settled by Commissioners. Besides, says the honorable Speaker, we, the American negotiators, had every reason to believe that the valor and patriotism of Massachusetts would not only have rescued her own soil from the possession of the enemy, but have taken possession of the island of Grand Menan; and, in this case, we should have been the gainers by this arrangement; that, as to the first branch of this argument, we have lost nothing, because the right is not surrendered, but to be hereafter ascertained. Is it not undeniable, that we have, at least, lost the possession, which is transferred to the enemy until the right shall be determined; and all the advantages to be derived, even in the arbitration, by this possession? Has not a large portion of the citizens of the United States, in the meantime, been handed over to a new master and a new Government? and, more than all this, does anybody believe, but for this war, Great Britain would ever have troubled herself or us about those islands; or drawn into question the boundaries, as they have been received by both parties for so many years? In point of fact, therefore, in sober truth, we have, by this war and this treaty, lost the right, if hereafter it shall be decided against us; because, but for the war, it could never have been submitted to any question or decision. As to the expectations that were entertained by our Commissioners, of the conquest to be made by Massachusetts, I can see no just foundation for them. The arms and resources of all the United States being placed at the disposal of the General Government, whose duty it is to defend every State from invasion and conquest, the expectation would have been far more reasonable if it had been applied to the General Government, and not to the government of a State whose territory was occupied by the enemy. The expectation, however, apply it where you will, was disappointed; the possession of that portion of our country is lost; the right, at least, brought into unnecessary doubt and jeopardy; and, under these circumstances, I cannot reckon the result among the gains of the war.

But, leaving these matter of fact calculations, the honorable gentleman has expatiated upon a wider field of gain by the war, the glory that has been acquired. I do not exactly understand how those gentlemen who declared and produced the war, make out their claim to all the glory that was acquired by it. The war was made by the men in power—by the existing Administration, and I can trace none of the glory to their foresight, their wisdom, or their personal agency. The glory is due to the valor, the patriotism, the self-denial of our citizens, who met and repelled the dangers that surrounded them, and not to the Administration that brought them upon us; and, in many instances, perhaps a majority, the men who acquired this glory for their country were men utterly opposed to the war, to those who made it, and to the policy that produced it. Sir, I am not insensible of national glory; I hope I never shall be. It is the spring of national virtue, the source of high achievements; the people who disregard it are incapable of great actions, and unworthy of honor. But still I have never understood that the acquisition of glory is a legitimate cause of war, or an admitted justification of it, and therefore our glory cannot be taken as a gain of one of the objects of the war, which is the true point of inquiry now. In order that this blaze of glory may show the brighter by contrast, the honorable Speaker has painted in strong colors the degraded situation of our country, at the period of declaring war. Our character was sunk almost to infamy; we had become the scorn and contempt of all Europe, and there was no nation so pitiful and weak that it did not insult and tread upon us. If this be true, and I am not disposed to question it, let me ask the honorable gentleman who made it so? Washington raised the reputation of the United States to a pitch of the most envied honor, and left them covered with true glory. He is guiltless. In the hands of Mr. Adams it faded a little, but was not extinguished. Then followed Mr. Jefferson, with whom the honorable Speaker has informed us his friends came into power, and they have held it ever since, to what purpose, he has told us himself.

Thus, sir, I close the examination of the honorable gentleman's account of the gains of the war; and, be it as it is, I repeat that I heartily rejoice at the treaty he made for us; not because it is good in itself, but because it snatched us from infinitely greater evils. I have rashly ventured, on the instant, upon a reply to the argument of the gentleman, which deserved, and perhaps required, a much more deliberate and careful refutation.

Permit me now to offer a few observations on the subject of the tax immediately under consideration. I repeat my entire willingness to put the resources of the country fairly and justly, but with proper caution and accountability, at the disposal of those whom the people have chosen to trust with the administration of their affairs. It is better that unfit men should have the means necessary to govern, than that the Government should perish for want of means. I repeat, too, that if the Administration shall be drawn into any strait or difficulty for these supplies, it must not be charged on the Opposition. The first incision into the system of finance was made by the honorable Speaker himself. It has been followed up, and, as might have been expected, widened and deepened by other gentlemen, on the same side. For myself, sir, I came here to lay taxes. After so expensive a war, which destroyed all the ordinary sources of revenue, while it increased most enormously all the demands for money, it was to be expected that a system of taxation and revenue, and a pretty efficient one too, would be required. For my constituents, I am ready to grant it; and I doubt not of their approbation, provided it be formed with moderation, justice, and equality. Equality is the great essential principle of taxation. Men are not so apt to complain of quantum as of inequality. Now, in the nature of things, it is impossible that this equality can be obtained in any one tax, which necessarily must affect some of our citizens greatly, while it scarcely touches others. Equality can be produced only by a variety of taxes, judiciously applied and distributed, some of which draw upon one party of the community and some on another. Proceeding upon this principle, the Committee of Finance has reported a system comprehending a great variety of objects of revenue, and among the rest a tax upon land, amounting to three millions of dollars per annum. This tax I entirely approve of, because it is fair and just, inasmuch as, without it, many landholders in the interior will contribute but little, if anything, to the general wants; and because it is moderate, being not more than one quarter of one per cent. on the whole landed capital of the United States. But, sir, I object, most decidedly, to the modification in relation to the law introduced by the honorable Speaker, because it is unequal and unjust. If all the people of these States are equally bound for the payment of these debts, are equally bound to furnish the future supplies, why should any difference be made in the duration any more than the amount of the requisite supplies? Why should my constituents—I may say the citizens of Pennsylvania—be bound to contribute to the end, by the imposition of taxes, made perpetual, while the citizens of other States are to be exempted at the end of a year? The salt tax or stamp tax, the whiskey tax, and many others, which are perpetual, will press peculiarly on Pennsylvania, and are all perpetual; but the land tax, which reaches some of the States to the South and West, comparatively but little affected by the other taxes, shall be but for a year.

No, sir, let us embark fairly, and equally, and honestly together, in the same bark, and hold together for the whole voyage—let no one be landed and escape further duty and difficulty at the end of the first mile. If four men were united in a firm bond to pay a debt contracted for a common object, and to furnish supplies for common future interest, would it be tolerated that one should ask his companions to acquit him at the end of a year, and go on by themselves afterwards, not only to contribute their proportion, but make good his deficiency? And yet this is the precise effect of the amendment of the honorable Speaker to the report of the committee, which has made the land tax annual, while the other assessments are perpetual. Besides, this change breaks up the whole character of the report, which avows itself to be a permanent system. When, therefore, a most essential part of it, both as to principle and amount, is thus made annual, what becomes of the permanency of the system? As a ground of objection to this branch of revenue, we have heard a most violent philippic pronounced against tax gatherers—they are caterpillars; they are bloodsuckers; nay, one honorable gentleman has said, they are scoundrels. I cannot feel either the justice or policy of these attacks. In justice I do not know that they deserve it—I have no reason to believe they are more dishonest than other men exposed to the same temptations. He, through whose hands large sums of money, especially if it be public money, are continually flowing, and whose accountability is far from being rigid and precise, must be strongly armed in integrity if he never falls. But the remark applies no better in theory, and not here so often in practice, to tax gatherers, than other officers of the Government whose temptations are greater and whose accountability is less. As to the policy of this sort of abuse, I would submit it to honorable gentlemen to say whether it is wise or politic, to endeavor to bring the odium, and suspicion, and contempt of the people, upon a class of public officers, so useful and necessary to the very existence of the Government; that class of officers, too, which comes directly in contact with the people, and brings the Government into every man's house? In truth, this hostility to tax gatherers has neither justice nor policy to rest upon, but is founded on a natural aversion we all have to pay money on compulsion, and for benefits too remote to be immediately seen or felt. But, sir, I hope my political friends will pursue a more liberal course—I hope I shall never find any of them teaching the doctrine, that tax gatherers and libellers are the best reformers of a State.

Those gentlemen who oppose every internal tax, raise this clamor against tax gatherers; and of course would throw us altogether upon the foreign commerce of the country for our revenue—but is this any more satisfactory, even in this respect? Far from it—we must then listen to the assailants upon custom-house officers—we must hear of their insolence, their extortions, their frauds—the tax gatherer thrusts his hand into your pocket; and the custom-house officer ransacks your trunks and baggage—so that if charges of this sort, against the officers who must collect the revenue, are to be received in forming your system of taxation, the consequence is, that you will have no revenue at all. But, sir, armies, navies, and taxes, have been placed, again and again, in dread array before us: Are you for armies, navies, and taxes, those instruments of despotic power—the destroyers of the liberties of the people; the greedy consumers of their earnings? Yes, sir, I am for armies, navies, and taxes; and I have no more idea of a Government without them, then I have of a living and moving body without flesh, or bones, or blood. But how am I for them? how regulated? to what extent? I am for an army which shall have in truth all the physical force it professes to have; and not for a lifeless, useless skeleton, covered with epaulettes, and sashes, and sword knots: or, in other words, for an army of officers without soldiers; affording a wide field for Executive patronage and favor, but providing no substantial means of strength or defence for the country. If this abuse exists, as has been asserted, it is our duty to correct it. As to number, I would have it not so large as to be either dangerous to the liberty, or oppressive to the pockets of the people. It is our duty to take care of both these points, and we have it fully in our power to do so. The present establishment appears to me to offend in neither of these particulars; and not to be larger than is really required. As to the Navy—I would not have it disproportioned to our wants or strength; but sufficient for the defence of our coast at the commencement of a war, with a provision of means for an immediate enlargement when required. It should not be a monster, living on the bosom of the waters and devouring all the productions of the land; but large enough to maintain its high character on the most sudden emergency. As to taxes, they should neither grind the poor, nor be unjust to the rich; they should be fair and necessary; and, above all, be equally assessed upon those bound to contribute to the wants of the State. So much every Government has a right to exact from its citizens; and so much every good citizen will cheerfully afford to his Government. But the first principle in relation to the money concerns of a people, is a regular and inexorable accountability for its expenditure. Without this, no taxes will be sufficient to supply the demands of any Administration. I will conclude by explaining the course I shall take on the subject directly before the Committee. I will vote against the motion of the honorable member from Kentucky (Mr. HARDIN) because it expunges a land tax altogether from the system of revenue—I shall also vote against the resolution of the Committee of Finance, as amended on the motion of the honorable Speaker, because it introduces inequality and uncertainty in the system, which ought to be and professes to be permanent; but am perfectly willing to maintain the resolution as reported by the Committee.

When Mr. H. concluded, on the suggestion of Mr. TROOP, the resolution respecting the direct tax was ordered to be laid on the table, and the House proceeded to consider the following resolution, (the 8th,) as being more pressing in its nature:

Resolved, That it is expedient to repeal, from and after the 18th day of April next, the act entitled "An act to provide additional revenues for defraying the expenses of Government, and maintaining the public credit, by laying duties on various goods, wares, and merchandise, manufactured within the United States," passed on the 18th of January, 1815; and also the act, entitled "An act to provide additional revenues for defraying the expenses of Government, and maintaining the public credit, by laying a duty on gold, silver, and plated ware, and jewelry, and paste work, manufactured within the United States," passed on the 27th of February, 1815, from the same day.

Mr. DESHA moved to strike out so much of the resolve as proposes to repeal the duties on manufactures of jewelry, &c.; which motion was, however, negatived, being opposed by Mr. LOWNDES.

The resolution was finally agreed to, and referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, to bring in a bill accordingly.

Mr. RANDOLPH (in consequence of what had fallen from Mr. CLAY in debate) laid upon the table the following resolution:

Resolved, That it is expedient to reduce the Military Establishment of the United States.

The House then adjourned.

TUESDAY, January 30.

Mr. McLEAN, of Kentucky, presented a memorial of the Legislature of the State of Kentucky, praying that a prompt and liberal provision may be made for the widows and orphans of militia and volunteers who have been killed in battle or died in the service of the United States.—Referred.

Mr. NELSON, of Virginia, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported a bill authorizing the Judge of the circuit court for the District of Columbia to prepare a code of jurisprudence for the said District, which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. NELSON also reported a bill to alter and amend the law of costs; which was read twice, and ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. NELSON also reported a bill to amend the act conferring certain powers on the Levy Court for the county of Washington in the District of Columbia, passed the first day of July, 1812, which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the whole House to-morrow.

Mr. ROBERTSON, from the Committee on the Public Lands, reported the bill from the Senate, "authorizing the sale of a lot of ground belonging to the United States situated in the town of Knoxville and State of Tennessee," without amendment, and the bill was committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. ROBERTSON also made an unfavorable report on the petition of the Legislature of the Indiana Territory, respecting a salt spring; which was read, and concurred in by the House.

Mr. PLEASANTS reported a bill concerning Pharaoh Farrow; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed bills of the following titles, to wit: "An act for the relief of Xaverio Nandi;" "An act to increase the pensions of Robert White and Jacob Wrighter;" and "An act for the relief of Edward Barry and George Hodge;" in which bills they ask the concurrence of this House.

CAPTAIN HENLEY.

Mr. PLEASANTS, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, made a report on the memorial of Captain John D. Henley; which was read, and the resolution therein contained was concurred in by the House. The report is as follows:

The memorialist presents that, during the invasion of Louisiana by the British forces in December, 1814, he commanded the schooner Caroline, belonging to the United States, then lying at New Orleans; that, on the landing of the enemy on the 23d of December, he was requested by the American General to fall down the river, and take a position on the enemy's flank; that, in compliance with said request, the schooner fell down the river to the required position, where they opened a destructive fire on the enemy, which was continued until the Americans were so closely engaged with the British that a continuance of it would have been destructive to them as well as the enemy; that a fire of hot shot was at length opened on the schooner, by which she was set on fire, and finally blown up; that the memorialist, with his officers and crew, escaped with difficulty with their lives, and were unable to save their property, consisting of their clothing, and the nautical books and instruments of the officers, which was entirely lost, and for which they pray a remuneration from Congress.

The committee think this one of the cases of loss to which military men, both in the land and naval service, are frequently exposed; that numerous cases of the kind occurred during the late war, and must occur during all wars; that they believe there is no precedent of remuneration by Government for such losses. They therefore recommend the following resolution:

Resolved, That the prayer of the memorialist ought not to be granted.

THE REVENUE.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the subject of the revenue—the question being on the proposition to repeal the direct tax.

Mr. WRIGHT supported the abolition of the direct tax, and in a speech of considerable length, delivered his opinions on public affairs generally.

Mr. KING, of Massachusetts, addressed the Chair as follows:

Mr. Chairman, the report under consideration contains that system of revenue, for the present and succeeding years, which the Committee of Ways and Means recommends for our adoption. It is founded substantially, as was to have been expected, upon the annual report of the Secretary of the Treasury, made to the House at an early day in the session. In that report he says, if the system of 1815 should be preserved entire, there would be a deficit, for 1816, of $3,484,269, but with the modifications which he submits the deficit will be $6,484,269; and he remarks, that "the unexecuted authority to borrow money and issue Treasury notes, already provided by the acts of Congress, is sufficient to enable the Treasury to 'meet the deficit in either of these modes, and consequently no further legislative aid appears at this time to be required;' observing further, 'that the uniform experience of the Treasury evinces that the demands for a considerable portion of the annual appropriation will not be made during the year.' If, then, sir, it can be shown to the House that the estimate of expenses for 1816 be too light, or that of the revenue too low, a proportionate deduction may be made from the taxes proposed to be levied. We fortunately have received from the Secretary a report supplementary to his annual report, whereby it appears he had estimated the revenue for 1816, receivable from the customs, too low by $3,348,897. If from this excess you deduct the net amount of the land tax proposed by the resolution under consideration to be laid, to wit, $2,700,000, and also the duty from postage, which it is intended to repeal, to wit, $400,000, there will still remain $248,897 to be carried to the surplus fund. From this view, then, it appears that the land tax is not necessary. I know very well that the Secretary informs us, in his supplementary report, that he could make a very good use of this excess; but, as he can do without it, I had rather oblige the people of this country, by lightening their burdens, than the Secretary.

Let us next take a view of the estimates of expense or appropriations for 1816. I mean, sir, of this pamphlet or letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, which I hold in my hand, containing the estimates of appropriations for the service of the year 1816; and I sincerely wish that I could hold it up to the view of the whole American people; nay, I wish that each householder in this nation had one; that, next to the sacred volume, he would peruse it, to see the infinite variety of objects and persons on whom their money is lavished with the utmost profusion. I believe the States would say to you, unless you curtail their enormous expendiures, unless you correct their gross abuses in your financial department, we must dissolve this copartnership; we cannot bear the load of this establishment; we pay too dear for nominal protection and equivocal benefits. Let us approach, then, this many-headed many-limbed monster, and see if we cannot reduce or lop off some of them. First under the annual, civil, diplomatic, and miscellaneous head:

Gross amount	- - - -	$1,800,000
Estimated amount	- - - -	1,735,683

Excess in favor of the people of	- - -	64,317 which ought to be plucked as a brand from the burning.

Next deduct, from what is called the contingent or miscellaneous items	- - -	253,000
--	-------	---------

Still leaving $200,000 for these mysterious unaccounted for items; for, sir, you will please to remark, that the Secretary has, under each head, named each object and person requiring appropriation; then follows a contingent item, which is never accounted for and carrying under the different heads, from $200 to $300,000.

I would next propose to abolish the office of superintendent general of military supplies, saving - - - -

10,560

This office was an excrescence of the war, and ought to have fallen with it, or at least in one year thereafter. It cannot be necessary for your Peace Establishment; and even in war, two additional clerks in your War Department would have performed all the duty. It is now a mere sinecure.

I next propose to strike off all submissions, as they are called, except $30,000, say -

These submissions are humble requests, in behalf of the various persons employed in the offices, for an increase of their pay. The first which I see in this court calendar, is under the Department of State, it runs thus: "in consequence of the increased price of all the articles of living, the further sum of twenty-five per cent. is now respectfully submitted for the clerks of this office;" the same per cent. for the messenger of the Office of State; the same for the messenger of the Patent Office; notwithstanding the sum originally appropriated for clerks in this office is $11,340—being, the report says, "the amount appropriated for that object in 1815—including the fifteen per cent. annually allowed since 1800. I do not wish that insufficient salaries should be given to any one of your officers; no, sir, 'tis not economy. Give such compensation as will command the best talents, and those that are suitable to the various departments; dismiss from your offices all supernumeraries; retain or hire such officers as are able and willing to do their duty.

Next, under the head Medical and Hospital department, we are surprised with an item of - - - -

For what? for purchasing horses for the artillery—Medical and Hospital department, indeed! unless, indeed, they are to follow the fate of some brave horses of which we have heard so much on this floor, and for which compensation is claimed, who died of wounds received in battle. You may remember, sir, when the subject of appropriation for the last year was before the House, a similar item for the purchase of horses was contained therein, and was objected to; and can the House believe that an annual appropriation of this amount can be necessary for our Peace Establishment? Better down with the establishment altogether than to tolerate the various abuses which have crept therein. Strike from the same head half the amount ($600,000) for fortifications - - - -

300,000

The remaining half will be sufficient to complete and keep them in repair.

From the enormous amount ($1,065,224) for ordnance, and ordnance stores, arsenals, &c., deduct - - - -

The remaining $700,000 is quite sufficient, especially if a proper use has been made of the sums before appropriated to these objects; unless, indeed, you intend immediately to involve us in the horrors and expense of another war.

The next head, "Brevet officers, commanding agreeably to the fourth section of an act of July 6, 1812," strike it off -

Besides, sir, the above act was passed after your declaration of war, and peculiarly related thereto; but two of your officers, and these major generals, commanding the western and southern military districts, can be considered as commanding. Do the people of this country know, that instead of two major generals retained by the act fixing the present Military Peace Establishment, that six major generals are now receiving the emoluments of that office; and that, instead of four brigadier generals, nine are actually receiving pay and rations as such; and that there are receiving pay, by brevet rank, seven colonels, eleven lieutenant colonels, forty-one majors, and twenty captains? Could it have been the intention that the commanding officer of a company, or of a battalion, should receive pay by brevet rank? There can be but two independent commands under the law referred to. Believe me, sir, the establishment is sufficiently expensive, without devising new ways and means to render it more so. I intended, too, sir, to have proposed to strike from the estimate, "officers provisionally retained, under the regulations of May 17, 1815," I suppose, for disbanding the Army; but, not being able to procure correct information respecting these provisional officers, they remain for the present. It is, sir, a fact which ought to strike with astonishment, that, under the law fixing your Military Peace Establishment, ten thousand men are actually attached to this establishment—twelve thousand nine hundred and eighty-two officers of various kinds, and privates, including the corps of engineers—a very decent standing army in time of peace, and at an annual expense of $5,112,159. Who are to pay this and other annual burdens, amounting in the whole to $15,778,669, without including anything for payment of the principal of the public debt, of at least $110,000,000? The people will know when they shall have paid all the taxes, direct and indirect, to which they are and will continue to be subjected by these enormous expenditures.

The last head I shall propose to strike off, at present, is that of "Bounties and Premiums" - - - - -

Bounties and premiums in time of peace, when more officers and men are pressing into your service than you know what to do with! Many, very many, other retrenchments might be named.

The above amount to - - - - - $1,190,767

And, sir, rather than your land tax should be continued, and the other burdens proposed, I should say reduce your present Military Peace Establishment one-third; the annual estimated expense of it is $5 112,159; deduct the Indian department of $200,000, (for I would have you keep your faith with those Indians whom your wars have spared,) one-third of the balance is $1,450,791. The whole of these retrenchments will save to the country, annually, $2,634,458—a sum almost equal to the net amount of a land tax of $3,000,000. It would seem then, sir, that on either proceed of excess of revenue, or retrenchment of expense, the land tax is not necessary for 1816. Then, sir, as to the system of revenue for succeeding years, and for the extinguishment of the national debt, I prefer that of the Secretary of the Treasury, which proposes to add $2,000,000 only to the Sinking Fund, on the principle of that established in 1803—making the whole fund, annually applicable to the payment of the principal and interest of the public debt, $10,000,000. "At the commencement of the year 1817," the Secretary says, "it is estimated (too low, I think, by at least $5 000,000) that the principal of the public debt will amount to $110,000,000, requiring the sum of $6,150,000 for the payment of its annual interest;" apply the further sum of $3,850,000 to the reduction of the debt. These two last mentioned sums constitute the Sinking Fund of $10,000,000; "a sum," as the Secretary says, "sufficient, if strictly and regularly applied, without interruption, upon a compound principle, to pay off the whole of the funded debt in a period less than eighteen years." This plan will be sufficiently burdensome; but if you adopt that proposed by the Committee, and increase your Sinking Fund to $13 150,000, and your annual expenditures to $22,778,669, to endeavor to extinguish the public debt in less than twelve years, you will be obliged to continue a system of internal taxation too grievous to be borne.*

But, sir, to these accumulated taxes, to the land tax particularly, I have one objection, which is local in its nature—the inability of a large portion of my constituents, and of Maine, generally, to pay these taxes. Sir, I consider it the sacred duty of members to represent the situation of the different sections of the country from which they come. God forbid that I should not endeavor, however humbly, to do justice to those constituents, without distinction of party, who have done more than justice to me. This is the first wish of my heart, but I say it not to win their favor; on the contrary, I can with equal sincerity say, that if it be their wish that I should this moment retire from these walls, I should do it with infinitely more pleasure than I ever entered them. The tax of six millions, for the last year, has not yet been collected; the lists were not delivered to the collectors until this month. At this inclement season of the year, in a cold, inhospitable climate, when many of them find it difficult to procure the common necessities of life—deprived of some of their accustomed modes of obtaining a living—a part of their fisheries and lumber trade gone—thus destitute, thus oppressed, they are called upon by your tax-gatherers. Sir, they cannot, they will not, in a time of peace, continue to pay these oppressive taxes; they are bad citizens who do not attend to the wants of their households, to all the domestic charities. You must not be surprised, then, if they provide for the wants of their families before those of the Government. One of my honorable colleagues, (Mr. PARRIS,) who addressed you yesterday, gave you the same information, and other honorable gentlemen have affirmed the same of their constituents. The fact is undeniable; our citizens are impoverished by the war, with the exception of a few favored districts in the South and West, and a host of army contractors and agents of the Government, who have friends at court, and swarms of vermin generated in the corruption of the Administration.

* This imperfect view of our expenditures will give the people some idea of the pretended economy of the present Administration, and a faint idea of some of the impositions practised upon them. A comparative statement of all the money expended by the different Administrations, from the institution of the Federal Government, on the 4th March, 1789, to 31st December, 1815, will show more clearly the gross profusion, I should perhaps say corruption, of the present Administration:

But what is the real object of this overgrown, expensive, Military Establishment—of this burdensome system of duties and taxes? I think the honorable gentleman from Kentucky, (the SPEAKER,) in his eloquent speech yesterday, gave us a clue to it. War, war, is again to be the cry. And that honorable gentleman hesitated not to declare, that he considered it the true interest of this country to assist the patriots of South America; all his sympathies appear to be enlisted on their side; of the increase of our expenditures may be ascribed to the increase of our country; one-third to folly and extravagance; and the other third to corruption. By the time Mr. Madison winds up his eight years, he will round off the expenditures, during his most pacific and auspicious reign, at $150,000,000; (for the probable demands on the Treasury for 1816, the Secretary informs us, will be, including arrearages, $12,881,269.) What use he has made of a part of this enormous sum, wrung from the hard earnings of the people, or snatched "from the mouth of labor," we can be informed by John Henry, and the numerous pecuniary friends, or rather harpies of the Administration, and of the late war, to use the expression of a celebrated author, as quoted by Mr. Randolph in debate, "whose equipages glide like meteors, and whose castles rise like exhalations."

nay, more, the haughty Spaniard is to be driven from Florida; he cannot brook the imperious demand of the Don. I would advise that honorable gentleman seriously to reflect on the consequences of the late war, which he had so great an agency in producing, before he involves us in another. How does the honorable gentleman work himself up into this war fever? Where did he take this contagion? Was it on the fields of Waterloo, which he informs us he visited, that he was inoculated with this military ardor? I should have thought the purport of that bloody field would have caused very different sensations—forty thousand human beings there, sunk to rest, caused by the mad ambition of a military despot! Still, the honorable gentleman cries, "glory, glory, I do love glory," with all the enthusiasm of a Parisian mob. What is the military glory of which he is enamored; is it "the baseless fabric of a vision," or is it founded on the blood of our citizens and the treasures of our country—on the misery and distress of human beings? Is he, indeed, again ready to "cry havoc, and let slip the dogs of war;" to devour thirty thousand more American citizens; to squander one hundred millions more of treasure, wrung from the hard earnings of industry, and the distress of our people? Is he, indeed, enamored of the fame to which an Alexander, a Cæsar, a mad Swede, or a Bonaparte, are damned? Is he to be the perpetual advocate for war? Does he delight in blood?

"Curs'd is the man, and void of law and right,
Unworthy property, unworthy light,
Unfit for public rule, or private care;
That wretch, that monster, who delights in war;
Whose lust is murder, and whose horrid joy
To tear his country, and his kind destroy."

And let him remember, sir—

"That one murder makes a villain; Thousands a hero!"

But it seems that the honorable gentleman commiserates France; or rather his sympathies, I suppose, as in the case of South America, are enlisted on the side of the revolutionists of that country; writhing under the lash of the combined despots, as he calls them; and he feelingly tells us to beware of the fate of France. What, let me ask him, brought down on France, as if from Heaven, this merited chastisement? Was it not this same thirst for glory, which is consuming him—the same career of conquest to which he would urge the people of this country—a most righteous retribution, that the liberties of France, if such they can be called, should fall, as she has caused those of other nations to fall? 'Tis just they should have right for right, which they have hacked by the sword, from other nations; drop for drop of blood; life for life; till the same measure of suffering which they have meted to other nations should be meted back to them again, heaped up and running over.

The honorable Speaker has adverted to the horrid, as I call them, but glorious, as he calls them, scenes of the late war—its causes, conduct, conclusion, and consequences—and then deliberately asserts, that were it to do over again, that were we now debating, under the same circumstances in relation to this and other nations, whether or not war should be declared, his voice and his hand should again be raised in favor of it.

But a very different decision would be made by the people of this country; it may be sport to him, but it is death to them; it is their blood and their treasure which must be sacrificed in the contest. As to the principal cause of the war, impressment, the honorable gentleman says he cannot, nay, that he will not, hear the doctrine advanced on this floor, that sailors' rights have been surrendered by the peace. As to free trade, he is silent; the commercial treaty speaks volumes on this subject; but, sir, that honorable gentleman will hear—nay, shall hear, unless he leaves the Hall or stops his ears—that to him offensive doctrine, that he has by the Treaty of Peace abandoned the cause of the sailors, which he so pathetically plead on this floor before the war. Yes, sir, he was an able advocate for them here—how it was at Ghent, the treaty determines. There is no doctrine better settled than that the real grievances, or causes of war, not provided for in the Treaty of Peace, are surrendered and abandoned forever. But this part of the honorable Speaker's address has been so ably replied to by my honorable friend from Pennsylvania, (Mr. HOPKINSON,) that nothing more is necessary to be said thereon. The honorable Speaker next attempts to count the gains, and estimate the glory of the war, but he should have remembered that war is a picture made up of light and shade—dark shades, indeed; and, while he was recounting the gallant deeds of our land and naval heroes, (I don't include the Constitutional Commander-in-Chief,) he should have remembered the misery, the distress of the inhabitants; he should have cast his eyes on the ruins of your capital; he should have recollected that he was accessory, before the fact, to this work of destruction; that he assisted in lighting the torch of war, which consumed the Capitol, burnt Havre, and more than burnt Hampton, and kindled a flame on the Northern frontier, which illumined that hemisphere, and desolated some of the fairest portions of New York.

Think not, sir, that I am insensible to the renown which individuals have acquired in this disastrous conflict, though I am not sensible that your Administration have acquired any. Your Jackson, sir, was borne on the bosom of the Mississippi to victory and triumph at Orleans; may his gallant exploits, while that noble river rolls its rich contribution to the ocean, be in like manner wafted down the stream of time, till it mingles with the ocean of eternity! The fame of your Hull will survive his Constitution, and I fear that of his country; and Perry's victory of the Lake will be æra perennius; your other heroes, sir, will live in the affections of a grateful country.

The honorable gentleman next goes from the gains of the war to the benefits of the peace; let us then examine, for a moment, the Treaty of Peace, and the famous convention with England.

But he here complains that gentlemen on this side of the House have not come out on this subject. How could he expect it? It was not till Saturday last we received the information on the subject, which was laid before the Senate; indeed it was not till yesterday, when the honorable Speaker favored the House with his explanation of the business, that we understood it in all its bearings. He first informs us why Moose Island was left in the possession of the enemy; why that should be the only point to which the uti possidetis should apply; that it was confidently expected, by the Commissioners at Ghent, that the patriotism of Massachusetts would not only rescue that island from the enemy, but would also acquire the island of Grand Menon, as he calls it, but which we, in plain Yankee, call Grand Menan—to which we have claim, the former lying "in the Bay of Passamaquoddy, which is part of the Bay of Fundy," and near the American coast, and the latter more remote in the Bay of Fundy. Sir, I will persuade myself that the honorable Speaker meant to do justice to the patriotism of Massachusetts—that never has been found wanting in the hour of peril and difficulty; nay, sir, it was never impeached, and I trust in God it never will be, while the blood of our ancestors, who have nobly fought the battles of our country, circulates in the veins of their posterity. But was this expectation rational? Would any patriotism, under the same disadvantages, have achieved these conquests? It was the memorable Summer of 1814—a period of distress and alarm—which saw the Capitol of our country, and the very tomb of WASHINGTON, in the possession of the enemy—numerous fleets of that enemy, full of sailors and marines, were blockading our ports, landing and harassing our people, and destroying their property. Maine, with a seacoast of nearly three hundred miles, was peculiarly exposed to the incursions and wandering parties of the enemy. Yes, sir, that extended coast was accessible at almost every point to the enemy. I remember well, sir, the attempts of that enemy within the district which I have the honor to represent; and remember well the ardor and patriotism of the brave militia manifested on these occasions. There was no distinction of party then, sir; the contest was, who should meet the enemy soonest and repel him from our soil. What protection was afforded us, in this hour of peril and alarm, by the General Government? Was her arm raised in our defence? Were her resources employed in our favor? Far, far from it! Nay, she mocked when our danger approached. She withdrew her soldiers; yes, the very soldiers which were recruited in the bosom of the parent, were, in an hour of peril, withdrawn from her support. For what? to perish—miserably to perish, in the swamps of Canada. Yes, sir, many of the bravest sons of New England, driven by a necessity of your creating into your ranks, have fallen by the sword, disease, and famine—the bones of thousands are now bleaching on the barren heights, or mouldering in the swamps of Canada—their fate less perhaps to be pitied than the weeping monuments of their departure—their miserable parents, orphans, and widows. Bow thy Heavens, O God! and come down with divine consolation to their souls. Under these circumstances, Castine and Moose Island were taken possession of by the enemy. Castine that could not be defended with a less force than 5,000 men, and Moose Island, which lies at the mercy of the mistress of the ocean. Under these circumstances, I repeat, was it to have been expected that the militia, in one part of the country, would leave that open to the attacks of the enemy, forsake their property, their families, their household gods, and cross rivers, and march through deserts, to repel this enemy? Sir, it would not have been accomplished; it ought not to have been expected, except from the general arm. But the honorable Speaker thinks they have provided in the Treaty of Peace sufficiently for these islands: they have submitted to two Commissioners whether Moose Island, whether Eastport, one of our own towns, belong to us or not; and if these Commissioners do not agree, they are to draw up a state of the case, which the two Governments may further submit, if they please, to some friendly nation. No, sir, I consider Moose Island given up, abandoned forever; this submission is a mere cloak to hide the gross nature of the bargain. Sir, it is surrendered in part consideration of the free, exclusive navigation of the Mississippi, and our shore fisheries are thrown into the bargain. Yes, sir, the interest of the East has been sacrificed to that of the West. Why did we not hear anything of these fisheries in the negotiations at Ghent and London? The honorable Speaker informs us, that a majority of his colleagues, against his opinion, were in favor of continuing to the British a limited navigation of the Mississippi, as an equivalent for the fisheries, and for these islands, too, I suppose, for I have no doubt Great Britain would have yielded both these objects for that right—anything said by the Commissioners at Ghent to the contrary notwithstanding. But the honorable gentleman has alleged, as a reason why the fisheries did not receive more attention, that gentlemen differed as to their value; some alleging the value of the shore fishery as equal to one-third of the whole fishery, bank and shore; while others deemed it worth little or nothing. Sir, we have an evidence in the treaty, that those unacquainted with them did value them at nothing; while those who did enjoy the privilege, considered them of the greatest importance, full one-third in value of the whole fishery. The citizens of Maine were in a peculiar manner, from its proximity to them, interested in this branch of the fisheries; it was almost their daily bread to them, because it afforded them the means of providing this daily bread.

But, sir, unfortunately for the people of Massachusetts, and of New England generally, the above are not the only occasions in which their interests have been sacrificed to those of the South and West. In the commercial convention, too, with Great Britain, our lumber, and other staples of our country, have been offered up as a sacrifice to the growers of cotton; indeed, sir, the convention itself, instead, as it purports, of offering a reciprocal liberty of commerce, is a mere contract between the growers of cotton, in this country, with its manufacturers in England. Think not that I repine at the prosperity of our brethren in the South and West; far from it—we only wish to enjoy those few benefits with them. Nor, sir, are you to suppose that I impeach the integrity of the Commissioners; I highly respect their talents—of the honorable Speaker in particular, who in this debate has given us so conspicuous a proof of his talents and his eloquence. I only regret, sir, that they had not been employed at Ghent and London, in some degree, in favor of New England. I assert again, sir, and am prepared to prove, that the staple of the North has, in this convention, been sacrificed to the South and West; that, contrary to the spirit of our Constitution, that “no preference shall be given by any regulation of commerce, or revenue, to the ports of one State over those of another,” such preference has been given, by this convention, to the ports of the South. Either, sir, our Commissioners did not understand the navigation laws of Great Britain, particularly her colonial system, or they committed an unpardonable error in concluding this convention. It is indeed, sir, but an experiment for four years, and nothing but this limitation could reconcile me to it for a moment; and I sincerely wish, when the debate took place upon the treaty, we had possessed the information which the other branch did upon the subject; the debate would then have turned upon the merit and provisions of the treaty, instead of the limitation of the treaty-making power. The concession made by our Commissioners, that we had no equivalent to offer for a participation in the India trade, and the trade to the British West Indies, cannot be correct. Sir, we granted them everything, by throwing all our ports open to them, upon equal terms with our own citizens; besides, the East India trade carried its equivalent with it, in its intrinsic value and immense advantage to the British possessions there. Sir, the trade of this country is of the last importance to Great Britain; she had better throw open all her islands, and would do it, than be deprived of it. The importance of this West India trade to the northern part of this country, could not have been understood by our Commissioners; by the majority of them, at least, South of the Hudson, or, sir, had they in view to encourage the production of sugar, rum, and molasses, in the South? Whatever may be the motive, the trade is lost to us. Let us see, then, how our trade stands with the British territories in Europe under this convention. I will advert to a few items of an “An abstract of duties of Customs, paid in Great Britain in 1815,” published by order of the Senate and House. First, the article of cotton, which, before the convention, paid three pence sterling per pound, now pays but a penny, whether imported in British or American ships, from foreign countries or British colonies, being a saving of two pence on each pound. In the year ending the 30th September, 1815, there was exported from the United States to the territories of Great Britain, in Europe, 44,973,465 pounds of cotton; this, at two pence per pound, is a saving to the growers of cotton, annually, of £374,778 17 06 sterling, or $1,664,018; and, in the year ending on the 30th September, 1807, there was exported, as above, 52,180,211 pounds, making a saving to the South of $1,930,667. Well may the honorable Speaker express, as he did yesterday, his surprise, that gentlemen from the West (alluding to Mr. McKEE and Mr. HARDIN) should ask, what have we gained by the war? They have, indeed, gained the exclusive navigation of the Mississippi, and a fair market for their cotton, at the expense of New England, her shore fishery, and her staple commodities. Let us now see how our unmanufactured wood stands in the market, in the territories of Great Britain, in Europe; premising that the duties were comparatively light in 1797, under Jay's Treaty, and large quantities of our timber and lumber found a ready and good market there, particularly at Liverpool, but now, sir, oak timber imported into Great Britain, under this convention, from the United States, will pay, on fifty cubic feet, £3 01 09, while the same, imported from the British colonies in America, which can only be in British ships, pay only 5s. 6½d., and nearly in the same proportion as to other timber, boards, masts, spars, &c.; a duty, sir, which amounts to a prohibition. Some of our lumber found its way into the British West Indies, by the way of St. Bartholomews, some ports in Cuba, and a few other places, subjected, however, to a loss of additional freight and insurance from island to island; our vessels received products in return, subject to the same expense. But a heavy duty has lately been laid in Jamaica, and the same will, doubtless, be done in other British islands, as it is a part of their rigid colonial system, on all lumber, and many other articles from the United States. The ports of the world, indeed, seem fast closing upon New England; and when our own Government neglects or sacrifices our best interests, we cannot expect that foreign nations will pay much attention to them.

And it is under these circumstances of sacrifice, hardship, and distress, you demand of us new sacrifices, and impose on us grievous burdens. You do, indeed, put our patriotism to a severe test. If you expect from us an equality of distribution, we demand of you in return an equality of benefits. You must do this people justice, or they will take justice into their own hands. They wish not for a dissolution of the Union, but at the same time they know that is not the worst, the most degraded situation to which freemen may be reduced; our freedom was purchased by the blood of our forefathers, and will be defended by that of their sons.

Much has been said in this debate respecting our standing army, or as it is now called, or disguised, our Military Peace Establishment—nominally of ten thousand men, really of more than twelve thousand, officers and men. Never did I expect, sir, within your days or mine, to hear eulogies on this floor in favor of standing armies, but such has been the fact; an honorable colleague of mine, (Mr. CONNER,) whose urbanity and correct deportment are acknowledged by all, is an advocate for these armies; not, I am persuaded, sir, to an extent which would endanger the liberties of his country, but he thinks our chief dependence would be upon them; that, in the day of alarm and danger, our militia are not to be relied on. On the contrary, in the spirit of our Constitution I do consider a well regulated militia as the best security of a free State; it is the effectual defence of the nation. I should wish to see every citizen a soldier, but at the same time every soldier a citizen, and the military in complete subordination to the civil authority. But, sir, as this subject has already been noticed by the honorable gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. RANDOLPH,) and he intends to bring it immediately before the House on a motion to reduce the standing army, I will leave it, with confidence, in better hands. Since I have named that honorable gentleman, I should do injustice to my feelings, and to his merit, did I not notice the effort, the great effort, which for three days in succession he lately made on this floor, in favor of true Constitutional principles, with some exceptions, and the freedom of our country; the information communicated by him to this House, and this nation, is invaluable; he has given us the experience of a long and active political life; from the vast treasures of his mind he has brought forth things, old and new; he has laid open the folly, the corruption, the wickedness of Cabinets. What villain—high, low, rich, or poor—of importance to attract the attention of a gentleman, has he neglected to drag before an insulted people? To what merit, known to him, exerted in favor of his country, has he been insensible, or denied the meed of praise? Sir, the thanks of an humble individual are poor, indeed, but, such as they are, I most heartily tender them to him; were it in my power I would do it in behalf of this House, nay, in the name of the American people. However, sir, he will have what is of infinitely more importance to him, the approbation of his own conscience, and, I hope, of his God.

One word, at parting, with the honorable Speaker, and I have done; for what he and his political friends have done in relation to the war, its declaration, progress, and termination—they have a right, he says, to expect from the people of this country the divine benediction of "well done good and faithful servants; you have been faithful over a few things, I will make you rulers over many things." It is very true, indeed, sir, that the honorable gentleman and his friends have received even more than five talents of the people's money; but instead of even making that use of them which the servant did that received the one talent—dig in the earth and hide it—they have squandered away their Lord's money and run him in debt; are they not the wicked, slothful servants, and ought not the people to say—"cast ye the unprofitable servants into outer darkness, there shall be weeping and gnashing of teeth?" And happy, thrice happy, will it be for that honorable gentleman and his friends in the Administration, if the righteous judge of all the earth shall not, for their political sins, add the awful sentence—"Depart from me ye cursed;" but I do humbly beseech his mercy, to redeem their immortal souls from that "everlasting fire, prepared for the devil and his angels."

When Mr. K. had concluded, the Committee rose, and the House adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, January 31.

The Committee of the whole House, to whom was committed the bill making appropriations for ordnance stores, was discharged from the further consideration thereof; and it was committed to the Committee of the Whole on the report of the Committee of Ways and Means upon the subject of revenue.

The bill from the Senate "for the relief of Xaverio Nandi," was read the first time.

The bill from the Senate "to increase the pensions of Robert White and Jacob Wrighter," was read twice, and committed to the Committee on Pensions and Revolutionary Claims.

The bill from the Senate "for the relief of Edward Barry and George Hodge," was read twice, and committed to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

An engrossed bill, entitled "An act to alter and amend the law of costs," was read the third time and passed.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bills from this House of the following titles: "An act to repeal so much of an act passed on the 23d of December, 1814, as imposes additional duties on postage;" "An act to continue in force an act entitled 'An act for imposing additional duties upon all goods, wares, and merchandise, imported from any foreign port or place, and for other purposes,'" and "An act to continue in force certain acts laying duties on bank notes, refined sugars, and for other purposes;" with amendments to the two latter. They have also adopted a resolution directing a copy of the documents printed by a resolve of Congress, on the 27th of December, 1813, to be transmitted to each of the Judges of the Supreme Court. In which amendments and resolution they ask the concurrence of this House.

The amendments to the said bills were read and concurred in by the House.

A Message was received from the President, transmitting a report of the Secretary of State, and sundry documents, respecting the transactions at Dartmoor, in April, 1815.—Laid on the table.

The resolution from the Senate "directing a copy of the documents printed by the resolve of Congress on the 27th of December, 1813, to be transmitted to each of the Judges of the Supreme Court," was read the first time.

MONEY LOST BY A COLLECTOR.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a report from the Secretary of the Treasury on the petition of Henry Malcolm; which was read and referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

The report is as follows:

The House of Representatives having, by their order of the 17th of January, 1816, referred to the Secretary of the Treasury the petition of Henry Malcolm, with the documents accompanying the same, the Secretary has the honor to lay before the House the following report:

The petitioner, Henry Malcolm, was appointed the collector of the customs for the district of Hudson, in the State of New York, in the year 1795, when the district was established. It was his constant practice to remit the money which he received on account of duties in bank notes to the branch of the Bank of the United States in the city of New York, and no accident or loss occurred in consequence of this practice until the 28th of June, 1808. On that day the petitioner put under cover, addressed to the cashier of the Branch Bank, a sum of one thousand dollars in notes of the Bank of Columbia, in the city of Hudson, and delivered the packet to the postmaster of Hudson to be sent by the next mail. A letter of advice was at the same time forwarded to the cashier, which was duly received; but the money was stolen on its way, and has never been received at the Branch Bank, or passed to the credit of the Treasury. The accounting officers have refused to credit the remittance in the settlement of the petitioner's account, and he prays to be relieved by the authority of Congress.

The facts thus stated are satisfactorily proven, and serve to exonerate the petitioner from every suspicion of fraud in the course of the transaction. To entitle him, however, to the relief which is solicited, it is necessary to show that the mode of making the remittance did not transgress the rule prescribed by the Treasury Department; and, in this respect, it appears, from documents on record as well as from those which accompany the petition, that two objections have heretofore been made: 1st. That the remittance by mail was not authorized, or, if authorized, should have been guarded by cutting the bank notes in two parts, and sending the parts by successive mails. 2. That the remittance was made in the notes of the Bank of Columbia, instead of the notes of the Bank of the United States or its branches.

1st Objection. The Treasury circular, addressed to the collectors on the 14th of October, 1789, authorized the remittance of bank notes by the mail, but prescribed the mode of doing it, by requiring, among other things, that each note should be divided into two equal parts and endorsed by the collector; one-half to be sent by one post, and the other half by the next post, with descriptive lists, to the Treasurer of the United States.

But the Treasury instruction, addressed to the petitioner on the 9th of June, 1796, soon after his appointment to office, required him, in general terms, "to remit, from time to time, whatever moneys should come into his hands in payment of duties, beyond the sum necessary for drawbacks, and to pay the expenses incident to his office, to the office of discount and deposit at New York, there to be placed to the credit of the Treasurer of the United States;" and the Treasury instructions, addressed to the petitioner on the 9th of November, 1809, subsequent to the loss of the bank notes in question, directed him "to deposit in the Branch Bank, New York, the public moneys in his hands; and, if the remittance be made in bank notes, he was directed to cut them, and postpone the transmission of the second halves until the receipt of those first sent was acknowledged."

The remittance of bank notes by mail appears, then, from this review, to have been authorized by the Treasury Department. The first instruction, prescribing a mode of remitting the notes in halves, referred to remittances to be made to the Treasurer of the United States at the Seat of Government, and it was issued before the Bank of the United States and its branches were established, as well as long before the establishment of the district of Hudson. The second instruction, which directed the petitioner to make his remittances to the Branch Bank at New York, is silent as to the mode of remitting the notes in halves; and the petitioner, considering this as the ruling instruction for his official conduct, after it had been received, uniformly made his remittances of bank notes to the Branch Bank, without severing the notes, from the date of the instruction the 9th June, 1796, until the date of the instruction of the 9th of November, 1809, without encountering, as is already stated, any other loss or accident than that which is the subject of his petition.

Under these circumstances, so peculiar as to preclude any danger from the precedent of a favorable decision in the present case, it is believed that the petitioner, exonerated as he is from all suspicion of fraud, may also be justly relieved from the imputation of wilful or gross negligence.

2d Objection. If the petitioner does not suffer by the force of the first objection, it is presumed that the second objection will not be allowed to prevail against the prayer of the petition. The kind of bank notes remitted would have become an important question if the Branch Bank refused to credit them as cash in the account of the Treasurer, or if the notes had been depreciated in value. But the question now arises on a loss which would have happened whether the notes remitted were issued by the Bank of the United States or by the Bank of Columbia.

It is proper to observe, however, that the amount of the notes of the United States and its branches in circulation at Hudson was not equal to the demand for bank notes; that the notes of the Bank of Columbia circulated at par with gold and silver; that they had been constantly received in payment of duties, and remitted to the cashier of the Branch Bank at New York, who had credited them uniformly as cash, in the account of the Treasurer; and, finally, that, in a letter dated the 23d of August, 1806, the cashier, while objecting to bank notes of a particular description, expressly adds that, "if any other than notes of the banks in New York are sent, those of the Hudson Bank would be most convenient; they pass equally well, and you could get large ones."

All which, including copies of the several Treasury instructions referred to, is respectfully submitted.

A. J. DALLAS,

Secretary of the Treasury.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, Jan. 28, 1816.

THE REVENUE.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the report of the Committee of Ways and Means, on the subject of revenue.

Mr. REYNOLDS, of Tennessee, addressed the Chair as follows:

Mr. Chairman, on my motion last evening the Committee were kind enough to rise, for which I tender them my thanks. I fear, sir, they will be ill rewarded at best, but more particularly now, when indisposed. It becomes, however, my imperative duty to address you on this occasion, because my honorable colleagues and myself differ as to the vote I am about to give on the resolution now under consideration. I regret the circumstance, because they are men with whom I delight to co-operate; many of them I have been long acquainted with, and in the late contest for our sacred rights, some of them not only paid the taxes imposed with cheerfulness, but rushed to the field of battle and participated in the glory of their countrymen; I hope, however, it is an honest difference of opinion.

I am in favor, sir, generally of the reduced system of taxation as proposed by the Committee of Finance, and the direct tax, so modified, to be continued for one year. Every one admits the necessity of a revenue to be raised by some mode of taxation. And it would be well for gentlemen now to reflect for a moment how far they have already gone on the ground of this necessity. A few days ago, sir, a very large majority of the House agreed to continue the double duties, and also to continue the salt tax. Now, sir, none of these taxes affect me at all; I do not pay one cent towards the war debt, or for the restoration of the public faith and credit of this nation, unless I dip pretty deeply with the merchant. Shall it be said, sir, that I would evade the payment of the just proportion of the debt incurred by the war; for there was not a man, woman, or child, in my district, who were not in favor of that measure? Yes, sir, we were advocates of the war, and no people on the continent of America contributed more largely in support of it, according to their numbers and wealth, than they did. They fought the battles of their country, and paid an enormous and oppressive tax without a murmur.

I have also, sir, fully appreciated the remark made by the honorable gentleman from Kentucky, (Mr. McKEE,) whose good sense always makes him intelligible to every one. He admits that a direct tax is the most just and equitable, but, being opposed to all taxes, he wishes this one in particular to pass, because it reaches all classes of citizens, puts all on the alert to inquire into the necessity of such a tax; and if it is found totally unnecessary, they will, says the gentleman, soon bring their Representatives to an account. Sir, to place the question on this ground, I shall always be ready to answer to my constituents for any vote I may give in this House, with promptitude. If, however, Mr. Chairman, they have forgotten the cause of the war, hailed by them, too, as a new era of their independence; if they have already forgotten how bravely they participated in that glorious contest, in subduing a powerful savage nation, and secondly, the powerful aid they gave in defeating the veterans of Europe before New Orleans, and saving that city from their bloody grasp; if, I say, they have forgotten all these noble feelings, and those scenes of danger and of glory, and are now unwilling to support that Government that has brought them to a safe and honorable peace, then indeed I shall stand condemned before them, and be permitted to retire; but, sir, I shall retire with a conscience undisturbed. I am not, however, to be driven from a discharge of my duty by such threats. My conduct shall be judged of by a gallant and intelligent people, on whose magnanimity and justice I shall rest my defence.

I shall now proceed, sir, to a brief examination of the subject before the Committee, and also answer some of the arguments on the other side of the House. Taxation will always be unpleasant to a free people, unless you can show them that the tax is necessary, either to support the public faith and credit of the nation, or to vindicate its honor and promote the internal resources of the country; show them this, honestly and candidly point it out to them, and my word for it they will always pay cheerfully any reasonable tax imposed upon them. These incentives and those objects of American interest and honor are, in my opinion, in bright review before us. But why, sir, are we referred to the history of '98 as a case in point? Although the honorable gentleman from Virginia (Mr. RANDOLPH) has learnedly narrated the history of those times, and given you a luminous display of his political career, yet he has not thought proper, at least on this occasion, to show that they are at all analogous. Sir, what is the real history of that eventful period? It was this, sir, France was then struggling for her liberty against all the crowned heads of Europe, with England at their head, and strange to tell, but it is nevertheless the fact, that the then Administration of this country was also inclined to go with the royal corps to strangle and destroy the infant Republic of France, then in its cradle! The hue and cry was accordingly raised against France. British pirates and ships-of-war were capturing our merchantmen daily, without much noise having been made about it. The French pirates began to think they might as well participate in the plunder of American commerce as the British—they also captured some. Nothing now but war with the Directory of France would do. Taxes were imposed, and a large standing army was created. Now, sir, the people of this country knew that this pretext would not do. The American citizens had not forgotten the debt of gratitude they owed the people of France, for nobly aiding them in the sacred struggle for their independence; this was yet fresh in their minds. The nation, therefore, could not have been dragged into such a war. Besides, sir, your citizens knew that the Directory of France at that time had too much power to contend against at home, to send anything like a force to meet the American armies. Then, sir, it was not against the expenses of supporting an army your citizens complained; it was the mere pretext, without a just foundation; and against the extreme impolicy of waging such a war, the people of this country entered their solemn protest; and with these measures, together with the Sedition Law, fell the Administration that gave them birth.

Sir, what is now the situation of the country? We are not now to meet a debt created for the purpose of going to war. No, sir. It is a large and accumulated debt for being actually engaged in a state of war. No pretext here. It is in large round numbers. I shall not now stop and inquire whether it was a just or unjust war. It is sufficient for my purpose, that it was declared by the proper and Constitutional authorities of the empire, and we are now called upon to make ways and means for the discharge of the expense.

Some gentlemen think that the customs arising from tonnage will be sufficient to extinguish the debt in eighteen or twenty years; others speak of borrowing money to pay the interest. The last expedient I cannot think it would be wise to adopt. A nation never can do well that has to borrow money in time of peace. Instead of diminishing the public debt it is adding more to it. As to the revenue arising from commerce I think well of it. But I really do not think it just that the consumer should literally pay the whole debt of the nation. Besides, sir, I do not view it now as altogether a certain revenue. It depends too much on the winds and tides, and the good understanding of those nations with whom we have intercourse. All may be dashed from us in a moment, and left in the forlorn situation we found ourselves in the year 1812, when war was declared, and not a cent in your Treasury,—indeed, upwards of a million short in meeting the current expenses of that year. Are gentlemen prepared to fall back to such a state of things? Will such a course enable us manfully to meet the crisis, at no great distance, I fear, will burst upon us?

But, sir, is it not known that the mercantile world is at this moment inundated with a vast importation on hand? Perhaps there has been within these ten months more goods imported than there may be for two years to come; and, looking at the present posture of affairs with the Old World, I consider this revenue too precarious to depend alone on it for the support of a great and growing nation, and particularly to pay off large war debts in due time. I am, sir, for finding out ways and means to discharge this debt in our own times, and not saddling posterity with it. You perceive from this sentiment, that I do not adopt the principle that "a public debt is a public blessing." The debts we incur, either by errors or judicious acts, let us provide for the payment of within a reasonable time. Let the heirs receive the inheritance without encumbrance, and the world will pronounce you wise and just.

Now, sir, what is the sum we have to provide for; the old and new debt amounts to nearly one hundred and twenty millions of dollars. From the Treasury report it appears that there will be demands on that Department for the sum of $42,884,269, comprehending the gross amount of the arrearages of the War Department, and for the whole of the floating debt for the year 1816. To meet this, the revenue that will probably accrue for that year, taking into view the reduction of the direct tax, and the abolition of some other duties, will amount to $39,400,000, leaving a deficit of more than three and a half millions of dollars. Thus, sir, stands the account. Notwithstanding this, it is right to abolish some of the taxes imposed by the last Congress, that were not only unproductive, but too oppressive on industry; but what was still more alarming, a tax on knowledge.

But, sir, there is another strong reason why we should continue the direct tax for one year at least. We do not, we cannot see now the full extent of the debts against the Government. Nearly two millions are to be paid in Tennessee to the brave militia and volunteers of that State. There is still a larger sum in Kentucky, and there are considerable demands from every State in the Union. Now, an appropriation of ten millions of dollars has been made; but can any one tell the sum that will be required to meet the provisions of those bills on your table, I trust will pass this session? One of them has already passed, providing for the pay of lost property during the late war, the sum entirely unknown. The bill establishing an additional military academy, and the bill for the relief of invalids and Revolutionary soldiers, if they pass, will require an additional sum, which at present is also unknown.

Can I then, sir, in conscience vote against the resolution, when the salvation of those measures, just in themselves, and necessary, depends much on the success of the system of revenue recommended by the Committee of Ways and Means?

Mr. Chairman, I shall vote against any reduction of the Army at present, or of the Navy; and I shall now beg leave to examine this subject for a moment. As it regards the Army, I do not conceive that ten thousand regulars can ever be dangerous to eight millions of freemen. The only question is, is it expedient and proper to keep up that number in time of peace? If we examine the affairs in Europe, we shall see all is not settled in that quarter. If you will look at the papers on your table, lately received from the Spanish Minister, you have the best reasons that can be offered why your present force should be retained. But of this Spanish demand I shall examine hereafter. I consider, sir, it a very great saving to the people to have at all times a competent force to be brought out on every emergency that may happen. The voice of experience will tell us that this will be the greatest gain. It never will do in any Government, and particularly in a free one, to have people called from their homes, from the pure air they inhale, and be cooped up in camps for two or three months waiting for the approach of the enemy, as was the case at the city of Norfolk and elsewhere during the late war. And what was the sad consequence? Thousands of the bravest and finest fellows in the world died with camp disease without ever seeing the enemy. And it is a fact, that more men during the war died of disease and sickness than by the sword.

And it will eternally be the case, where the yeomanry of the country, without discipline, be obliged to be encamped for any length of time. It is totally inconsistent with their habits and mode of living. Our militia, sir, are emphatically the bulwark of your liberties; but let your armies be so organized, either with regular troops or militia previously trained and disciplined, and somewhat inured to camp duties, or to wait for the enemy and give them the first onset, and then have your militia in full vigor from their homes brought into action, and they will always give you a good account of the enemies of your country.

Let the period of their call be for a very short time, and the moment it is out discharge them, and have others marching to the tented field if necessary. And I would also wish to see the Government in funds, always to pay the militia and soldiers the moment they are discharged. In this way you will always have brave, practical patriots, and good soldiers to defend you in times of danger. Sir, from the extensive frontier we have to guard, the numerous garrisons we have to take care of, and from the appearance of the times, I do humbly apprehend that ten thousand regulars will not be too many. And I warn the Government to see speedily that there are that number now in service. And in case of a deficiency I would have it immediately made up.

I need not, sir, say anything in praise of the Navy. It has established its fame by reports more loud and effectual than anything we can utter. It is fixed on a basis as solid and as durable as the adamant rock. It would be vain to talk about it. I shall, therefore, be for a gradual increase of our navy. But not in such manner as would be felt by the people.

The present direct tax will not be oppressive upon the citizen. A man, for instance, who has real estate to the amount of $4,000, will not have to pay more than six or eight dollars per annum to his Government. The honest and industrious farmer, who has not a vast quantity of out lands, can never feel this tax—particularly when he reflects that he is contributing his share towards the honor, dignity, and credit of his own Government. But, sir, this tax may reach the great nabob and speculator, who have monopolized large tracts of country, and keep the same in the wild forest, to the great injury of the particular State in which it may lie, and also to the United States. Such pressure I shall not regret, if it becomes the means of inducing those gentlemen to bring their lands, or a part of them, into market, and receive a just equivalent from those citizens disposed to purchase, who will at once be adding new strength and wealth to the nation.

Permit me now, sir, briefly to notice some of the remarks that have fallen from my honorable friend from Maryland, (Mr. WRIGHT,) and the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. KING.) Indeed, sir, I merely intended to reply to my worthy friend from Maryland on yesterday, and to have confined myself to the single question before the Committee, until I heard the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. KING) last evening. He, sir, has lit the torch, which is now in full blaze, and will enable gentlemen to see the line distinctly drawn between us, and conduct them to their proper stand. I regret it much, sir; for I did felicitate myself on a very harmonious session. You could not perceive the first four or six weeks we sat here, any line of distinction, or any party feeling among us. Gentlemen from all sides of the House independently supported measures according to their best judgment, regardless of party. But unfortunately the mask is now thrown off. The gentleman from Massachusetts, however, must know that we shall not shrink from an investigation of the course the Administration has pursued, and to justify the war and the measures that were adopted.

JANUARY, 1816.

The Revenue.

H. OF R.

It seems the honorable gentleman from Maryland (Mr. WRIGHT) is opposed to all taxation, and would have the Government rely on tonnage altogether. I believe, sir, the gentleman is sincere in his project, and it will do very well so far as it goes. But it is sufficiently evident that it is too small and too uncertain to meet the present exigencies of the Government. I listened to the gentleman's speech with much pleasure. It was to be sure learned, so much so, that I could not for my life comprehend all of it; particularly where he wishes that the Presidential election was over a month ago. Now, sir, what has this election to do with the question before us? I presume very little. As a member of this House, I conceive I have nothing to do with it. That great and important election is, I trust, to be left to better judges than the honorable gentleman and myself—to the people of the United States.

Much has been said about my honorable friend from Kentucky (Mr. CLAY) having snuffed the carnage at Waterloo. This has been repeated often. But the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. KING) now says, he lit a torch there. Sir, the honorable gentleman certainly has, as he stated, learned a sad and melancholy lesson at the sight of that place. He saw the combination of a number of petty tyrants united to put down a great one. They have succeeded, and I lament the result. And it seems that my worthy friend is of opinion that France is down never to rise again. I differ with him in this sentiment. Sir, the blood of Marshal Ney is now reeking before high Heaven, calling aloud for vengeance, and it will fall most assuredly, sooner or later, on the heads of those who have perpetrated that foul deed. The honorable gentleman to whom I have so often referred has charged my honorable friend from Kentucky of having been accessory before the fact in burning your Capitol. Sir, that gentleman stands in need of no encomium from me. His eminent services to his country, and his undeviating patriotism, have forever endeared him to his countrymen. But as the honorable member from Massachusetts told you he looked much on the dark side of the picture, permit me again to draw your attention further to that gloomy side, and perhaps he will see the true causes which led to the burning of the Capitol of this empire. He will observe, on that dark picture, a strong and violent opposition in this House against the war, of which the honorable gentleman took a distinguished part. Their eloquence, no doubt, had some effect on the people in those regions, but it had little in the West. When he contemplates this, let him take a view of the conduct of his own dear Governor Strong, who refused to obey the calls of the General Government, in times of peril and danger, in calling out the honest and brave yeomanry of Massachusetts in defence of their country. Let him, then, cast his eyes upon the Hartford Convention. When the honorable gentleman is tired with these scenes, I would then call his attention to the affair at Queenstown. Here he will witness the militia of New York contending, on Constitutional ground, and actually disputing the point, in sight of the enemy, whether it was right to kill a British soldier on this side of the line or on the other. These sad occurrences, during the war, led to some fatal disasters; and was it not for the bright side of the picture, which I will now present to him, they might have proved dangerous to the liberties of this country. I know the gentleman delights to contemplate this side occasionally, for he has more than once complimented my friend, the hero of New Orleans, for which I tender him my thanks. The honorable gentleman will perceive, that notwithstanding the apathy the British found in the people in this quarter, the moment they saw the Capitol of the empire in flames, their soil invaded by the modern barbarians of Europe, that moment they rose in their majesty. What is the fact? Sir, the very people who were panic-struck, running from the bloody plains of Bladensburg to Montgomery Courthouse, were found in a few weeks after with their neighbors manfully defending the city of Baltimore, meeting the British in open fight, and leaving their chief to bite the ground. Need I conduct the gentleman to the scene at New Orleans? Or remind him of the empty boasts of Cockburn that he would eat his Christmas dinner in that city? Sir, they expected this as a sure prize. Indeed I have been told that they were prepared to colonize that country. How great must have been their disappointment! The eighth of January will be remembered by them as long as they are a nation, and I hope in God it will be celebrated by us as an annual day of grand jubilee. They were beat and literally mowed down. Never, in the annals of warfare, was it yet known, such a prodigious slaughter on one side, and so little on the other. Sir, the hero Jackson was there. But, much as he is entitled to the just plaudits of his country, and the admiration of posterity, yet there is a youth of whom little has been said in this place, who ought to share largely in the glory of that day—I mean the bold and intrepid youth, General William Carroll, of Nashville. Sir, it is my firm belief, that it was him and the brave volunteers and militia from the State of Tennessee who saved your city from the grasp of the invading foe, and your country from ruin and disgrace. The event could not be otherwise, for we had Providence on our side. And this youth, who has the fire and genius of a Bonaparte, and the unerring firmness of a Jackson, never, I believe, in his short but glorious career, has once failed in any enterprise he has undertaken. I hope, therefore, without detaining the Committee with a particular review of the noble and glorious deeds of valor achieved by his own countrymen at the battles of Bridge-water and Chippewa, the honorable gentleman will be contented to let his gloomy side of the picture be eternally shaded by the brilliant and glorious deeds of the late war.

The gentleman wishes that every freeholder in the Union was furnished with a copy of the annual report of the Treasurer. Sir, I join him in this respect. And I shall certainly endeavor to make it known among my constituents. They will see more clearly from this very able report the absolute necessity of adopting the measure now under consideration. But the gentleman complains that our late Commissioners of Peace have not attended sufficiently to the interest of the fisheries in the treaty. Sir, if that treaty had not been signed at that juncture of time, I ask you in what situation would the gentleman's fisheries and his constituents be at this moment? Instead of attending to complaints of this kind, we would now be probably engaged in finding out new ways and means of taxation to support a powerful army, at the head of which General Jackson, I have no doubt, would have celebrated the first day of May (after his victory at Orleans) with the citizens of Quebec. I humbly conceive, therefore, that the honorable gentleman has no just grounds of complaint against the Commissioners for the treaty they did make. On the contrary he and his people owe them a debt of eternal gratitude, the chief of whom (Mr. BAYARD) I regret is no more! I was delighted the other day to hear the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. RANDOLPH) pronounce such an eloquent eulogium on the memory of that great man. Sir, it does honor to his heart to speak in such terms of his old and powerful antagonist, with whom he had to wield the sword of argument so often in this House. That great man, sir, was the pride and boast of the American name at home and abroad, although he was a Federalist. And as long as the eloquent, patriotic, and accomplished statesman is estimated among mankind, his name will be cherished and respected by the latest generation of his countrymen. Sir, I will not say with the honorable gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. RANDOLPH,) that he would give all the glory acquired in the late war to restore the life of the celebrated and much lamented Davies, of Kentucky, but this I will say, that to have met with the late and much esteemed Commissioner in this place now, to have an opportunity of returning to him my sincere acknowledgments for his friendship to me, certain I am that it would have been the greatest gratification I ever can enjoy on this side of the grave. I beg pardon, sir, for this digression; I should not have introduced the topic, however grateful to my feelings, had not the example of the honorable gentleman from Virginia (Mr. RANDOLPH) presented the opportunity. I return the Committee my sincere thanks for the polite attention with which I have been honored. I shall now hasten to a close.

The wish the honorable gentleman from Kentucky (Mr. CLAY) expressed, that New Spain could be free, has been much sneered at in this House. Sir, I am one who most cordially join him in that wish. And I hope that day is not very distant when that country shall be free and independent.

I have said, sir, that the people whom I have the honor of representing did not murmur about the payment of taxes. It is notorious they did not. But they complained of the inequality of your direct tax, and well and justly they might, Mr. Chairman. Many of them were paying fifty-six and sixty cents to the hundred while the people of the rich and opulent county of Davidson were paying not more than twenty cents. I shall further look into this matter during the present session, and see whether there cannot be a more effectual remedy applied than heretofore. I came here, Mr. Chairman, to support the just views and measures of an Administration whom I believe to be virtuous and upright, and while under this impression, I can never abandon a course which I most solemnly consider to be the best calculated to promote the interest, honor, and prosperity of this nation.

I ask again, sir, what is our situation with Spain at this moment? Look at the correspondence on your table between the Minister of that country and your Secretary of State and you will perceive the position assumed. What does the Spanish Minister demand, sir? Why, that you should give up part of your territory without discussion as a preliminary to future negotiation, and moreover that the raising of men in Tennessee and Kentucky to join the patriots in New Spain should be immediately prohibited. Sir, I would be the last man in this House to treat foreign Ministers with disrespect on this floor. But I must be permitted to assure the House and the nation that the information the gentleman has received as it respects the raising of men in the State of Tennessee is not correct, and I believe I might vouch for Kentucky also. Sir, the people of Tennessee are too patriotic to join in any crusade against the laws of the United States. They will not do it. But make it legal for them to co-operate with the patriots, and, my word for it, they will soon give you a good account of their enemies. Sir, as a strong proof of their attachment to their country, what was their conduct towards the celebrated Burr when he was among them endeavoring to raise men for some illegal purpose?—we cannot now call it treasonable;—the Chief Justice of the United States has settled that question. But, sir, he used all his eloquent address to procure men in that State, and I pray you how many followed him? I believe not more than twenty or thirty, and these were principally boys. And those very boys, so soon as they began to suspect his designs, instantly deserted him. Sir, you need have no apprehension of treason in that quarter. One word more, and I have done. What would gentlemen have contributed to have saved this country from the disgrace of Hull's surrender and the burning of yonder Capitol? Sir, for myself, I declare, in the presence of this House and my God, that I would rather see the little property I have scattered before the winds of Heaven than experience such another shock.

When Mr. R. had concluded, Mr. CALHOUN rose.

Mr. CALHOUN commenced his remarks by observing, that there were in the affairs of nations, not less than that of individuals, moments, on the proper use of which depended their fame, prosperity and duration. Such he conceived to be the present situation of this nation. Recently emerged from a war, we find ourselves in possession of a physical and moral power of great magnitude; and, impressed by the misfortunes which have resulted from the want of forecast heretofore, we are disposed to apply our means to the purposes most valuable to the country. He hoped that, in this interesting situation, we should be guided by the dictates of truth and wisdom only; that we should prefer the lasting happiness of our country to its present ease—its security to its pleasure—fair honor and reputation to inglorious and inactive repose.

We are now called on to determine what amount of revenue is necessary for this country in time of peace. This involves the additional question, What are the means which the true interests of this country demand? The principal expense of our Government grows out of measures necessary for its defence; and, in order to decide what those measures ought to be, it will be proper to inquire what ought to be our policy towards other nations, and what will probably be theirs towards us? He intentionally laid out of consideration the financial questions which some gentlemen had examined in the debate; and also the question of retrenchments, on which he would only remark that he hoped, whatever of economy entered into the measures of Congress, they would be divested of the character of parsimony.

Beginning with the policy of this country, it ought, he said, to correspond with the character of its political institutions. What, then, is their character? They rest on justice and reason. Those being the foundations of our Government, its policy ought to comport with them. It is the duty of all nations, especially of one whose institutions recognise no principle of force, but appeal to virtue for their strength, to act with justice and moderation—with moderation approaching to forbearance. In all possible conflicts with foreign Powers, our Government should be able to make it manifest to the world that it has justice on its side. We should always forbear, if possible, until all should be satisfied that when we take up arms it is not for the purpose of conquest, but to maintain our essential rights. Our Government, however, is also founded on equality. It permits no man to exercise violence; it permits none to trample on the rights of his fellow-citizen with impunity. These maxims we should also carry into our intercourse with foreign nations; and, as we render justice to all, so we should be prepared to exact it from all. Our policy should not only be moderate and just, but as high-minded as it is moderate and just. This, said Mr. C., appears to me the true line of conduct. In the policy of nations, said he, there are two extremes: one extreme in which justice and moderation may sink into feebleness; another, in which that lofty spirit which ought to animate all nations, particularly free ones, may mount up to military violence. These extremes ought to be equally avoided; but, of the two, he considered the first far the most dangerous—far the most fatal. There were, he said, two splendid examples of nations which had ultimately sunk by military violence: the Romans in ancient time—the French in modern. But, how numerous were the instances of nations gradually sinking into nothingness through imbecility and apathy! They have not, indeed, struck the mind so forcibly as the instance just mentioned, because they have sunk ingloriously, without anything in their descent to excite either admiration or respect. I consider the extreme of weakness not only the most dangerous of itself, said Mr. C., but as that extreme to which the people of this country are peculiarly liable. The people are indeed high-minded, and therefore it may be thought my fears are unfounded. But, they are blessed with much happiness moral, political, and physical;—these operate on the dispositions and habits of this people, with something like the effects attributed to Southern climates: they dispose them to pleasure and inactivity, except in pursuit of wealth. I need not appeal to the past history of the country; to the indisposition of this people to war, from the commencement of the Government, arising from the nature of our habits, and the disposition to pursue those courses which contribute to swell our private fortunes. We incline, not only from the causes already mentioned, but from the nature of our foreign relations, to that feeble policy, which I consider as more dangerous than the other extreme. We have, it is true, dangers to apprehend from abroad, but they are far off, at the distance of three thousand miles, which prevents that continued dread which they would excite if in our neighborhood. Besides, we can have no foreign war which we should dread, or ought to fear to meet, but a war with England; but a war with her breaks in on the whole industry of the country, and affects all its private pursuits. On this account we prefer suffering very great wrongs from her, rather than to redress them by arms. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asked, if the country did forbear till it felt disgrace, whose fault was it? Not, he said, that of the administrations of Washington and Adams; for neither of them had left it so. A few words, said Mr. C., on this point. The fault was principally in neither of our several Administrations—in neither of the two great parties. It arose from the indisposition of the people to resort to arms, from the reason already assigned. It arose also from two incidental circumstances—the want of preparation, and the untried character of our Government in war. But, there were other circumstances connected with the party to which the gentleman belongs, which caused the country to forbear too long. That party took advantage of the indisposition of the people to an English war, and preached up the advantages of peace, when it had become ignominious, and until we had scarcely the ability to defend ourselves. The gentleman from Pennsylvania further said, if peace had not been made when it was, we should not have been here deliberating at this time. This assertion is an awful one, if true. If the nation was on the verge of ruin, the defects which brought it to that situation ought to be known, probed, and corrected, even if they rose out of the Constitution. But, Mr. C. said, it is an assertion that ought not to be lightly made. The effects are dangerous; for what man hereafter, with such consequences before his eyes, would venture to propose a war? If such were the admitted fact, a future enemy would persist in war, expecting the country to sink before his efforts; his arms would be steeled, his exertions nerved against us. The position was, in every view, one of such dangerous bearing on the future relations of the country, that it ought not to be admitted without the strongest proof. What, said Mr. C., was the fact? What had been the progress of events for a few months preceding the termination of the war? At Baltimore, at Plattsburg, at New Orleans, the invaders had been signally defeated: a new spirit was diffused through the whole mass of the community. Can it be believed, then, that the Government was on the verge of dissolution? No, sir; it never stood firmer on its basis than at that moment. It was true, indeed, we labored under great difficulties; but it is an observation made by a statesman of great sagacity, (Edmund Burke,) when Pitt was anticipating the downfall of France, through her finances, that an instance is not to be found of a high-minded nation sinking under financial difficulties. And it would have been exemplified in our country, had the war continued. Men on all sides began to unite in defence of the country; parties in this House began to rally on this point; and, if the gentleman from Pennsylvania had been a member at that time, he also, from what he has said, would have taken that ground. The gentleman had taken a position on this point as erroneous as it was dangerous; and, Mr. C. said, he had thought proper thus to notice it.

As a proof, said Mr. C., that the situation of the country naturally inclines us to too much feebleness rather than too much violence, I refer to the fact, that there are, on this floor, men who are entirely opposed to armies, to navies, to every means of defence. Sir, if their politics prevail, the country will be disarmed, at the mercy of any foreign Power. On the other side, sir, there is no excess of military fervor, no party inclining to military despotism; for, though a charge of such a disposition has been made by a gentleman in debate, it is without the shadow of foundation. What is the fact in regard to the Army? Does it bear out his assertion? Is it even proportionally larger now than it was in 1801 and 1802, the period which the gentleman considers as the standard of political perfection? It was then about four thousand men; it was larger in proportion than an army of ten thousand men would now be. The charge of a disposition to make this a military Government, exists only in the imaginations of gentlemen; it cannot be supported by facts; it is contrary to proof and to evidence.

Having dismissed this part of the subject, Mr. C. proceeded to consider another part of it, in his opinion, equally important, viz: What will be the probable policy of other nations? With the world at large, said he, we are now at peace. I know of no nation with which we shall probably come into collision, unless it be with Great Britain and Spain. With both of these nations we have considerable points of collision. I hope this country will maintain, in regard to both of them, the strictest justice; but with both these nations there is a possibility, sooner or later, of our being engaged in war. As to Spain I will say nothing, because she is the inferior of the two, and those measures which apply to the superior power, will include all the inferior. I shall consider our relations, then, with England only.

Peace now exists between the two countries. As to its duration I will give no opinion, except that I believe the peace will last the longer for the war which has just ended. Evidences have been furnished, during the war, of the capacity and character of this nation, which will make her indisposed to try her strength with us on slight grounds. But, what is the probable course of events respecting the further relations between the two countries? England is the most formidable Power in the world—she has the most numerous army and navy at her command. We, on the contrary, are the most growing nation on earth; most rapidly improving in those very particulars in which she excels. This question, then, presents itself: will the greater Power permit the less to attain its destined greatness by natural growth, or will she take measures to disturb it? Those who know the history of nations, will not believe that a rival will look unmoved on this prosperity. It has been said, that nations have heads, but no hearts. Every statesman, every one who loves his country, who wishes to maintain the dignity of that country, to see it attain the summit of greatness and prosperity, regards the progress of other nations with a jealous eye. The English statesmen have always so acted. I find no fault with them on that account, but rather to point it out as a principle which ought also to govern our conduct in regard to them. Will Great Britain permit us to go on in an uninterrupted march to the height of national greatness and prosperity? I fear not. But, admitting the councils on that side of the water to be governed by a degree of magnanimity and justice, the world has never experienced from them, and I am warranted in saying never will, may not some unforeseen collision involve you in hostilities with Great Britain? Gentlemen on the other side have said, that there are points of difference with that nation, (existing prior to the war,) which are yet unsettled. I grant it. If such, then, be the fact, does it not show that points of collision remain; that, whenever the same condition of the world that existed before the war shall recur, the same collisions will probably take place? If Great Britain sees the opportunity of enforcing the same doctrines we have already contested, will she not seize it? Admitting this country to maintain that policy which it ought; that its councils be governed by the most perfect justice and moderation, we yet see, said Mr. C., that, by a difference of views on essential points, the peace between the two nations is liable to be jeopardized. I am sure that future wars with England are not only possible, but I will say more, that they are highly probable—nay, that they will certainly take place. Future wars, I fear, with the honorable Speaker, future wars, long and bloody, will exist between this country and Great Britain—I lament it—but I will not close my eyes on future events—I will not betray the high trust reposed in me—I will speak what I believe to be true. You will have to encounter British jealousy and hostility in every shape, not immediately manifested by open force or violence, perhaps, but by indirect attempts to check your growth and prosperity. As far as they can, they will disgrace everything connected with you; her reviewers, paragraphists, and travellers, will assail you and your institutions, and no means will be left untried to bring you to condemn yourselves, and be condemned by others. I thank my God, they have not now the means of effecting it which they once had. No; the late war has given you a mode of feeling and thinking which forbids the acknowledgment of national inferiority, that first of political evils. Had we not encountered Great Britain, we should not have had the brilliant points to rest on which we now have. We, too, have now our heroes and illustrious actions. If Britain has her Wellington, we have our Jacksons, Browns, and Scotts. If she has her naval heroes, we have them not less renowned, for they have snatched the laurel from her brows. It is impossible that we can now be degraded by comparisons; I trust we are equally above corruption and intrigue; it only remains, then, to try the contest by force of arms.

Let us now, said Mr. C., consider the measures of preparation which sound policy dictates. First, then, as to extent, without reference to the kind: They ought to be graduated by a reference to the character and capacity of both countries. England excels in means all countries that now exist, or ever did exist; and has, besides, great moral resources—intelligent and renowned for masculine virtues. On our part our measures ought to correspond with that lofty policy which becomes freemen determined to defend our rights. Thus circumstanced on both sides, we ought to omit no preparation fairly in our means. Next, as to the species of preparation, which opens subjects of great extent and importance. The Navy must certainly, in any point of view, occupies the first place. It is the most safe, most effectual, and the cheapest mode of defence. For, let the fact be remembered, our navy costs less per man, including all the amount of extraordinary expenditures on the Lakes, than our army. This is an important fact, which ought to be fixed in the memory of the House; for, if that force be the most efficient and safe, which is at the same time the cheapest, on that should be our principal reliance. We have heard much of the danger of standing armies to our liberties—the objection cannot be made to the Navy. Generals, it must be acknowledged, have often advanced at the head of armies to imperial rank and power; but in what instance had an Admiral usurped on the liberties of his country? Put our strength in the Navy for foreign defence, and we shall certainly escape the whole catalogue of possible ills, painted by gentlemen on the other side. A naval power attacks that country, from whose hostility alone we have anything to dread, where she is most assailable, and defends this country where it is weakest. Where is Great Britain most vulnerable? In what point is she most accessible to attack? In her commerce—in her navigation? There she is not only exposed, but the blow is fatal. There is her strength; there is the secret of her power. Here, then, if ever it become necessary, you ought to strike? But where are you most exposed? On the Atlantic line—a line so long and so weak that you are peculiarly liable to be assailed in it. How is it to be defended? By a navy, and by a navy alone can it be efficiently defended. Let us look back to the time when the enemy was in possession of the whole line of the seacoast, moored in your rivers, and ready to assault you at every point. The facts are too recent to require to be painted. I will only generally state that your commerce was cut up; your specie circulation destroyed; your internal communication interrupted; your best and cheapest highway being entirely in possession of the enemy; your ports foreign, the one to the other; your Treasury exhausted in merely defensive preparations and militia requisitions; not knowing where you would be assailed, you had at the same moment to stand prepared at every point. A recurrence of this state of things, so oppressive to the country in the event of another war, could be prevented only by the establishment and maintenance of a sufficient naval force. Mr. C. said he had thought proper to press this point thus strongly, because, though it was generally assented to that the Navy ought to be increased, he found that assent too cold, and the approbation bestowed on it too negative in its character. It ought, it is said, to be gradually increased. If the Navy is to be increased at all, let its augmentation be limited only by your ability to build, officer, and man. If it is the kind of force most safe, and at the same time the most efficient to guard against foreign invasion, or repel foreign aggression, you ought to put your whole force on the sea side. It is estimated that we have in our country eighty thousand sailors. This would enable us to man a considerable fleet, which, if well directed, would give us the habitual command on our coast—an object, in every point of view, so desirable. Not that we ought, hastily, without due preparation, under present circumstances, build a large number of vessels; but we ought to commence preparation, establish docks, collect timber and naval stores, and, as soon as the materials are prepared, we ought to commence building to the extent which I have mentioned. If anything can preserve the country in its most imminent dangers from abroad, it is this species of armament. If we desire to be free from future wars, as I hope we may, this is the only way to effect it. We shall have peace then, and what is of still higher moment, with perfect security.

In regard to our present Military Establishment, Mr. C. said, it was small enough. That point the honorable Speaker had fully demonstrated: it was not sufficiently large at present to occupy all our fortresses. Gentlemen had spoken in favor of the militia and against the army. In regard to the militia, said Mr. C., I would go as far as any gentleman, and considerably farther than those would who are so violently opposed to our small army. I would not only arm the militia, but I would extend their term of service, and make them efficient. To talk about the efficiency of militia called into service for six months only, is to impose on the people; it is to ruin them with false hopes. I know the danger of large standing armies, said Mr. C. I know the militia are the true force; that no nation can be safe at home and abroad which has not an efficient militia; but the time of service ought to be enlarged, to enable them to acquire a knowledge of the duties of the camp, to let the habits of civil life be broken. For though militia, freshly drawn from their homes, may, in a moment of enthusiasm, do great service, as at New Orleans; in general they are not calculated for service in the field, until time is allowed for them to acquire habits of discipline and subordination. Your defence ought to depend, on the land, on a regular draught from the body of the people. It is thus in time of war the business of recruiting will be dispensed with—a mode of defending the country every way uncongenial with our Republican institutions—uncertain, slow in its operation, and expensive, it draws from society its worse materials, introducing into our army, of necessity, all the severities which are exercised in that of the most despotic Government. Thus compounded, our army, in a great degree, lose that enthusiasm which citizen-soldiers, conscious of liberty, and fighting in defence of their country, have ever been animated. All free nations of antiquity intrusted the defence of the country, not to the dregs of society, but to the body of citizens; hence that heroism which modern times may admire but cannot equal. I know that I utter truths unpleasant to those who wish to enjoy liberty without making the efforts necessary to secure it. Her favor is never won by the cowardly, the vicious, or indolent. It has been said by some physicians that life is a forced state; the same may be said of freedom. It requires efforts; it presupposes mental and moral qualities of a high order to be generally diffused in the society where it exists. It mainly stands on the faithful discharge of two great duties which every citizen of proper age owes the Republic: a wise and virtuous exercise of the right of suffrage, and a prompt and brave defence of the country in the hour of danger. The first symptom of decay has ever appeared in the backward and negligent discharge of the latter duty. Those who are acquainted with the historians and orators of antiquity know the truth of this assertion. The least decay of patriotism, the least verging towards pleasure and luxury, will there immediately discover itself. Large standing and mercenary armies then become necessary; and those who are not willing to render the military service essential to the defence of their rights, soon find, as they ought to do, a master. It is the order of nature, and cannot be reversed. This would at once put an adequate force in your hands and render you secure. I cannot agree with those who think that we are free from danger, and need not prepare for it, because we have no nation in our immediate neighborhood to dread. Recollect that the nation with whom we have recently terminated a severe conflict, lives on the bosom of the deep; that, although three thousand miles of ocean intervene between us, she can attack you with as much facility as if she had but two hundred or two hundred and fifty miles over land to march. She is as near you as if she occupied Canada, instead of the islands of Great Britain. You have the power of assailing as well as being assailed; her provinces border on our territory; the dread of losing which, if you are prepared to attack them, will contribute to that peace which every honest man is anxious to maintain as long as possible with that country.

Mr. C. then proceeded to a point of less but yet of great importance—he meant the establishment of roads and opening canals in various parts of the country. Your country, said he, has certain points of feebleness and certain points of strength about it. Your feebleness should be removed, your strength improved. Your population is widely dispersed; though this is greatly advantageous in one respect, that of preventing the country from being permanently conquered, it imposes a great difficulty in defending your territory from invasion, because of the difficulty of transportation from one point to another of your widely extended frontier. We ought to contribute as much as possible to the formation of good military roads, not only on the score of general political economy, but to enable us on emergencies to collect the whole mass of our military means on the point menaced. The people are brave, great, and spirited; but they must be brought together in sufficient number and with a certain promptitude to enable them to act with effect. The importance of military roads was well known to the Romans: the remains of their roads exist to this day; some of them uninjured by the ravages of time. Let us make great permanent roads; not like the Romans, with views of subjecting and ruling provinces, but for the more honorable purposes of defence, and connecting more closely the interests of various sections of this great country. Let any one look at the vast cost of transportation during the war—much of which is chargeable to the want of good roads and canals—and he will not deny the vast importance of a due attention to this subject.

Mr. C. proceeded to another topic, the encouragement proper to be afforded to the industry of the country. In regard to the question how far manufactures ought to be fostered, Mr. C. said it was the duty of this country, as a means of defence, to encourage the domestic industry of the country; more especially, that part of it which provides the necessary materials for clothing and defence. Let us look at the nature of the war most likely to occur. England is in possession of the ocean. No man, however sanguine, can believe that we can deprive her soon of her predominance there. That control deprives us of the means of maintaining our Army and Navy cheaply clad. The question relating to manufactures must not depend on the abstract principle that industry, left to pursue its own course, will find in its own interest all the encouragement that is necessary. I lay the claims of the manufacturers entirely out of view, said Mr. C., but on general principles, without regard to their interest, a certain encouragement should be extended, at least, to our woollen and cotton manufactures.

There was another point of preparation which, Mr. C. said, ought not to be overlooked—the defence of our coast by means other than the Navy, on which we ought to rely mainly, but not entirely. The coast is our weak part, which ought to be rendered strong, if it be in our power to make it so. There are two points on our coast particularly weak, the mouths of the Mississippi, and the Chesapeake bay, which ought to be cautiously attended to; not, however, neglecting others. The Administration which leaves these two points, in another war, without fortification, ought to receive the execration of the country. Look at the facility afforded by the Chesapeake bay to maritime powers, in attacking us. If we estimate with it the margin of rivers navigable for vessels of war, it adds fourteen hundred miles, at least, to the line of our seacoast; and that of the worst character, for, when an enemy is there, it is without the fear of being driven from it. He has, besides, the power of assaulting two shores at the same time, and must be expected on both. Under such circumstances, no degree of expense would be too great for its defence. The whole margin of the bay is, besides, an extremely sickly one, and fatal to the militia of the upper country. How it is to be defended, military and naval men will best judge, but I believe that steam frigates ought at least, to constitute a part of the means; the expense of which, however great, the people ought and would cheerfully bear.

There were other points, to which, Mr. C. said, he might call the attention of the Committee, but for the fear of fatiguing them. He would mention only his views in regard to our finance, as connected with preparatory measures. A war with Great Britain, said he, will immediately distress your finances, as far as your revenue depends on imports. It is impossible, during war, to prepare a system of internal revenue in time to meet the defect thus occasioned. Will Congress, then, leave the nation wholly dependent on foreign commerce for its revenues? This nation, Mr. C. said, was rapidly changing the character of its industry. When a nation is agricultural, depending for supply on foreign markets, its people may be taxed through its impost almost to the amount of its capacity. The nation was, however, rapidly becoming, to a considerable extent, a manufacturing nation. We find that exterior commerce (not including the coasting trade) is every day bearing less and less proportion to the entire wealth and strength of the nation. The financial resources of the nation will, therefore, daily become weaker and weaker, instead of growing with the nation's growth, if we do not resort to other objects than our foreign commerce for taxation. But, gentlemen say, the moral power of the nation ought not to be neglected, and that moral power is inconsistent with oppressive taxes on the people. It certainly is with oppressive taxes, but to make them so they must be both heavy and unnecessary. I agree, therefore, with gentlemen in their premises, but not in their conclusion, that, because an oppressive tax destroys the whole moral power of the country, there ought, therefore, to be no tax at all. Such a conclusion is certainly erroneous. Let us, said Mr. C., examine the question, whether a tax laid for the defence, security, and lasting prosperity of a country, is calculated to destroy the moral power of this country? If such be the fact, as indispensable as I believe these taxes to be, I will relinquish them; for, of all the powers of the Government, the power of a moral kind is the most to be cherished. We had better give up all our physical power than part with that. But, what is moral power? The zeal of the country, and the confidence in the administration of its Government. Will it be diminished by laying taxes wisely, necessarily, and moderately? If you suppose the people intelligent and virtuous, it cannot be admitted. But if a majority of them are ignorant and vicious, then it is probable a tax laid for the most judicious purpose may deprive you of their confidence. The people, I believe, are intelligent and virtuous. The wiser, then, you act, the less you yield to the temptation of ignoble and false security, the more you attract their confidence. The very existence of your Government proves their intelligence; for, let me say to this House, that, if one who knew nothing of this people were made acquainted with its

Government, and with the fact that it had sustained itself for thirty years, he would know at once that this was a most intelligent and virtuous people. Convince the people that measures are necessary and wise, and they will maintain them. Already they go far, very far, before this House in energy and public spirit. If ever measures of this description become unpopular, it will be by speeches here. Are any willing to lull the people into false security? Can they withdraw their eyes from facts menacing the prosperity, if not the existence of the nation? Are they willing to inspire them with sentiments injurious to their lasting peace and prosperity?

The subject is grave. It is connected with the happiness and existence of the country. I do most sincerely hope that this House are the real agents of the people. They are brought here, not to consult their ease and convenience, but their general defence and common welfare. Such is the language of the Constitution.

I have faithfully, in the discharge of the sacred trust reposed in me by those for whom I act, pointed out those measures which our situation and relation to the rest of the world render necessary for our security and lasting prosperity. They involve no doubt much expense; they require considerable sacrifices on the part of the people; but are they on that account to be rejected? We are called on to choose; on the one side is great ease it is true, but on the other the security of the country. We may dispense with the taxes; we may neglect every measure of precaution, and feel no immediate disaster; but in such a state of things what virtuous, what wise citizen, but what must look on the future with dread! I know of no situation so responsible, if properly considered, as ours. We are charged by Providence not only with the happiness of this great and rising people, but in a considerable degree with that of the human race. We have a Government of a new order, perfectly distinct from all which has ever preceded it. A Government founded on the rights of man, resting not on authority, not on prejudice, not on superstition, but reason. If it succeed, as fondly hoped by its founders, it will be the commencement of a new era in human affairs. All civilized Governments must in the course of time conform to its principles. Thus circumstanced, can you hesitate what course to choose? The road that wisdom points, leads it is true up the steep, but leads also to security and lasting glory. No nation, that wants the fortitude to tread it, ought ever to aspire to greatness. Such ought and will certainly sink into the list of those that have done nothing to be known or remembered. It is immutable; it is in the nature of things. The love of present ease and pleasure, indifference about the future, that fatal weakness of human nature, has never failed in individuals or nations to sink to disgrace and ruin. On the contrary, virtue and wisdom, which regard the future, which spurn the temptations of the moment, however rugged their path, end in happiness. Such are the universal sentiments of all wise writers, from the didactics of the philosophers to the fictions of the poets. They agree that pleasure is a flowery path leading off among groves and meadows, but ending in a gloomy and dreary wilderness; that it is the syren's voice, which he who listens to is ruined; that it is the cup of Circe, which he who drinks, is converted into a swine. This is the language of fiction, reason teaches the same. It is my wish to elevate the national sentiment to that which every just and virtuous mind possesses. No effort is needed here to impel us the opposite way; that also may be but too safely trusted to the frailties of our nature. This nation is in a situation similar to that which one of the most beautiful writers of antiquity paints Hercules in his youth: He represents the hero as retiring into the wilderness to deliberate on the course of life which he ought to choose. Two Goddesses approached him; one recommending to him a life of ease and pleasure; the other of labor and virtue. The hero adopted the counsel of the latter, and his fame and glory are known to the world. May this nation, the youthful Hercules, possessing his form and muscles, be inspired with similar sentiments and follow his example!

[Mr. RANDOLPH had spoken before in this debate, but the length of his first speech, which continued three days, and which it would take more than a week to write off from the reporter's brief notes, prevents its publication. The remarks which follow were in reply to Mr. CALHOUN.]

Mr. RANDOLPH said, as the gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. CALHOUN) had done him the honor to pay some attention to his previous remarks, he would show his respect for him by explaining in this way, after he had taken his seat, rather than in interrupting him whilst he was on the floor. The gentleman had, by his speech, much as (Mr. R. said) he had before respected his talents and principles, contributed in no small degree to increase the respect he entertained for his abilities, and integrity, and for the principles by which he was governed. I subscribe, continued Mr. R., in the abstract to his principles. I was not bred in the grovelling school he reprobates; I know the value of the moral power as well as the gentleman from South Carolina—and if I had been permitted by the state of my health, when on a former occasion I had exhausted my powers by an effort greater than I had supposed them capable of—if I had been permitted to continue my rambling discourse, the gentleman would have seen that I have the same contempt for grovelling, for all that is mean, popular, and eleemosynary, that any gentleman could have in this or any other assembly. I never have flattered the people, and so help me God I never will. I must say, in the abstract, I was pleased with the gentleman's speech, said Mr. R.—but, I have long believed there was a tendency in the administration of this Government, in the system itself indeed, to consolidation, and the remarks made by the honorable gentleman from South Carolina have not tended to allay any fears I have entertained from that quarter. Make this a simple integral Government, said Mr. R., and I subscribe to the doctrines of the honorable gentleman; because they are drawn from the same fountain from which I have drawn my own principles. Mr. R. said he was glad to see that the gentleman had not raked in the kennels (he would say) of democracy, for the principles of which he had formed his political creed. But, Mr. R. said, ours is not an integral Government, but a Government of States confederated together. He put it to the Committee, to the gentleman himself, whether the honorable gentleman's principles (which he had demonstrated with an ability honorable to the State he represented, to the House, and to himself) did not go the destruction of the State governments. It was not, Mr. R. said, from the preference of present good to a little self-denial, that he opposed the system of the gentleman and his political friends. I say, Mr. R. repeated, that these doctrines go to prostrate the State governments at the feet of the General Government. If the warning voice of Patrick Henry had not apprized me long ago, the events of this day would have taught me that this Constitution does not comprise one people, but that there are two distinct characters in the people of this nation. Mr. R. said he had been led heretofore to question whether the fact was so; he now believed it as much as any article of his political creed. When speaking of the value of our form of Government, the gentleman might have added to his remarks, Mr. R. said, that whilst in its federative character it was good, as a consolidated Government it would be hateful; that there were features in the Constitution of the United States, beautiful in themselves when looked at with reference to the federative character of the Constitution, which were deformed and monstrous when looked at with reference to consolidation. The gentleman was too deeply read in Aristotle, too well versed in political lore, to deny the fact. Mr. R. said he must be permitted, he trusted in so doing he should not trespass on the patience of the Committee, to notice some of the prominent positions of the gentleman.

The gentleman had set out with observing, that the policy of this country ought to correspond with the character of our Government; that that character was distinguished by justice and reason, and that, as we are disposed to do justice to all nations with whom we have any relation whatever, we ought to be in a situation to exact it. Granted, said Mr. R. The gentleman also stated, that as moderation and forbearance had a tendency to degenerate into tameness and imbecility, so, too, a domineering spirit might end in a military despotism, and inferred that we were in more danger from an abyss of forbearance, than from any disposition to climb the precipices of ambition. There, said Mr. R., I differ from the honorable gentleman. He must give me leave to say, that there is in every Government, the form of which is free, a tendency to exactly the reverse; a tendency to domination—to ambition, not of dominion at home, but among its neighbors. Mr. R. said, he would not detain the Committee with illustrations of this position. In popular Governments, he said, the popular passion was for glory, show, sensation, excitement. This it was that made Pericles, who ought to have been the benefactor of his country, the malefactor of Athens. I too, said Mr. R., like the gentleman, entertain a respect for the country from which both of us drew our blood; and, when I speak of the enormities committed by the British forces disgraceful to the country, enormities, the effects of which will never be got over, I speak of her troops and her Ministry. I cannot come to this House—I cannot go to the hustings, and pick up a little personal popularity at the expense of truth—of that respect which I, which every man descended from her loins, must bear for their great progenitors. We are to have frequent and bloody wars with England!—I believe it, said Mr. R.—I believe we are to have frequent and bloody wars with England, and that we must take means to guard against the danger. Sir, it was not one of the least objections I had to the late war—and I hope the gentleman will do me the justice to believe, that I am not disposed to rip up old wounds and make them bleed afresh—that it would lay the foundation of wars in perpetuum, between us and that country. The die is cast. The course is given to the ship, and she must hold it on; it is not for me, for you, sir, for a million of men to change it. The destiny is fixed. The die is set—a huc is given to public opinion on this side the Atlantic, confirmed, indelible; and a similar sentiment of hostility exists on the other side. Mr. R. said, he had in past days always expressed, because he had always felt astonishment at the prevalence of a spirit of hostility between two nations who had so few points of actual collision: but, he said, there was a wide difference between the state of things before and after a magazine explodes. The explosion had now taken place; and a state of things existed between this country and England, which puts it in the power of every demagogue who should wriggle himself into the Presidency, or into a seat on this floor, to light the torch of war between us and England. He knew it was impossible to avoid it. If means were to be taken to defend the Chesapeake, to defend New Orleans, to defend the whole coast of the United States, by means commensurate with the national ability, Mr. R. said, he would never go whining to his constituents, and tell them that they were not able to pay the taxes. They are able to pay taxes, said he. On whom do your impost duties bear? Upon whom bears the duty on coarse woollens, and linens, and blankets, upon salt, and all the necessities of life? On poor men and on slaveholders. When the time arrived, however, Mr. R. believed he could demonstrate that these taxes were unnecessary, even as regarded the gentleman's own plan of defence. Mr. R. was for yielding to the States these direct taxes, stamp duties, &c., when they are to be laid at all. They must be left to the States, or this consequence must follow, and it was because of that consequence that he dissented wholly from this system. The people would say, what! pay to the General Government a land tax yearly, stamp taxes, taxes on this, that, and the other, and pay taxes on the same articles too to the State governments? Yes, would be answered;—and, speaking of the State to which he belonged, it might be added, that they had managed their finances as badly as those of the United States had been managed—they had gone on increasing their expenditures without as good a reason as the gentleman had assigned in regard to the expenses of this Government. The people will say, remarked Mr. R., as Patrick Henry told you they would sooner or later say, we cannot serve two masters—we cannot worship God and Mammon—we cannot have two Governments grinding us, when one would answer, &c. This was the point to which the argument of the gentleman from South Carolina necessarily led.

A standing army, it seemed to be admitted, was not what we wanted, but a naval force. Of what value, for instance, would be even a large military force, for the defence of the country on the shores of the Chesapeake alone, cut up as it was into an hundred (he was going to say a thousand) peninsulas—containing not, as the gentleman calculated, one thousand four hundred miles of seacoast, and that, as he had said, of the worst for us and the best for an enemy in the world, but comprising more seacoast than the whole sea-line of the United States. Mr. R. said he had taken the trouble, on a late occasion, to make a calculation of the length of that coast for Virginia alone, in the presence of a gentleman from Massachusetts, who was of opinion that that State had a greater seacoast than Virginia; it appeared, on examination, that the seacoast of Virginia considerably more than doubled that of Massachusetts. He said, therefore, cut up as the country of the Chesapeake is, with bold and deep rivers, what figure would ten thousand men make in defending it, the enemy being in possession of the water? And if we had the command of the Chesapeake, what should we want with the men on shore? If we could beat our enemy out of that great sea—for it is a Mediterranean sea—we do not want the army quoad the Chesapeake.

Mr. R. said he understood the honorable gentleman to say that he would go into a great and immediate increase of our naval means, not by building ships out of green timber, but by providing everything necessary for a great marine. Will the honorable gentleman from South Carolina permit me, said Mr. R., to tell him—I do it with the most perfect respect—that with whatsoever sentiments he may go into this business, it becomes in the end nothing better than a great job? He may vote the money as a patriot, if he follows that vote through all the different ramifications of its execution, he will find it in sinecure pockets, or given for rotten timber; he will find it by the right hand received from the Treasury by the navy agent of the Government, and he will find it paid with the left hand into the pocket of the same agent—that virtuous man will not let his left hand know what his right hand doeth.

The honorable gentleman would indeed effect a great object if he would establish a system of retrenchment and reform in the different departments. When I speak of them, said Mr. R., I do not allude to the particular men now in power—I fly at no such ignoble quarry—I allude to the habits of this Government. A man, inferior in point of ability to none in this country, said to me on a late occasion—a man too who rarely says that which he is not prepared to execute and do—that, let the money supposed to be in the possession of the different departments of the Government, be actually there, he would take two millions of dollars from the Treasury, a proportion of it from every fund, and would defy the Heads of the Departments to know, not who took the money, but whether any was gone. This is the present state of accountability, said Mr. R., and if the honorable gentleman from South Carolina, or his political friends, will give us a system of rigorous accountability, and prevent that system of plunder which has been going on some time—as to the plunderers of the public, Mr. R. said, he met them on the avenue as familiarly as the lords in England are said to meet the blacklegs at the gaming table—he saw them rising from nothing by the stilts of fat contracts into sumptuous palaces;—if the gentleman from South Carolina would devise a rigorous system of accountability, it would give Mr. R. much better heart to vote with him. But he could not yield to the gentleman from South Carolina his views on the first principles of political wisdom, which he had imbibed at home at a time when that gentleman had scarcely ever turned his mind to politics at all—he meant those which respected the sovereignty of the States. If the gentleman took that key in his hand, Mr. R. said, he would unlock his political conduct. It was his policy, Mr. R. said, to stick to the States in contests arising between them and the General Government—to the people in all collisions between them and the Government, and between the popular branches and unpopular branch of the Government—he was wrong, however, he said, to call it unpopular; for, unfortunately, its popularity was that which gave to it an irresistible weight in this House and in this nation.

Sir, said Mr. R., the gentleman has met this question manfully. Shall I be pardoned if I say that the honorable gentleman handled the question in a way very different from that in which it was handled by the gentleman who preceded him? There is no more a popular than a royal road to mathematics. As the gentleman from South Carolina has presented the question to the House, they and the nation cannot have the slightest difficulty in deciding whether they will give up the States or not; whether they will in fact make this an elective monarchy. The question is, whether or not we are willing to become one great consolidated nation, under one form of law; whether the State governments are to be swept away; or whether we have still respect enough for those old respectable institutions to regard their integrity and preservation as a part of our policy? I, for one, said Mr. R., cling to them, because in clinging to them, I cling to my country; because I love my country as I do my immediate connexions; for the love of country is nothing more than the love of every man for his wife, child, or friend. I am not for a policy which must end in the destruction, and speedy destruction, too, of the whole of the State governments.

The gentleman had represented this country as contending with Great Britain for existence. Could the honorable gentleman, or any other man, Mr. R. asked, believe that we would ever have a contest with any nation for existence? No, said Mr. R., we hold our existence by charter from the great God who made this world; we hold it in contempt of Great Britain—I speak of our existence as a people politically free—I do not speak of civil freedom—I am addressing myself to one who understands these distinctions. We do not hold our right to physical being or political freedom by any tenure from Europe or any power of Europe; yet we hold our tenure of civil liberty by a precarious tie, which must be broken; for, from the disposition to follow the phantom of honor, or from another cause, this country is fairly embarked in a course of policy like that which is pursued by other governments in Europe. Finding weakness coming on him, Mr. R. said, though he had much to say, he would endeavor to gasp out another sentiment, and be done. It was this:

The gentleman from South Carolina had pointed to the consequences of a war with England, which grew out of a war with England alone, exposing the coasts of our own country, and even our firesides to destruction, threatening the ruin of our whole system of finance, the stagnation of commerce, the banishment of specie, and the complete bankruptcy of the country. Ought not these considerations, Mr. R. asked, to weigh, and to deeply weigh, on the minds of this House, and ought they not to have done before the war with that Power, the issue of which, according to the arguments of gentlemen themselves, only went to prove that we have the capacity to defend ourselves; that we could, to use a term which ought never to have been used on this floor, be kicked into a war. The view which the honorable gentleman took of this subject, said Mr. R., was single and complete. He would have roads, he said, but for military purposes; he would encourage manufactures, too, not for the reason—and I was very glad to hear it, for it is a reason which, in my opinion, would not weigh with any man of sense—not for the reason of the petitions of the manufacturers, but with a view to their military consequence! The honorable gentleman will do nothing but with a view to military effect. Are we, sir, to become a great naval Power, because, forsooth, an admiral was never saluted as an emperor? I too, sir, am an advocate for roads and canals; I too would like to see roads through the country, which might facilitate the march of armies; but

I see in this very feature of the gentleman's system the same danger to the State confederacies as I see, sir, in the whole speech of the honorable gentleman.

Mr. R. then took his seat, and Mr. Ross spoke against the continuation of the tax, when, on motion of Mr. TUCKER, the House adjourned.

THURSDAY, February 1.

Mr. BROOKS presented the petition of Abigail O'Flynn, praying that land warrants may be issued to her for the services of her husband and three sons, as soldiers of the Army; which warrants are withheld because her said husband was "over age," her son Edmund "under age," and her sons Patrick and Elijah, in consequence of their gallant conduct, were promoted to commissioned officers, in which capacity one of them was killed in battle, and the other lately died, both without issue.—Referred to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. LOWNDES, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported a bill to repeal the duties on certain articles manufactured within the United States; which was read twice, and committed to the Committee of the Whole on the report of the Committee of Ways and Means upon the subject of revenue.

On motion of Mr. INGHAM, the committee appointed on the 29th of January, to investigate the conduct of the General Post Office Department, were granted power to send for persons and papers.

The bill from the Senate "for the relief of Xaverio Nandi, was read the second time, and referred to the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures.

The resolution from the Senate "directing a copy of the documents printed by a resolve of Congress, on the 27th of December, 1813, to be transmitted to each of the Judges of the Supreme Court," was read the second and third time; and passed.

THE REVENUE.

The House, in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the revenue subject.

Mr. TUCKER spoke as follows:

Mr. Chairman, I should be without an apology for troubling the Committee with my remarks on the report of the Committee of Ways and Means, and in support of the propriety of retaining a part of the direct tax, if it was not afforded by the division which exists in the State which I have the honor, in part, to represent, in relation to that important subject. Thus circumstanced, however, I ask the attention of the Committee while I submit my views of the state of the nation, and of the imperious duty of retaining a vigorous system of finance in the present situation of our country. I beg the Committee, however, to be assured, that I do not intend to cover the ground which has been already so ably occupied by the gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. CALHOUN.) I shall not venture to touch what he has treated, lest I should diminish the force of that impression.

which his frank, manly, liberal, and comprehensive remarks, have left upon the minds of the Committee. His able and expanded view of the real policy of this nation, and the watchful sagacity of the gentleman from Virginia, ever on the alert in defence of his beloved State rights, have given an interesting character to the debate, well worthy of the important matter which it embraces. It is, indeed, an important debate; it is, indeed, an important question on which we are now to pronounce. It is the most interesting crisis which has for a long time engaged the feelings of the representatives of the nation. We are called upon at this moment, when events of a gloomy and an anxious period are fresh in our recollections, to decide whether we shall learn wisdom from the lessons of experience; or, closing our eyes upon the past, shall suffer our country to remain without money, without credit, without arms, without defence, without the means of rendering her rights respected abroad, or of making her character an object of veneration at home. A new era—an important epoch has arrived in our national history. We have just emerged from a season of danger and turbulence; we have just been restored to the blessings of peace, after the difficulties and embarrassments of a war of three years; and we are now to decide whether we shall, in time, prepare for the hour of adversity, or content ourselves with permitting the country to remain without the means of protection, should a foreign enemy once more venture upon its invasion. On such an occasion it behooves us to act with more than usual calmness, and to divest ourselves of all pride of opinion before we pronounce an ultimate decision. It has been in vain, indeed, that during the war we have freely sacrificed our fortunes and our ease, and hazarded our lives in the field or in the camp, if, upon the termination of this arduous contest, we are not willing to perform the more difficult and more important duty of sacrificing our pride of opinion upon the altar of our country's good.

Looking then to the past, not with a design to draw from thence subjects of contention and irritation, but with the praiseworthy view suggested by the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. SERGEANT) some time ago, of deriving lessons for the future; and what, let me ask, does it inculcate? The great, the important lesson, which all mankind must learn, of preparing in the moment of prosperity for the hour of peril. At the commencement of the late war, what was our state of preparation? We were without the means of defence, without money, without credit. Troops were only to be raised at an immense expense; money could scarcely be commanded at ruinous usury. Defeat for a long time attended the arms of the United States, because we had entered upon the war without the necessary preparation. And though the glories of the latter part of the conflict have not only obliterated the disgraces of the first campaigns, but will forever emblazon the page of faithful history, yet no man can ever look back to the state of our affairs last winter, when, amidst the embarrassments of our Treasury, every patriotic bosom throbbed with an anxiety for the public weal, without resolving in his own heart to use his efforts, however feeble, to avoid a similar recurrence. And yet this is precisely, I conceive, the matter now in question: Shall we pay the debt now pressing upon the nation; shall we increase the essential power of the country by discharging its burden; shall we garrison our forts, improve our fortifications, preserve the military art, increase gradually the navy of the Union, and strengthen our means of defence? Or shall we sink again into languor and lethargy; relax our exertions, become a prey to our love of ease, and indulge our propensity to avoid the taxes necessary to pay off our debts, by leaving that debt as a burden upon our children? Here, then, is the important matter of this debate.

It has always seemed to me, Mr. Chairman, that the real question to be solved in relation to the policy of this country is, "How far we can, in 'time of peace, prepare for war; in time of prosperity prepare for adversity, without burdening 'improperly the industry of the nation, or repressing its energy by systems of taxation.'" It is, indeed, but analogous with the common maxims of prudence which govern the affairs of life. The man who, in the moment of success, in the full tide of prosperity and fortune, shall forget that the day of adversity may come upon him, and shall fail to provide against the storm, is unworthy of that gift of foresight which is the great prerogative of man. Nor does he deserve a seat in the great councils of a nation, who shall permit a timorous and niggardly policy to frighten him from the observance of a great principle of political wisdom, enforced by authority of the wisest statesmen in every age. I need mention but one; I need only allude to the man whose name has been repeatedly introduced into this debate by the honorable gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. RANDOLPH.) I mean General WASHINGTON—clarum atque venerabile nomen!—a man, whose experience has transmitted to us the valuable lesson that I am thus feebly endeavoring to inculcate.

So strikingly, indeed, has the policy of preparing, in time of peace, the means of defence for the country in the event of war, been manifested by the occurrences of the last three years, that I may venture to pronounce that the great mass of the community would unhesitatingly retain the taxes, even in their present extent, rather than see our country unprotected, all military science disappearing, our forts falling into ruins, and our gallant navy rotting in our docks. Where is the man to be found, that would prefer the continuance of the present debt, the annual payment of its heavy interest, and transmission of the burden of the principal to our children, rather than bear for a while a tax, which, as I shall show, cannot operate oppressively? We know little of the people of this country, if we imagine such to be their temper. Those who have been so liberal of their lives are not disposed to refuse the aid of their fortunes, and, if necessity required, I have no doubt they would pay without a murmur the tax as it at present stands. But this we do not ask of them; we are willing to reduce it to one-half its present amount, and feel assured that our constituents will be entirely satisfied with such a reduction.

The report of the Committee of Ways and Means, which is under discussion, is founded upon that just, liberal, and wise policy, which it is our duty to pursue. It contemplates a revenue that will be adequate to the necessities of the nation, and which, at the same time, will not be burdensome to the people. It contemplates a revenue that will enable us to discharge the national debt in twelve or thirteen years; that will justify us in retaining the present military force for the purpose of garrisoning the forts of the United States, and permit us gradually to increase our navy—the glory and boast of the nation. I am not ashamed, Mr. Chairman, to speak of national glory. I love national glory (properly understood) as much as the honorable gentleman from South Carolina. I do not mean that false glory, which consists in foreign wars and foreign conquests; that false glory, which triumphs in the wretchedness of mankind, and waves the sword of desolation over prostrate millions; but I mean the glory of being able to protect our country and our rights from every invader. There is no national glory in suffering our coasts to be ravaged, and our capital reduced to ashes, because we have been backward in providing the means of their protection. There is no glory in a nation's submitting to every invasion of its rights, because it wants the spirit to defend them, or the liberality to pay for their defence. This is not national glory—it is national disgrace; and to avoid such ignominy for the future, I, on the part of my constituents, am content to retain a portion of the public burdens, for the laudable purposes contemplated by the Committee of Ways and Means.

This report has been very warmly attacked, and particularly in relation to that part of it which relates to the Army Establishment. At one time it is contended that the army is too large, at another it is said to be too small; it is at first pronounced not only to be dangerous, but even fatal to public liberty. It is then said to be too small; that it can afford no essential service to the nation, and that the real defence of this country is in the militia. Strange, indeed, that this force, which is too small to defend the land, should be able to enslave it; that an army, which is pronounced (and properly pronounced) to be inferior to the whole body of the militia, should be capable of overwhelming them. Strange, that a scattered body of about eight thousand men should be considered dangerous to seven millions of people.

To any reflecting mind, it must at once appear that there can be no danger to the liberty of the country from such an establishment; scattered over this immense continent, along a frontier in circumference six thousand miles; the mind must be visionary indeed, which dwells upon their existence with serious apprehension. The same consideration of the extensiveness of our frontier sufficiently evinces, that they are not too numerous for the necessities of the nation. They are wanted for the purpose of garrisoning and preserving the forts, which it would be unpardonable extravagance to suffer to go to ruin, whilst they will always keep alive some knowledge of the military art, and form the basis of an army in the event of another war.

But it is contended, that the report of the Committee is anti-republican, because it recommends the retention of a standing army. Is it, then, what can with propriety be called a standing Army? If it be, had not even Mr. Jefferson a standing army? Did he disband the whole of the troops of the United States? Did he, and those who acted with him, consider it anti-republican to keep up as many regular troops as were necessary to garrison our forts and keep them in a proper state of repair? By no means!—Republican as they were, they did not consider a few men, scattered over our immense frontier, as endangering our liberties—they did not consider it improper to retain what the necessities of the nation required, and we ask no more. Shall it be said, that our present Army consisted of a greater number than Mr. Jefferson retained? I admit it: but our territory has greatly increased, our frontiers have been widely extended, our forts have become much more numerous; and as our population has well nigh doubled, we are in no more danger from eight thousand men now, than we were from half the number twelve years ago.

It has been remarked by the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. RANDOLPH,) in opposition to the retaining of the present number of troops, that regular forces are not our implements of war, and that the militia is the natural defence of our country. Whilst I admit, to the fullest extent, the value of the militia; whilst I acknowledge that they are the great defence of the nation, and that to them we must ultimately look for the protection of the country, I cannot assent to the idea that regulars are unnecessary. Without entering into a view of their comparative merits; without endeavoring to enhance the one, and depress the other, I will venture to say that all experience establishes the necessity of some regular forces in a period of war. From the time of General WASHINGTON, whose opinions, in relation to the continentals and militia, cannot but be recollected, to the present day, no one has ventured to suggest the propriety or advantage of attempting to carry on a war with militia alone. The possession of both species of force has always been found necessary, and the use of regular troops during the last war was utterly indispensable. So must it be in every future war; and however valuable militia may be, regulars are necessary for the garrisoning the forts in time of peace, and for the most active and arduous operations during the war. If so, prudence requires that we should not dismiss them altogether, nor reduce the present establishment, which scarcely suffices for the necessary garrisons.

But the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. RANDOLPH,) does not confine his objections to the Army, but contends that the general tendency of the system advocated by his opponents and by the gentleman from South Carolina in particular, is to strengthen the hands of the General Government and to overthrow the power of the States. He admits, indeed, that the policy recommended would be wise and salutary, if this was a National and not a Federative Government, but believes that if such a system be pursued, the federative principle will soon become annihilated. This, indeed, forms the strongest argument against State powers that I have ever yet heard advanced, since it supposes that for the preservation of these powers we must forego proper measures of defence, and a just, wise, and liberal system of policy. I cannot, therefore, admit the correctness of the suggestion, nor can I persuade myself that there is any foundation for this alarm about State rights. I will not detain the Committee by a detail of those arguments with which they must be familiar, establishing the position, that there is in our Government a greater tendency to anarchy among the members than tyranny in the head. Nor will I contend, that the State should have less, or the General Government more power. I am satisfied with the present distribution of power. I will mention only two instances which serve to establish, beyond contradiction, that the power of the States, under our present Constitution, is amply sufficient for their self-protection; the first of these was afforded a few days ago by the gentleman himself, when he reminded us, that about the year 1798, a personage now high in office, left his seat in this House for one on the floor of the State Legislature, and retired from the National Council, where his exertions were unsuccessful, to wield in another body the Democracy of Virginia. Whatever may be our opinions of this affair, gentlemen on the other side of the House will acknowledge that here was one instance of the successful efforts of a State to break down an Administration whose views it disapproved. Gentlemen on our side of the House will be equally satisfied with a more recent example. I mention this without any disposition to criminate, and with no wish to excite irritation. I allude to the course of events in some of the Eastern States during the late war; events which sufficiently demonstrate the powers of the States not only to protect themselves against encroachments of the General Government, but even to jar the whole political body, and retard the motion of this complicated machine.

H. OF R.

The Revenue.

For my own part, Mr. Chairman, I anticipate little danger to the States from the Federal Government, so long as we only exercise the powers fairly conferred on us by the Constitution. If an attack should be made upon State rights and privileges, the alarm will be sounded throughout the Union. The esprit du corps will animate the whole, and, should they unite, they have power, in different ways, to stop the wheels of Government. Even a refusal to elect their Senators would at once arrest its powers. So long as a State confines itself within its proper sphere, every other State will sympathize when it shall be attacked. It is only when it wanders beyond its orbit that it will meet neither countenance nor sympathy.

The natural course of events, Mr. Chairman, is also gradually lessening the capacity of the General Government to crush the States, or to circumscribe their Constitutional power. The continued and immense increase of our territory, the expansion of our population, the multiplication of the States, all tend to weaken the hands of the Federal, and to increase the security of the State powers. The extension of territory itself is a sure protection against consolidation. So far from this nation being disposed to slide into that system of Government, it may be confidently said, that it could not exist in such a form, for it is scarcely possible to conceive that the multifarious and complicated concerns of such an extended and various community, could be conducted by a single Legislature or superintended by a single Administration.

I have said that the extension of our territory and the multiplication of distant States increased the security of State power, and weakened the Federal hand. All experience justifies the remark. Power is always weak when operating at a distance. Feebleness in its authority over distant Provinces is the immediate law of extended empire. The power of the Federal Government over remote States, in case of collision, must diminish with their distance. The lever is against it. Months must expire between an order and its execution, whilst the well-organized State Legislature can always act with promptitude and decision; and although I am by no means disposed to change their relative proportions of power, I confess I have less apprehension for the States than I have for the existence of the Confederacy. If there be anything, however, calculated to produce a subversion of the State governments and an increase of power in the Federal head, I am inclined to believe that a feeble exercise of the fair and unquestioned powers of the Federal Government, will give rise to that effect so much deprecated. If ever the moment shall arrive when, for want of a proper exertion of the Constitutional powers of this Government, the safety of the nation shall be in danger; when, for want of credit and resources, of military strength and of naval defence, the independence of our country shall be prostrate before the invader, then, indeed, will the existence of the State Governments be in jeopardy. Pressed from without, while all the elements are jarring within, to what resource will the people look for salvation? Will they suffer the Government to dissolve in its own weakness, and look for protection to the individual States? By no means; no one can be so sanguine as to believe that the States can, without union, successfully defend themselves. To union we shall still look, but to a stronger union; for, however indisposed we may be to consolidation and all its train of ills, there is nothing which we shall not be ready to encounter for national safety, for protection, for independence. The great object of every people, in the establishment of their Government, is self-protection. If their institutions do not afford it, they will fall into contempt with the people themselves, and the natural, the inevitable course of things will be to infuse into them greater vigor by a liberal extension of power. The very Constitution, under which we hold our seats in this House, strikingly evinces the justness of my position. Whence did it spring? From the debility of the Confederation. And whenever this Constitution shall be so feebly administered as to afford no protection against foreign aggression, when danger shall be at our doors, and confusion and distraction within; then, indeed, may we apprehend an effort to circumscribe, yet farther, the powers of the States, and increase, yet more, the powers of the Federal arm. From this wreck of elements a consolidation may grow, but it never can arise from a just exercise of the powers we now possess. As a lover of freedom, as an admirer of our happy Constitution, as a stickler for the rights of States, I pray you let us not bring our institutions into disrepute, and endanger the fabric of our Government, by leaving the nation without credit, without resources, without defence, without the means of protection. Let us rather use, with the moderation suggested by the committee, our unquestioned Constitutional powers, to preserve our nation from self-contempt, and to secure the inestimable blessings of national independence.

Having thus, Mr. Chairman, presented my view of the necessity of retaining our present military force, and replied to some of the prominent objections to that measure, I beg leave to say something in respect to the Navy. It is proposed that this important part of the defence of our country, should be gradually increased, until it shall be enabled to protect our coast from the ravages of every hostile naval power. I shall not attempt, Mr. Chairman, to blazon the praise of those whose achievements are their best eulogium, and whose glories have

Stuck upon them as the sun
In the grey vault of heaven :

But I will confine myself to the remark, that a navy affords to this nation, and particularly the State which I have the honor in part to represent, the best, the surest, the cheapest, defence. While, on the one hand, it can never endanger the liberties of the nation, whatever may be its extent, on the other, it forms the most complete protection for our very extensive and very exposed Atlantic frontier. Let the history of the last war teach us wisdom on this subject. With a superior navy, and a few thousand regulars, the enemy kept in continual alarm a coast of three thousand miles. The spot which they found protected, they avoided; the exposed and undefended, they ravaged unresistingly. Thousands of our militia have been called to the seaboard for its protection; millions of treasure have been consumed on that expensive system of defence, and many a gallant fellow has been the victim of disease, while the foe has confined his attack to vulnerable points, and has rarely assailed us where the yeomanry of our country were in arms. It is impossible that, without a navy, we ever should defend our coast, deeply indented, as it is, with large and navigable rivers, against the ravages of any naval power. The whole population and the whole wealth of the nation would not enable us to present, at every point, men in arms, sufficient to repel the foe; while, on the contrary, by means of a gradual increase of our Navy, a few years will see us masters of our own seas, and our soil will be protected from the pollution of an invading enemy. Is there not wisdom, then, in the measure? It is one which the interest of our country commands, and the general voice of our constituents requires at our hands.

I come next to the redemption of the public debt; one of the most important and interesting subjects presented to us by the Committee of Ways and Means. That debt has largely accumulated since the commencement of the war, and the committee have proposed to adopt at once a vigorous system of finance which will enable us to discharge the whole as rapidly as its redeemable character will admit. Who is there that can doubt the wisdom of such a policy? Who can doubt the propriety of the most vigorous exertions to get rid of a burden, which oppresses the nation in peace, and must paralyze her exertions when she is engaged in war? Who can hesitate to discharge the debt we have contracted instead of leaving it as a legacy to our children? In whatever point of view the subject is considered, it is of the utmost importance to this nation that the debt should be reduced as rapidly as possible. If we do not desire to pursue the fearful example of Great Britain; if we wish to avoid the continued accumulation of public burdens, we should not shrink from the duty which the present moment imposes. Whence is it that the British finances have become so involved? Whence is it that her debt has accumulated to a thousand millions? Because, after the termination of one war, she has never liquidated the additional debts it created before the expenses of another had commenced. Let us then take a lesson from her example. Let us rapidly discharge our debt, lest, as has once already happened to us, we should, before it is paid off, be involved in other wars that may infinitely increase it. Let us not flatter ourselves that we are now to have a never-ending peace. God forbid we should again have war. No man can be more averse to its horrors, none can be more forcibly impressed with the propriety of avoiding it, than I am. But peace does not depend on us alone. Any nation which may be disposed to involve us in hostility may do so, however contrary to our wishes; and we may think ourselves fortunate indeed if we shall enjoy the blessings of peace for the term of thirteen years, which is the period fixed on by the committee for the extinguishment of the debt. I do not, indeed, believe with the gentleman from Virginia, that Republics are prone to war, and still less that this nation has any such propensity. The history of this people—the peace of thirty years—acquits them of the charge. But there is a Power, of warlike disposition, with whom, from various causes, we may expect frequent and serious collisions. That Power is Great Britain. The gentleman from Virginia has admitted that other wars with that powerful people are not only probable but certain. It is one of the evil consequences, as he alleges, of the war from which we have emerged. "The bolt," he tells us, "has been shot," and we may now look for frequent wars and contentions. Be it so. Is it not then important that we should prepare for them, at least, by freeing our resources from the weight of debt by which they are encumbered? Shall we, with every prospect of frequent collision with a powerful nation, leave ourselves defenceless, and enter into another arduous conflict without money, without credit, and with an overwhelming debt? or shall we free ourselves from the burden, get rid of the heavy encumbrance of the interest, and if (which Heaven avert) new wars arise, be enabled to apply the resources of the nation to her defence, and to command the capital of her people for the supply of her coffers in the hour of her adversity? Of all the plans of the committee this is nearest my heart; of all the means of strengthening this nation, the best is, the emancipation of our finances from the burdens which oppress them. Our finances are, and must long continue, our weakest point. Do as we will, we shall always find it difficult enough to command resources in time of war. Let us not increase the difficulty. Let us endeavor to diminish it. If we enter into war under the pressure of debt, we shall find it difficult to borrow, both because our credit will not be so good, nor the amount of capital to be loaned so great, as if that debt had first been discharged; and if we lay taxes, those taxes must go to pay interest to the public creditor, instead of raising soldiers, procuring supplies and giving vigor and efficacy to our military operations. I trust, therefore, Mr. Chairman, that a just sense of these important considerations will urge us to adopt the vigorous system of the extinguishment of the debt, which has been proposed by the Committee of Finance.

But how shall we effect these desirable objects? How retain the necessary troops, make provision for our crippled officers, prepare for the gradual increase of the Navy, and secure the extinguishment of the debt which presses upon the nation? How—but by bearing the necessary taxes? Fortunately there never was a period at which the produce of the country, from one end of the continent to the other, commanded higher prices than now. Our prosperity is great, and our people are willing to pay something towards the important objects I have been contemplating. They will perceive that all the taxes have been reduced to about one-half their former amount, and those which were peculiarly oppressive or disagreeable have been entirely removed. I feel the fullest confidence that they will approve the measures which propose to retain a portion, rather than forego the advantages we have in view.

There remains but a few remarks in relation to the direct tax in particular, with which I shall trouble the Committee. It has been severely animadverted on, as unequal and oppressive. I cannot believe it. If indeed there be an inequality, I am surprised to hear the complaints from the quarter whence they have proceeded. If unequal, it must operate against those States where the nominal price of the land bears the greatest proportion to its real value. It must, therefore, be unfavorable to thickly settled States, and favorable to the people of the South and the West, whose population is more dispersed, and whose lands are not estimated at their intrinsic worth. But the inequality, if it existed, cannot be very important, since the tax itself is so light; amounting, in the State of Virginia, to only fourteen cents on one hundred dollars value, or about seven dollars on an estate worth five thousand. The people of these States are too intelligent to be led to regard a tax like this as odious and oppressive.

I know not, Mr. Chairman, whether it be in order to allude to the probable course which may be pursued in the other branch of the Legislature, (the Senate.) Let it be recollected that, by the law of the last session, the direct tax was rendered permanent, and it cannot now be removed without the consent of that branch. There is reason to suppose that if an entire repeal of the tax should pass this House, the Senate may reject it, and gentlemen will probably be left to the alternative of taking a permanent tax of six millions, or a tax for one year of three millions. If, then, they are averse to the direct tax, they ought to support the resolution upon your table, rather than encounter the still greater evil which will ensue from its rejection.

In tendering my thanks to the Committee for their polite attention to my lame and uninteresting remarks, I will conclude with expressing my earnest solicitude that we may pursue the path, on the present important occasion, that leads to the happiness and honor of our common country.

When Mr. T. had concluded—

Mr. RANDOLPH moved that the Committee should rise, in order to take into consideration his proposition for reducing the Army, previous to deciding on the question now before the House.

This motion having been negatived—

Mr. RANDOLPH rose, and delivered a speech of three hours on the opposite side of the general question from that taken by Mr. CALHOUN and Mr. TUCKER, to whom principally his speech was in reply. When he concluded, the Committee rose, reported progress, and obtained leave to sit again.

Mr. RANDOLPH rose to make a motion respecting a discrepancy he had discovered between the account of the receipts and expenditures from the commencement of the Government, recently laid before the House, and that which was laid before Congress some years ago.

Before the motion was stated from the Chair, it was discovered there was not a quorum present; and the House adjourned.

H. OF R.

FRIDAY, February 2.

Mr. ROBERTSON, from the Committee on the Public Lands, reported a bill for the relief of Charles Levan Trudeau; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. RANDOLPH submitted the following resolution, which was read, and ordered to lie on the table:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be required to lay before this House the cause of the difference in the annual amount of expenditures in relation to the Military and Naval Establishments, from the 4th March, 1789, to the end of the year 1809, as presented in the letter from the Secretary of the Treasury of April 3, 1810; and the annual amount of expenditures in relation to the same objects, as stated in a letter from the same Department, bearing date January 24, 1816.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Commissioner of the General Land Office, transmitting a supplementary report of the land commissioners in the late Territory of New Orleans, now State of Louisiana; which were referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

THE REVENUE.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the report of the Committee of Ways and Means.

A bill making appropriations for the Ordnance department—for ordnance stores, fortifications, &c.—was taken up, and the blank therein, on motion of Mr. LOWNDES, after some opposition from Messrs. WRIGHT, and KING of Massachusetts, was filled up with the sum of $1,650,224.

The resolution reported by the Committee of Ways and Means, and Mr. HARDIN's motion to amend the same, respecting the direct tax, next occupied the attention of the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, said he had many reasons, not only to justify, but to make it his duty, against his inclination, to trouble the Committee. First, the discussion had not been confined to the subject under consideration, but had been extended, as usual, to all subjects, foreign and domestic; secondly, the most direct attack had been made upon all the military subjects submitted to the Military Committee; all the measures reported by them, the invalid corps, military academies, &c., and particularly the reduction of the Army from ten thousand to six thousand. Mr. J. said, although he should confine himself principally to the military subject, he could not let the opportunity pass of saying a word in reply to some remarks which had been made in debate. The gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. CALHOUN) has expressed an opinion that our measures should be predicated upon a supposition that Great Britain was only separated from the United States as the Canadas and the Floridas. We often resort to the history of England, and to the opinions of her statesmen, for information on political subjects. If, on this occasion, we resort to the same sources, we shall discover that, from the views and sentiments of the most distinguished patriots, the British channel is of itself sufficient to make it the true policy of the British Government to act upon its insular situation—to abstain from interfering in the Continental system. The Court party maintained a different opinion, and succeeded in their policy, (except for short intervals,) the consequences of which have involved Great Britain in great difficulties and wars. Expenses have been incurred that would have raised a Chinese wall around the island. It must be left to conjecture what would have been the precise result of the opposite doctrine; but it is confidently believed that the English nation would have been at least as happy, as rich, and as free; that the poor would not have been more numerous; that the public debt would not have been more enormous; that the character of the nation would have been as distinguished for wisdom, science, and valor; that the taxes would not have been more burdensome; that liberty of conscience would not have been more limited. If the British channel could justify such a system, the separation of the United States from Europe and Great Britain left not a single doubt upon the mind. But this view of the subject does not depend upon reasoning and analogy, but upon matters of fact. Only suppose England and Ireland, with a population of two millions, annexed to Canada and separated from us by a mathematical line, length without breadth, a geographical boundary, governed by the Prince Regent and his Ministry, with their jealousy and hostility, and all the pecuniary resources of that absolute monarchy; would not every gentleman agree that our measures would have to be different from what they need to be now, in expense, in extent? In such event you would have forthwith to increase your Army and your Navy to an extent that would be very burdensome to the people. Mr. J. said he could not agree in the sentiments of the same worthy member, that a statesman should act upon possibility, and not upon probability, in measures of defence and precaution. This sentiment would lead us into great extravagance, such as could not be supported consistently with the enjoyment of that independence and liberty which our Constitution and Government would seem to hold out to us. We should not act upon any evidence less than probability. To prove the danger of this doctrine, we need only advert to the sentiment which grew out of it—for the gentleman treats with great severity the idea of increasing our Navy gradually. He is for going the whole length at this time. Now is the time, says the gentleman, and the only limit given is our power to man this Navy with our sailors and seamen, who are estimated at eighty thousand. The universal gallantry and good conduct of our Navy has produced a universal sentiment as to its efficiency, and a willingness to increase its power gradually, according to our means, until we have a pledge of a reasonable protection in case of war. Any measure, or any other sentiment, would have a direct tendency to prevent the growth of the Navy. A different course may be recommended from zeal and patriotism, but it will injure the cause it is intended to promote.

The gentleman from Virginia (Mr. RANDOLPH) had discovered, previous to the declaration of war, a speck of war in the political horizon, and was alarmed. Mr. J. begged leave to call the attention of the worthy gentleman to a memorable example to be found in the pages of sacred writ, as to the consequences of submission, and bearing insults without resistance—reference was made to a book which abounded with examples, in religion, in morals, and in politics, and to which the gentleman from Virginia so often alluded with so much pleasure; when Moses brought the children of Israel in sight of the promised land, chosen men were sent down to view it; when they returned, such an account was given of the giants who possessed the land, that notwithstanding the influence of their great leader, the children of Israel refused positively to go down and possess themselves of their inheritance. The sons of Anak terrified them. This cowardice was the effect of submission to Egyptian bondage, for which God manifested his displeasure by dooming all the warriors to wander forty years in the wilderness and to die, until a new race of men should grow up who had never felt the heavy hand of oppression, and who willingly accomplished that which their fathers should have done.

It is now time to confine our attention to the reduction of the Army. This subject has given to the ingenuity of gentlemen a wide range; but the question does not admit of it. Points have been elaborately discussed that are not involved. There are many points in which we agree, and very few in which there is a difference of opinion. First, there is no disagreement as to the worth and character of the militia; nor is the relative merit of regular troops and militia involved in this debate. Such questions cannot be decided by mathematical certainty. Nor is it necessary; the merit of each is acknowledged; the efficiency of every kind of military force depends upon so many contingencies, the cause in which they are engaged, the term of service, the manner of fighting, the ground occupied, the officers commanding, that no particular case of panic or misfortune can change our opinion. For, in appealing to history, we should find memorable examples to support this idea, such as the defence of Thermopylæ, the battle of Marathon, composed of the population of Greece, and the battle of Cannæ, by what we call mercenary troops, or a regular army. The ancients had no very correct idea of a well-organized standing army, although Carthage and other kingdoms employed mercenary troops, while the citizens were exempt from military duty. For these troops, under trying circumstances, could not be relied on nor controlled. Thirdly, the subject of a standing army cannot be involved in this examination, although gentlemen have uniformly pressed the subject. No consideration can justify a standing army in time of peace. We may differ as to the amount of the Peace Establishment; there cannot be a diversity of sentiment among men who love liberty, independence, and a free country, as to standing armies. A standing army would be, in time of peace, inconsistent with the Constitution and our free institutions. We want no regular army to suppress insurrection, for none exists. In such an event the militia are subject to the call of the President. Nor to execute the laws, for the civil officers are all obeyed by the citizens; and if the citizens resist the execution of the laws, the marshal has the power of putting down any such resistance as is likely to arise in the United States. Nor to support the Administration of the Government; this depends upon the will of the people; upon the elective franchise. A standing army is dangerous to liberty. Rome depended upon the citizens, the militia of the country, four hundred and fifty years before the introduction of a mercenary force, which ultimately brought such calamity upon that great and mighty empire. Nor can it be forgotten that a standing army has been the most powerful instrument in the hands of power and usurpation. It has seldom failed of success. But notwithstanding the examples of ancient times, such as Philip of Macedon, and Cæsar, a regular army in modern times has been most mischievous and dangerous to liberty, on account of its perfect organization, subordination, and discipline; all the despotisms in the world are supported by this powerful instrument. All the Governments of Europe and all the tyrants of the day are supported by this means.

All must, therefore, agree, that in times of peace, and in the first moments of war, we must depend upon the population of the United States, well organized, classified, and the term of service extended. What has been said does not presuppose that we can dispense with all of our forces. All agree that we must keep a Peace Establishment, a small force, commensurate with certain objects and views, which will be mentioned. The first object is to garrison our forts on our wide-extended territorial frontier, and to maintain and keep in repair our fortifications on the seaboard and on the lakes; not only the existing fortifications and forts, but those to be erected. We should cast the eye around and view the great extent of this maritime and territorial exposure, and look at the number of our garrisons and our fortifications,—at Castine, Wiscasset, Portland, Portsmouth, Boston, New Bedford, Newport, New London, New York, Fort Mifflin, Fort McHenry, Fort Washington, Norfolk, Fort Johnson, in North Carolina, Charleston, Savannah, Fort Hawkins, Mobile, Fort St. Philippe, New Orleans, Natchez, St. Louis, Fort Clark, Fort Wayne, Chicago, Greenbay, Mackinac, Detroit, Fort Niagara, Sackett's Harbor, Plattsburg, Greenbush, and others about to be erected in such places as the late war has pointed out. To each garrison assign the nominal amount of one hundred men, which will not give more than seventy efficient men, and you have for this object alone a demand for five thousand.

2d. The second object will embrace such a distribution of force as will secure us on our

FEBRUARY, 1816.

The Revenue.

H. of R.

frontier, from banditti, or marauding parties of Indians, or the insults and invasions of the subjects of Spain in Florida, and of Great Britain in Canada.

One thousand men should be placed somewhere on the Niagara or Northern frontier; one thousand in some healthy situation in Louisiana or the Mobile; one thousand in the neighborhood of Detroit, and one thousand in some eligible place on the Mississippi. This will amount to the whole military force of the United States except the corps of light artillery. Indeed, it is well known that an army of ten thousand men can never give us an efficient force of more than seven or eight thousand. To enforce my idea of this distribution, let us recollect the indignity and abuse offered to citizens of Detroit since the war, who were arrested and driven from Sandwich by the military, without any provocation; citizens of Detroit who had crossed the Straight for the common purposes of collecting debts, and for the purposes of commerce and trade. From actual returns, at this moment the Army of the United States is less than eight thousand men.

3d. There is another object for retaining this force, not less important than those which have been mentioned—the preservation of military knowledge; to have a rallying point in case of danger or war; to retain the knowledge we have acquired of camp duty, field evolutions and military discipline. This science cannot be taught in garrison, or with one hundred men—it requires at least a regiment.

It is believed that the people of the United States would be dissatisfied with a greater reduction of the Army. The country would be too insecure, and the militia subject to be called from their farms on every alarm. In relation to the direct tax—if the Committee will reduce it one-half, from $6,000,000 to $3,000,000, and limit its operation to one year, Mr. J. said, he would vote for it.

The direct tax is the most objectionable tax that can be collected, and, therefore, it should be limited to one year, that we may dispense with it as soon as possible. It is expensive in its collection, and burdensome in its operation. In time of war we must tax everything from necessity, but in time of peace we should be moderate in our taxes, and take hold of the luxuries of life and the rich, as much as possible; and after the present year, it is probable we may dispense with the direct tax, but it must be continued for the present, as we have a floating debt of $25,000,000 to pay off; and our national debt is upwards of $100,000,000. We have to pay for horses lost in the service of the United States, and other property; and we have to provide for the widow and the orphan of the officer and soldier who were killed in battle, or who died in the service; and these claims should be paid by every part of the United States, which can only be done by taking the money from the Treasury of the United States.

Much has been said respecting internal policy. On this subject there should be but one opinion.

Upon the subject of protecting manufactures by discriminating duties—this interest claims our first attention. It is as important as the independence of the nation; for how can any nation be independent without making its own necessities of life? The voice of the nation has been distinctly heard upon this point, and all classes of men, with few exceptions, call for this protection. Independent of the importance of this subject in a national point of view, the manufactures of hemp, of cotton, of wool, and of everything else, have been the result, in a great measure, of the late war.

Citizens have turned their capital into domestic manufactures, not subject to the control of foreign nations; and this being the case, there is a moral obligation existing upon the Government to give reasonable protection to these people. Upon this subject the mind must expand, and take in the various climates and productions of the United States, and the various manufactories, and act upon a policy enlarged and liberal. Any other views would consider the States foreign to each other, and the people as strangers—a policy which does not become the American statesman. And in relation to roads and canals, which may open different channels of commerce, or which may facilitate military operations in future; we should all unite in this system of internal improvement. These are some of the fruitful sources of the prosperity of nations, with which we must encourage everything that will inculcate virtue, morality, patriotism, intelligence, and courage.

Mr. LOWNDES then addressed the Committee in defence of the report under consideration, and in reply to the objections urged against it in the course of the debate.

The question was then taken on Mr. HARDIN's motion to amend the resolution so as to declare it expedient to repeal the direct tax, and decided in the negative—for the amendment 69, against it 88.

At the request of Mr. HARDIN, the resolution was then laid on the table; and the Committee took up the bill to repeal the duties on certain domestic manufactures; which having been gone through, the Committee rose, reported progress, and obtained leave to sit again.

The House took up, successively, the bill making appropriations for the Ordnance department, agreeing to the amendment made therein by the Committee of the Whole; and the bill to repeal the duties on certain domestic manufactures.—The latter bill was so amended, on motion of Mr. SERGEANT, as to make the repeal take effect from the passage of the act, instead of the 18th April next. Both bills were ordered to a third reading, and the House adjourned.

SATURDAY, February 3.

An engrossed bill entitled "An act to repeal the duties on certain articles manufactured within the United States," was read the third time, and passed.

INDIAN DEPREDATIONS.

Mr. LATTIMORE, from the committee to whom were referred the memorial of the Legislature of the Mississippi Territory, and the petitions of sundry inhabitants of said Territory, relating to Indian depredations, made a report; which was read, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Wednesday next.—The report is as follows:

The petitioners state that the inhabitants of the eastern section of the Mississippi Territory sustained, during the late war, very great losses of property, which was stolen or destroyed by the hostile Creek Indians, and, in some instances, taken from them by the troops in the service of the United States; and pray that reparation may be made to the sufferers out of the lands obtained from that nation of Indians by the Treaty of Peace.

Amongst the documents relating to this subject are statements (which are sworn to) of the losses sustained by one hundred and thirteen persons, which are estimated, in the whole, at $127,905. As these injuries were inflicted by the enemy, who have made, by a cession of territory, what the petitioners conceive to be ample compensation for all losses sustained as well as expenses incurred by their hostility, they seem to think that the sufferers in question are entitled to peculiar relief.

Your committee have examined the ground of this claim, but they find nothing to support it, either in the treaty with the Creeks or any other authentic document which they have been able to procure. If, therefore, relief shall be granted to these sufferers, it must, in the opinion of your committee, be done upon a general principle, which would be applicable to the cases of all who have suffered from similar causes in other parts of the United States. In giving this opinion, your committee have no disposition to impair the impression produced by the afflicting scenes through which the eastern inhabitants of the Mississippi Territory have passed, or to diminish whatever claim they may have to the humanity of the Government, in consideration of their present distress. But, whatever may be the merits of their claim on this score, your committee cannot perceive the propriety of any provision for their relief which shall not extend similar relief in all similar cases, and therefore submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That the prayer of the petitioners ought not to be granted.

THE REVENUE.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the report of the Committee of Ways and Means, respecting the revenue; and after a short time spent therein, the Committee rose.

The House took up the report of the Committee of the Whole, on the proposition to reduce the annual direct tax to three millions. The amendment—agreed to on the suggestion of Mr. CLAY, in Committee of the Whole—to limit the tax to one year, so as to bring the question annually before the House, was concurred in by yeas and nays—for the amendment 109, against it 16, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alexander, Atherton, Baer, Barbour, Bassett, Baylies, Bennett, Betts, Blount, Boss, Bradbury, Breckenridge, Brigham, Brooks, Brown, Bryan, Burnside, Burwell, Caldwell, Cannon, Chappell, Clarke of North Carolina, Clopton, Comstock, Conner, Crawford, Culpeper, Cuthbert, Darlington, Desha, Forsyth, Glasgow, Goldsborough, Goodwyn, Griffin, Hahn, Hale, Hardin, Hawes, Heister, Henderson, Herbert, Huger, Hungerford, Irwin of Pennsylvania, Jackson, Johnson of Virginia, Johnson of Kentucky, Kent, Kerr of Virginia, Lewis, Love, Lowndes, Lumpkin, Lyle, Lyon, Maclay, Mayrant, McKee, McLean of Kentucky, McLean of Ohio, Murfree, Nelson of Virginia, Newton, Noyes, Ormsby, Parris, Piper, Pitkin, Pleasants, Powell, Reed, Reynolds, Rice, Roane, Root, Ross, Ruggles, Savage, Sheffey, Smith of Virginia, Southard, Stanford, Stearns, Strong, Taggart, Tate, Taul, Taylor of South Carolina, Telfair, Thomas, Throop, Tucker, Vose, Wallace, Ward of Massachusetts, Ward of New York, Ward of New Jersey, Wheaton, Whiteside, Wilcox, Wilde, Williams, Willoughby, William Wilson, Woodward, Wright, Yancey, and Yates.

NAYS—Messrs. Birdsall, Birdseye, Gaston, Gold, Hammond, Hanson, Hopkinson, Jewett, Middleton, Mills, Milnor, Sergeant, Smith of Pennsylvania, Wendover, Wilkin, and Thomas Wilson.

Mr. HARDIN then renewed the motion, which he had made without success in the Committee of the Whole, to amend the resolution so as to declare it expedient to repeal immediately the direct tax, and thereon demanded the yeas and nays.

Mr. DESHA spoke a few words to correct a misapprehension of the reporter, from not being able to hear Mr. D. distinctly on a former day, when the motion was made to reduce the direct tax. He was desirous to reduce the direct tax, and to make it annual, but not to abolish it at present.

Mr. ROSS also rose for a similar purpose. He was now understood to say that he would not object to a direct tax, if necessary to defray the reasonable expenses of the Government; but, believing it might be dispensed with without detriment to the public interest, he should vote for its repeal.

Mr. STANFORD inveighed against the whole system of taxation in very severe terms, and in still more severe terms inveighed against the doctrines which, during the discussion, had been broached by certain ministerial members. Doctrines which, he said, if republican, must be republican after a new fashion—and if federal, were ultra-federal, and not at all of the old kind. It was not amiss at times to refer to first principles; he thought it would be well if the House would remember what they were, and what our freedom was, as understood by those who purchased it. The strongest feature in the character of our fathers, he said, was insurgency against taxes, and he recited the various insurrections which had taken place on that particular score, from the first opposition to British taxation, up to the present day. He then directed the attention of the House to certain injunctions which passed the Virginia Convention, when the Constitution was adopted, and which were annexed as amendments to the Constitution by a committee. These he said, enjoined that no standing army or body of regular troops should in time of peace be kept in the United States without the concurrence of two-thirds of both Houses of Congress. He read the provision from "the debates of the Virginia Convention"—and he read the names of those who formed that committee, and who made a constellation of patriots, such he said as had not since appeared in the United States. Among them were the names of Wythe, Matthew, Patrick Henry, George Mason, and Mr. Monroe. And yet gentlemen now advised the adoption of that very measure which those patriots solemnly interdicted. He observed, that when he first took a seat in that House he had on either side of him old Revolutionary men of high patriotic character. If he looked forward, he had them before him—if he looked back he saw them behind him. So that, being young at the time, he could not help feeling conscious that he was too green to sit among such personages. But now he looked in vain for them; they were gone, and had left very few like them—sorry indeed was he to say that they had not left their principles with their sons. Deeply did he regret to hear such doctrines as were now in vogue, from their successors—doctrines which they would not have dared at that time to avow. He admired the candor of Mr. CALHOUN—never indeed was candor more truly admirable—for that gentleman had unequivocally pronounced an execration upon all those who should not agree to erect fortifications immediately—forthwith; and the venerable patriots whose names he had just read—to wit: Wythe, Matthew, Henry, Mason, and Monroe, were unquestionably objects of that execration, and so was Thomas Jefferson, and so were the best and greatest men this country had produced, for they purposely rejected fortifications, and chose to rely, for the country's defence, on the courage and hardihood of the people. But they were Republicans in heart—they had no wild notions about conquests, and national energy and military glory, and all that mischievous trumpery that entered so much into the character of gentlemen's policy in these new days. As to Mr. Jefferson, once the object of those gentlemen's admiration as well as the corner stone of their ascendancy and elevation to power, he was sunk in their feelings—he was dead—nay, he was more than dead, for he and his principles were spurned by them. He, whose word was once bowed to by them as wisdom and law, was now condemned by them as a visionary theorist. Yes, that man who more than any man, except WASHINGTON, had been consecrated with the veneration and confidence of the public, and to whose popularity those very persons owed their situation in public trust, was now disregarded by them.

Mr. S. then read from a public journal of that period a paper written at the close of Jefferson's first term of Administration, in which the policy of his conduct was delineated, and from which it appeared that the pride of that policy and the glory of Mr. Jefferson was directly the reverse of that which seemed to animate our new politicians. The diminution of public expenses, the reduction of the Army, the abolition of internal taxes and the consequent discharge of five hundred officers—in a word, peace and economy—those were what Mr. Jefferson, and his friends, and his panegyrists maintained to be true national glory. If, not to follow the system now proposed, deserved execration, surely tenfold execration was due to those whose policy was such as that paper described.

Mr. S. then showed the folly of proposing to fortify our shores—they were too extensive to be fortified by anything but the arms of the people. Nor was there any call for it—even in the last war, what mischief did the British do along our seaboard, except that disgraceful affair to us the burning of Washington, that would justify such a system of extravagance? Along shore, they burned barns, and robbed hen-houses; and when negroes ran away to them, they took them—but they did nothing else; and he recommended to gentlemen the consideration that there was nothing they could do in their proposed system that would not be a reproach to their own past professions. They were actually taking a summerset over the heads of the Federalists and running on far before them. From the Administrations of WASHINGTON, or even of Mr. Adams, no examples could be adduced of their resorting to such energies as these. And for his part he did not understand what could be meant by building up armies on possibilities. We had nothing to fear—an ocean of three thousand miles rolled between Europe and our country—and there was no nation contiguous from which we could apprehend danger.

Mr. S. then read several passages from the report of the committee of the Virginia Assembly, drawn up by Mr. Madison as chairman of that committee, in which they expressed their alarm at the danger which the liberties of the country, incurred by Mr. Adams's raising an army, though he himself was now (in an universal peace too) for calling out a greater number—and deprecated the burdens on the people, at that time, though they amounted only to three dollars a head—while he now urged taxes that would amount to more than five dollars a head. And Mr. S. stated it as a circumstance characteristic of the views of those in power, as well as of the acquiescence of the people of this country under imposture, that, while in France they paid but five dollars, and in England but five and a half—we in this country paid rather more than five, taking all taxes together.

Mr. S. then read a passage from WASHINGTON's Farewell Address to the people of America. "Why," said the Father of his Country, "why forego the advantages of so peculiar a situation? why quit our own, to stand upon foreign ground? why, by interweaving our destiny with any part of Europe, entangle our peace and prosperity in the toils of European ambition, rivalry, interest, humor, or caprice?" We profess to be free, (said Mr. S.) and yet at every step we take we identify ourselves with monarchists. I am glad, however that gentlemen are so very frank and open in their avowals, and that they with so little disguise acknowledge their entire renunciation of their old principles.

Mr. BURNSIDE said he rose under great embarrassment to ask the indulgence of the House for a very few minutes.

A resolution has been reported by the Committee of Ways and Means for laying a direct tax of three millions of dollars, and it was proposed to amend the resolution so as to declare it inexpedient to have a direct tax.

The proposition was plain and simple; but the discussion had involved not only the past, but the future policy of this Government. In the latter point of view, the question was extremely important and well worthy the most serious consideration of the National Legislature. His observations, he said, would be principally confined to the course and policy this Government should now pursue. Much had been said by the honorable gentleman from Virginia (Mr. RANDOLPH) and others, in the course of this debate, about members being influenced by the patronage created by the Army, and the system of taxes contemplated by the Government. He did not feel the application of those observations to himself; he had no relatives to serve; his friends were in no other way connected with this Government than that of private citizens. There was not in the district which he had the honor to represent, one solitary citizen holding an office at this time in the Army of the United States. He did not mention these things at present in any other point of view, or with any other object, than to show that he was not influenced by any sordid motive, and if the policy he wished this Government to pursue was wrong, it arose from an error in judgment, and not from any personal or selfish feeling. His object solely was to secure the high and honorable standing of this happy country, and to continue this Government in a situation to preserve peace and to resist aggression. It had been fully demonstrated, in the course of this discussion, that to keep up the present Army of ten thousand men—to produce a gradual increase of the Navy—to put our fortifications in a proper state of defence, and to sink the national debt, this tax was necessary. Was this course of policy wrong? Ten thousand men were not more than sufficient for the garrison duty of this country. It was but the mere skeleton of an army. They would scarcely be sufficient for sentinels along our northern frontier. It was idle to talk about this number being dangerous to the liberties of this country. Gentlemen talk of five thousand under former Administrations—ten thousand was not more at this time than five thousand formerly, when we consider the vast increase of wealth, the extended territory of the country, and the great increase of population. He had no intention of making this nation a military Government; but if the Army was to be reduced, it must inevitably follow that many of the present important and necessary fortifications will fall into ruins. He wished to avoid the situation many of them were in at the commencement of the late war. The militia most certainly are the great military bulwark of this nation; to them the country must look in all great struggles; but you cannot call them out to perform garrison duty in time of peace. It was a prodigious loss to the yeomen of the country, to be absent three or six months from their farms, their families, and their homes; and it was infinitely more to their advantage to pay a small tax to support the necessary army. As to the national debt, he was extremely desirous to sink it as fast as possible; at the same time not to put any unnecessary burden upon the people. There was no honesty or political wisdom in leaving a large national debt upon our posterity, when a considerable part of it could be easily paid by ourselves. But look, said he, at the situation of your national enemy. There never was a period in the history of Great Britain when she possessed such a disposable force, and such powerful means of annoyance, as at the present time. France was humbled in the dust. She will probably withdraw her powerful army from France, and she might as well support that army in Canada as in England. Would gentlemen calculate on her magnanimity? We were her competitors in commerce, in manufactures, in the arts. She viewed us with jealousy and hatred; and he would ask gentlemen to point to a solitary instance in the history of that nation, where she was governed by any other motive than that of self-aggrandizement?

He should also be in favor of a very considerable increase of the Navy—not that he wished to see a great number of ships in immediate commission. He wished additional ships-of-war to be built—a large supply of necessary timber to be procured for the construction of others, and every kind of naval stores in the possession of the Government, so that ships could be immediately constructed, if the exigencies of the country required it. It would be well that fortifications should be erected and improved along our whole seaboard, as well as our northern boundary. The mouth of the Mississippi, the Chesapeake, and the Delaware, New York and Boston, should be fortified and strengthened, as well as many intermediate points. He would have the seaboard so strong that an enemy would meet with resistance at the threshold. We are charged by honorable gentlemen with changing our principles. He denied that the Republican party of this country had changed their principles. The situation of Europe had changed, and our measures should be calculated to meet that change. But a change of measures was not a change of principles. When a navy was formerly wished by some men in this country, it was not necessary to preserve our existence as a nation. It would have been burdensome, and we flourished without it. Great Britain had then use for her navy near herself. France, Spain, Holland, and Denmark, had considerable navies. She required nearly her whole force to watch her neighbors, and they watched each other; but now the navies of France, Spain, Holland, and Denmark, were either possessed by Great Britain, or had disappeared from the ocean. In short, a navy was not at that time wanted by this country. The present time was most favorable for the constructing ships-of-war for this rising and growing nation. We had the advantage of experience. We know the precise force of British ships-of-war of every class, and it would be the policy of this Government, in the construction of ships, to have each class superior to that of the British, so as to secure victory, should they ever come in contact.

But, suppose we have a surplus revenue over the expenditures contemplated by this Government at the present time, are there not ways and means of appropriating it to great national advantage? Are not national roads much wanted? Are not canals almost indispensably necessary? He believed it to be the interest of this Government to turn their attention particularly to these subjects.

It would be the interest of his constituents to pay a direct tax to assist in cutting a canal from the Chesapeake to the Delaware; and he had no doubt they would most cheerfully pay it for that object. If, then, this view of the policy to be pursued by this nation is correct, taxes are indispensably necessary, and, if necessary, the people were prepared to pay them. The people were enlightened and intelligent, and well understood the situation of their country, and would no doubt submit with cheerfulness to any moderate burdens that might be imposed. The direct tax was the most equal of all others that could be devised or levied on the people of the United States; it operated equally on the North and the South, the East and the West—every State paid in proportion to its population, and every citizen paid in proportion to the extent and value of his real property. No other tax could be devised that would unite those great advantages of equality. Gentlemen had called our attention to the situation of the country before the late war. It was painful to look at our humbled situation at that period. Our commerce was the sport and prey of nearly every nation in Europe. England and France, pretending to retaliate on each other, nearly swept our flag from the ocean. Little Denmark suffered her cruisers to capture our ships, and thought our commerce fair game; and even the Neapolitans could not resist the temptation, and came in for a small share of the spoil. It was impossible for this country to be in a more miserable and degraded situation.

But mark the contrast. See your present proud pre-eminence. Where is the Power in Europe that does not respect you—that dare commence the same system of spoliation and injustice?

The national character of this country stands pre-eminently high. You have acquired national glory, and where is the honorable-minded man that is not proud of the exalted situation of his country? It was his sincere and ardent wish to maintain this dignified and honorable character, this high and exalted situation, as the best pledge of peace and happiness.

My honorable colleague (Mr. HOPKINSON) has exercised the whole extent of his ingenuity to find out what we have lost by the war, and unfortunately for him and his friends he has hit upon the fisheries. He perceived that his colleague meant the right of drying fish on the islands in the possession of the British and on their main shore, not the right of fishing on the great bank. If the people of that part of our country had been blest with the spirit of the West; if they had not thrown immense difficulties in the way of the national arms, they would not have this trifling solitary matter to complain about. They may thank themselves, and the shameful policy and conduct they pursued, for their loss on this subject.

Mr. McKEE said that the question in itself, separate from the arguments which had been introduced upon it, was a very unimportant one; but the doctrines which some gentlemen had broached in discussing it, must produce the most weighty bad effects on the happiness and prosperity of the country. Thinking it probable that from this very discussion historians would hereafter commence their accounts of a new era in this country, he considered it his duty to give his vote in that way which was most likely to avert evil, and promote the interests of the country. Gentlemen talked of being guided to their new projects by experience, and had inferred, from the miscarriages in the conduct of Government, a defect in the Constitutional system; but, looking to facts, it was demonstrable that incapacity in the official departments of State was the true cause of those miscarriages. Gentlemen ought not to forget that while the Secretary at War was early furnished by Congress with everything that he required for carrying on the war, in the most unsparing manner, the recruiting officers were not furnished with the means of proceeding upon their duty till the succeeding May. Inefficiency in the administration of Government was no reason for resorting to a system subversive of the principles of that Government. But, gentlemen had said that times were changed; yes, they were—and they might have added that they themselves were changed along with the times; and their projects, if persisted in, would change every idea of Government established in America, to the pernicious doctrines which have for centuries prevailed in the Old World. The true policy of this country was to preserve the moral power of it—but the tendency of the schemes of those innovators was to destroy the moral power, and to create an apathy in the people. What, he asked, was the cause of our successes against the English in the late war? Why, they arose from the operation of a superior moral power upon the people; the Americans having fought for everything that was dear to them, while the English fought only for objects in which they were not at all personally interested. Without exception, all the events of history showed that those who were most conspicuous in deeds of arms, were those whose interest were most intermingled with the objects at stake. At the beginning of the French Revolution, it was the increase of the moral power arising from the objects they had in view, which enabled that people to perform such prodigies of valor as are recorded of them. The moral power was the best security, and the increase of the physical power diminished that security by dwindling the moral power. Mr. McK. differed entirely from Mr. CALBORN'S opinion, that an apathy prevailed in the people of America—or, if it did, it respected domestic dangers only; they had shown their alacrity to meet the British foe; and there was much more cause to fear their submitting to some home-bred despot, than their yielding to any foreign attack. As a proof of this, he remarked, that when the finances of the country were tottering in the late war—when Government were unable to devise how they should carry on another campaign, the people never once shrunk, or uttered a word of despondence. No—not a man of them. Where, then, did their hopes rest? Why, where it ought to rest—on their confidence in the moral power, and consequent exertions of the nation. This was the sole anchor on which they relied.

Mr. McKee then directed his argument to show that all the fiscal difficulties which had ensued were occasioned not by any indisposition in the people to meet the exigencies of the times, but by the impolicy and incapacity of Government as evinced in their restrictive system.

The course now projected and developed, filled Mr. McK., he owned, with fears that that great rock of our national safety, the moral power of the country, would be deserted and left uncherished, while the physical would be increased—and that the consequence would be the nation's driving headlong on the same road which led those of Europe into the gulf of ruin; and he desired the House to compare the words of Mr. Pitt, whose talents nevertheless he owned to be superior to those of any other man, with the doctrines now maintained here. Mr. McK., however, owned, that while he urged this, because he thought it his duty to do, he had no hope of its producing any effect, for he was convinced that there existed a pre-determination, against which reason would exert all its force in vain.

Mr. Wright again spoke against the taxes with great earnestness, and evident sincerity.

Mr. GASTON said, that he would be glad to repeal the direct tax, because he thought it oppressive, if he could reconcile it to his conceptions of the interest of the country to do so—but, considering that, with such a heavy debt as the country was pledged for, a vigorous system of finance was absolutely necessary, he was unwilling to decline his share of the responsibility, whatever it might be, annexed to granting the taxes for that purpose.

But while he thus voted for the taxes recommended by the Committee of Ways and Means, he thought himself entitled to state the purposes to which he conceived they ought to be applied—and this he would do in the words of Sir Fletcher Norton, who, when placed in a situation and in circumstances which laid his chief hopes at the mercy of the Crown, had the virtue, when presenting the civil list bill to the King of Great Britain, to tell him “it was hoped that what the Commons had given cheerfully His Majesty would spend wisely.” In other words Mr. G. thought he had a right to demand, that with respect to the grants of the House, there should be not only wisdom in selecting the means, but economy observed in the application of them.

He would tell them that he did not vote this money for the prosecution of wild schemes of erratic chivalry. He did not vote it with a view to run in the race of glory, nor to divert the citizens of the Republic from the occupations of honest industry to military pursuits. He wished them to remain what they are. The only change he desired in them, was to be more industrious—but not in the military life.

Nor did he vote it for the purpose of enabling Government to run the brilliant career which gentlemen had proposed, of extensive improvements in military roads and canals. The Government, he observed, was confederated for certain general objects, and ought to leave those improvements to the municipal regulations of the particular States.

Nor did he vote for it because war was inevitable, as some gentlemen had insinuated. He did not coincide in opinion with those gentlemen who thought it was; and he thought there was much danger in giving indulgence to such sentiments; for, the moment one nation viewed another as a natural enemy, its conduct inevitably began to partake of that feeling, and endless causes of hostility would arise. But he would indulge the hope that the councils of both countries would be animated by a superior spirit—a spirit of magnanimity and mutual tolerance; and that the two families would not weaken their strength by groundless ineffectual struggles with each other.

In short, he voted with a view, in the first place, to a vigorous system of defence for the country, by permanent, safe and Constitutional means; not by armies, but by extending the Navy—and, in the next place, with a view to the payment of the national debt. That ought to be discharged, he said, as speedily as possible—for it hung like a mill-stone about the neck of the country, incapacitating it from vigorous exertion. This season of peace he observed, ought to be made use of for the purpose; the debt must be paid some time, and that being the case, the sooner it was paid the better; for, if an evil was to be encountered, it ought never to be postponed.

These, Mr. G. said, were the purposes for which he voted for this system of finance. He was the only one of the members from his State who took up that responsibility; and he did so with a thorough conviction that he was doing his duty;—but, doing it alone, he had a right to demand of gentlemen some little economy. Economy had ever been a principal ingredient in the ways and means of the greatest statesmen—and a favorite maxim of Burke's, which he would recommend to the consideration of the honorable gentlemen who conducted our financial concerns, was, magnum est vectigal parsimonia. By parsimony, in his construction of this maxim, he did not understand anything sordid, contracted or mean, but plainly this: “there is no revenue equal to a liberal and discreet economy.”

And here, Mr. G. held up the report of the Treasury, and pointing to a particular sheet of it, said: It is melancholy to look at this balance sheet—it proves how deficient our Government has been in husbanding the resources of the country. If these balances are due, as no doubt they are, our Government is inexcusable in not compelling those concerned to render an account of them. There is not a department of Government whose accounts would be received, nor is there a voucher among them that would be admitted in a settlement between any gentleman and his overseer. This money which the House is now voting may also be prodigally squandered away, and to speak my mind, I very much fear that a great part of it will be so; yet I do not think that I should be justified in withholding it upon that presumption.

The Revenue.

H. OF R.

MR. RANDOLPH rose, he said, not to repeat the trespass he had already so frequently, during the discussion of the revenue system, committed on the politeness of the House, but to redeem himself from an apparent inconsistency in the vote he was about to give—he rose, but to explain.

If Government required any other supplies than those already granted, and he was bound to decide between the raising of it by a direct tax, and by internal taxes, he would prefer the former—because he was convinced that the principle of internal taxation, if once let to slip out of the hands of the House, would be gone forever from their grasp.

He dissented from Mr. GASTON's doctrine about paying off the public debt; and he acknowledged with him, that the way to meet an enemy, was to confront him directly; but how true soever that might be in the case of a conflict between man and man, it was not true of a financial difficulty, and he put it to Mr. GASTON to say, whether there were not instances in which it would be madness to pay off a portion of a debt unnecessarily.

The honorable gentleman (Mr. GASTON) had spoken of economy, and said that he was cheered by the promise of the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means that a system of accountability was about to be introduced; but he would tell both those gentlemen, that, to use the words of a rule in grammar, we should always find ourselves in the future in rus—we should never be nearer than about to be. No, no—he knew those concerned better. There were too many interested in keeping up the disease, for any one who knew them, reasonably to hope for a cure. We are corrupted, said he, we are corrupted with our own money. The purchaser is here. About to have accountability, indeed! when the finger of contempt is pointed at any man who dares to speak of accounting. I have seen a man laughed at, for only talking of the corruption of the Executive Department.

He then stated, that it was his intention on Monday, or whenever the House meant to act upon the measure now under consideration, to demonstrate, not to mathematical, but to moral certainty, that there is money enough without this tax, to support the Government—not, indeed, to support its extravagance—not to support its nepotism—not to support its abuses—but to uphold it, in the situation in which it was wont to be upheld, before this general solution of morals, that has come upon us; as it was under JEFFERSON and WASHINGTON—to pay the interest of the public debt, and to redeem the principal as soon as it had ever been thought advisable to redeem it, before certain new financiers found it convenient to think otherwise. "Timeo Danaos," said he, I shrewdly suspect, that they have no just view in this violent haste, all at once to pay off the debts, which, till now, they were well enough satisfied to leave to the regular course of liquidation.

Mr. R. said that he was willing to support the Navy, and to increase it from time to time, to a degree commensurate with the necessities of the country—to put into the hands of every militia-man, at once, a musket and a bible—in order to arm him with moral and physical force. He would also keep the existing fortifications in repair; and I will demonstrate, said he, that, for all these purposes, there are now, ample funds—but, I will not, therefore, agree, that because the ordnance has undergone some dilapidations, a million of dollars shall be given—and that forthwith—to increase it; or that while some objects are left unprovided for, others shall be starved or neglected.

After specifying some particular points, upon which he intended to animadvert on Monday, he declared that he should not be as liberal as Mr. GASTON was, on this occasion; he would require security—an endorser. That gentleman, he said, was out in his reckoning, if he thought that Government could be brought to account, by any provisions they could make for the purpose; for his part, he would not give a pepper-corn for their accountability. Who is your auditor? Who is your comptroller?—he exclaimed. Do you expect any effectual control over an Administration, through the medium of men who hold their offices by its gift, and are dependent on its will and pleasure? Look at your accounts! They are such accounts as no court would receive from a guardian or executor—nor any man of common sense receive from any other person, unless it were in the case of a friend, to whom he might say, "I'll take your word for it." No, no—no account can be had from them, but one general, systematic prostration of law and morals."

You cannot go even through the avenues of this House, said he, without meeting the public despoilers, with faces dressed in smiles, and bodies bending into bows; but if you are known to look deeply into them—if you are suspected of keeping them steadily in your eye, and of searching them through—they look at you, just as the nightly robber looks at the honest mastiff, lying before the door which he wishes to break open. I know them—and the nation shall know them. I shall not be deterred by delicacy—or etiquette, as it is called—from putting home questions, on this floor; and, if those questions shall be sanctioned by the votes of this House, I will lay before you such a scene of collusion, corruption, and public robbery, as never was brought to light before, in any age or nation. I know what I shall have to pay for this, but I care not; had I consulted selfish policy or personal ease, I should never have left home. I know what it is to rouse the guilty host; I know what it was to have roused the Yazoo clan, but I despise them all. I know the price I am to pay for my duty—I know that the assassin of reputation already nibs his pen for me, but that shall not deter me from a proceeding which I owe to my country, which I owe to myself, which I owe to my God.

After a few words against the motion from Mr. WOODWARD, and an ineffectual effort of Mr. HARDIN, to procure an adjournment, with the view of submitting, on Monday, some propositions which, if agreed to, would obviate the necessity of the direct tax; the question was taken on the motion to repeal the tax entirely, and decided in the negative, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Atherton, Baer, Barbour, Baylies, Blount, Boss, Bradbury, Breckenridge, Brigham, Brown, Bryan, Cady, Cannon, Champion, Cilley, Clarke of North Carolina, Cooper, Culpeper, Davenport, Goldsborough, Hale, Hardin, Hawes, Heister, Henderson, Herbert, Hulbert, Hungerford, Jackson, Jewett, Kent, King of Massachusetts, King of North Carolina, Langdon, Law, Lewis, Love, Lovett, Lyon, Mason, McCoy, McKee, Mills, Moore of South Carolina, Moseley, Noyes, Parris, Pitkin, Powell, Randolph, Reed, Reynolds, Rice, Ruggles, Sergeant, Sharpe, Shiefey, Smith of Virginia, Stanford, Stearns, Strong, Sturges, Taggart, Tallmadge, Tate, Taul, Thomas, Vose, Ward of Massachusetts, Ward of New York, Wheaton, Wilcox, Williams, Wright, and Yancey—73.

Mr. PICKENS then made a motion to amend the resolution for continuing a direct tax of three millions, so as to reduce the tax from three to two millions; but, before the question was taken, the House adjourned.

MONDAY, February 4.

Another member, to wit: from Maryland, SAMUEL SMITH, elected to supply the vacancy occasioned by the resignation of Nicholas R. Moore, appeared, produced his credentials, was qualified, and took his seat.

Mr. LOWNDES laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War to the Committee of Ways and Means, enclosing a detailed statement of the sums necessary for the Ordnance department for the year 1816. Ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. PLEASANTS, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, made a report on the petition of Captain Charles Stewart, late Commander of the frigate "Constitution," which was read; when Mr. P. reported a bill rewarding the officers and crew of the Constitution for the capture of the British sloop-of-war "Levant;" which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Governor of Ohio, announcing the unanimous rejection by the Legislature of that State, of the amendments proposed to the Constitution by the States of Massachusetts and Connecticut.

On motion of Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky,

Resolved, That the Committee on the subject of the Militia be instructed to inquire into the expediency of paying, for the term of six months, the officers and soldiers of the militia who were taken prisoners at Fort Meigs, in the late war, under the command of Colonel Dudley, who fell in battle on that occasion.

The motion of Mr. RANDOLPH to inquire into the causes of the variance in amount of the statements obtained from the Treasury in 1809, and at this time, in regard to the receipts and expenditures of the Government since the year 1789, was taken up and agreed to—no objection being made to it.

PETITION OF R. M. POMEROY.

Mr. YANCEY, from the Committee of Claims, made a report on the petition of Ralph M. Pomeroy; which was read, and the resolution therein contained was concurred in by the House.

The report is as follows:

That, on the 24th of November, 1812, and for some time previous thereto, the petitioner owned and occupied a dwelling-house in the village of Buffalo, in the State of New York; that, on the aforesaid day, a number of soldiers belonging to the United States Army came to his house, broke it open, destroyed his furniture, and set the House on fire and burnt it. The petitioner prays of Congress to be paid the value of his house and furniture.

It does not appear to the committee, from the ex parte evidence of the petitioner, what was the cause of such wanton and unlawful conduct on the part of the soldiery. However much it is to be deprecated in those who perpetrated the offence, yet it certainly has created no obligation, moral or legal, on the Government to pay for the injury. This principle has often been adopted, and is believed by the committee to be founded in a wise and just policy. They recommend to the House the following resolution:

Resolved, That the prayer of the petitioner ought not to be granted.

PETITION OF COLONEL SCHUYLER.

Mr. YANCEY made a report on the petition of Colonel Peter P. Schuyler; which was read, and the resolution therein contained was concurred in by the House. The report is as follows:

That, in 1812, the petitioner, late a Colonel in the thirteenth regiment of infantry, was assigned to the recruiting service, the head-quarters of which was in the city of New York; that he received from the Department of War, at several times, large sums of money for that purpose; that, in the month of August, 1812, he put into the post office, in the city of New York, two hundred dollars, enclosed in a letter addressed to Major Joseph L. Smith, then at Litchfield, Connecticut, for the recruiting service, and which Major Smith informed him did not reach him. The petitioner states that, upon a settlement of his accounts with the Department, that sum has not been paid him, because he could not produce a receipt from Major Smith. He asks of Congress to be allowed the sum in the settlement of his accounts.

It does not appear to the committee that the money was transmitted to Major Smith by mail, by the order of the Department; and, unless special orders for that purpose had been given, they are of opinion that the risk of such transmission was with the petitioner, and therefore he is not entitled to relief. They recommend to the House the following resolution:

Resolved, That the prayer of the petitioner ought not to be granted.

COMMERCIAL RESTRICTIONS.

Mr. KING, of Massachusetts, presented for consideration the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the Committee on Foreign Relations be instructed to inquire into the expediency of excluding from the ports of the United States all foreign vessels, owned in, coming from, bound to, or touching at, any of His Britannic Majesty's possessions in the West Indies, and in the continent of North America, from which the vessels of the United States are excluded; and of prohibiting, or increasing the duties on, the importation in foreign vessels, of any articles the growth, produce, or manufacture, of such possessions."

Mr. K. said, he was induced to present this resolution, as well from information as to the state of the trade already alluded to, received before and since he left that part of the country which he had the honor to represent, as from his own conviction of the necessity of some legislative provision on the subject. It is, said Mr. K., by no means the object of this resolution, to revive an extensive, odious, restrictive system, or commercial warfare with Great Britain; but justly to retaliate upon her some of those embarrassments, which her rigid colonial system is at this moment inflicting upon us. When you turn your attention to that nation, you do see in operation one of the most rigid, exclusive colonial systems that ever was adopted by any nation; well digested and prepared, as to her interest, for the present state of commerce in the world. I will ask your attention to its effects on our country, with relation to the possessions mentioned in the resolution; for as to our commerce with her European territories, the fate of that has been determined for four years, by the commercial convention. It will be seen that Great Britain had, before the formation of the arrangement with us, secured to her subjects in North America every advantage in her power, by securing to them a ready market for every article which they could furnish, at a very low duty; while on the same article, when imported in the vessels of the United States, or even British vessels from this country, a duty is imposed, amounting to a prohibition.

In relation, then, to this trade, all our vessels are permanently excluded from her islands and continental possessions in America. She did, indeed, for a time, offer one or two insignificant ports in the island of Bermuda, under great limitation, which we ought to have rejected with scorn. While the United States, on the contrary, threw all their ports open to British vessels of every description. She next selects from her stores such articles as are not important to her, and sends them to the United States; and also selects, in return, such articles as she cannot produce or do without; that is, she picks and culls our market, as a petty shopman does his wares; and we greedily receive whatever she is pleased to vouchsafe to us—a beggar, like us, devours the crumbs which fall from the rich man's table—we ought to spurn such a degraded, such a contemptible traffic. In regard, then, to the direct trade between the United States and the possessions named, the subjects of Great Britain are the only carriers; her ships from Great Britain may come to any of our ports with full freights of dry goods; with part of the proceeds purchase a load of lumber, stock, provisions, &c., (such I mean as they choose to admit in the islands,) sell it at their islands at great profit, take in a cargo of West India produce, and carry it to any part of Europe, giving them full freights in three distinct voyages. And a portion of our lumber, and pot and pearl ashes, will and does, by Champlain and other waters, find their way to the St. Lawrence, are bought up by the British capitalist at his own price, and sent to a most profitable market in Great Britain and the West Indies, giving employment to their ships and great profit to their merchants. The only way in which lumber, fish, flour, rice, &c., in our vessels, find a market in the British West Indies, is through some island belonging to some other foreign nation, less rigid than Great Britain in her colonial system; and in the same way we receive in our ships some of her products, all loaded with additional freight and insurance, for carriage among the islands. But of this, miserable as it was, we are in part deprived, or attempted to be, by an act of one of her colonial assemblies, made expressly against this country, and no doubt the same will be done in other islands. I allude to "An act laying a duty on certain goods, wares, and merchandise, imported into this island (Jamaica) from the United States of America, and other places," passed the 14th November, 1815, by which it is enacted, that, from the passing of that act, and during its continuance, there shall be levied and paid to His Majesty, &c., on all goods, wares, and merchandise, imported into that island "from any port or 'ports of the United States of America, or from 'any colony or plantation in America, belonging 'to, or under the dominion of any foreign European sovereign, in a state of amity with His Majesty, the following duties, viz., among others—
'For every barrel of wheat flour, not weighing

“more than 196, net weight, thirteen shillings and four pence.

“For 100 pounds of rice, six shillings and eight pence.

“For every 1,000 shingles, or Boston chips, not more than twelve inches in length, six shillings and eight pence.” (About three times the first cost, being what we call common shipping shingles.)

“For every 1,000 shingles more than twelve inches in length, thirteen shillings and four pence;” (being more than the value in the northern parts of this country.)

“For every 1,000 feet of white and yellow pine lumber of all descriptions, twenty shillings;” (which is above half the original cost in this country.)

Various other articles, on which specific duties are imposed in the same proportion, and an ad valorem duty of ten per cent. on all other articles which they see fit to admit. And information has been received that it is their intention, in relation to the article of plaster from Nova Scotia, to impose an export duty on it of five dollars the ton, (nearly its value in the Boston market,) when landed East of New Haven, so that their vessels may be the exclusive carriers to those States where it is used. The operation of this system in the North and East is such, that our lumber trade to the West Indies has been nearly destroyed, and two-thirds of the vessels in that trade thrown out of employ. I presume that nearly one-third of all the tonnage of Maine (which, in 1814, not a very propitious year, amounted to 125,000) was formerly employed in the West India trade. A large proportion of our vessels have now become useless, and British vessels have, in many cases, become our carriers.

The question then is, said Mr. K., whether we shall aid Great Britain to enforce her colonial system, exclusively for the benefit of her subjects, or retaliate upon her some of the injuries which we suffer from her navigation laws. It will be in vain, and worse than in vain, that we freed ourselves from former impositions and pretensions, if we must again be brought in subjection to colonial servitude.

The whole trade of this country is too valuable to be bartered away for a portion of that of any nation. I cannot admit the doctrine, that we have no equivalent to offer Great Britain for this trade; it carries its equivalent with it, as she may and ought to find it, in that immense traffic she enjoys with this country. She appeared disposed, by the treaty, to put the commerce of the two countries upon the most liberal ground of reciprocity. Instead of that, we do not gain half the advantages which we yield to her, while she closes so many of her ports against us. Whatever interest Great Britain has to favor the colonial trade of her subjects, we have none; nor ought we to aid her in this semi-terrapin policy. If these colonists suppose they can do without a trade, on the ground of reciprocity with us, let us see, in return, if we cannot do without a trade with them; one good effect, at least, will be produced: we shall encourage the production of sugar, molasses, rum, &c., in our Southern States; and thus, with the trade we shall enjoy with the colonial possessions of other nations in the West Indies, free our citizens from these colonial impositions. Unless foreign nations are disposed to trade with us on the ground of the most perfect reciprocity, I would reject their commerce, and by every means in our power encourage all articles, the growth, produce, or manufacture of our country, &c.

Mr. FORSYTH thought the resolution too limited in its terms. He therefore suggested an amendment, by inserting after the words “United States,” the words “or laying additional duties on.”

Mr. KING said, he had no kind of objection to the amendment, which he therefore accepted as a part of his motion.

Mr. BURWELL said, this was a proposition, it appeared to him, of such importance, that the House ought to act with much caution in respect to it. If the United States undertook to counter-vail the British colonial policy, it was in vain to suppose that it would not produce collision with that nation. The subject of this proposition would necessarily affect the consumers, and particularly the agriculturists of every part of the country. The course of this nation, on this subject should depend much on the policy pursued by the other nations of Europe in regard to those colonies. It was perfectly evident, Mr. B. said, that the effect of those measures of the British Government must be to embarrass the intercourse with her colonies, and enhance to the consumers in the islands the price of every necessary of life; if the policy of the other owners of islands in the West Indies should be more liberal, Great Britain will lose the benefit of the trade she burdens so heavily, and the evil will cure itself. England has a right to regulate the trade to her colonies as she pleases; and an attempt to coerce her to change her policy in this respect would, he apprehended, ultimately prove the commencement of a new commercial contest with England. He was, therefore, desirous that no decision should be made on this proposition, without mature consideration, and full information, particularly as to the policy of the other Powers in Europe who have colonies abroad.

Mr. KING spoke in reply, and in further support of his motion. He said, he had intended to have made this resolution more general, to counter-vail the restrictions and impositions to which our trade, with the colonial possessions of other foreign nations, is subjected. But, as we yet had no opportunity of forming any new commercial arrangements with other foreign nations, I thought it best, for the present, to omit them. Great Britain too, of all nations in the world, is bound to form with us the most liberal and reciprocal commercial arrangements; I mean from the amount and kind of trade which she enjoys with us. She receives from us the raw material to keep in motion a great proportion of her manufacturing industry and ingenuity, then sends a large proportion back in its finished state, as to manufacture, to be consumed in this country. Mr. K. further said, it might be feared by some, that the retaliation proposed would deprive us of some necessary supplies. I think not, said he; it is for the interest of the islands to receive various products of this country, in exchange for their produce. It will be impossible to prevent a traffic of this kind, through the possessions in the West Indies of other European Powers; from these possessions, then, and our Southern States, an abundant supply can be afforded. Will it not lead to a war with Great Britain? Just commercial retaliation can never be a just cause of war. When Great Britain thinks it for her interest to have a war with this country, pretexts will not be wanting. We are not to be deterred from any just or necessary measure by any fear of this kind; it is quite sufficient for us, that the interest of our citizens and the honor and dignity of this nation demand it.

Mr. WRIGHT said, he was surprised at any opposition being made to the adoption of a proposition to inquire into this highly interesting subject. He desired nothing more than reciprocity in our intercourse with Great Britain. But he was not to be deterred from countervailing her commercial regulations, by the fear of new collisions with her, and he hoped we should never let her transgress the rules of a just policy towards us, without attempting, by corresponding regulations, to bring her to a sense of justice. He would give her a carte blanche, to inscribe thereon what regulations she chose for her intercourse with us, provided they were exactly reciprocal. He was glad his honorable friend from the East had introduced this proposition, and he hoped it would be the means of bringing the question fully before the House. He would not supply her islands with a biscuit or a cigar, but on terms of reciprocity.

Mr. LOWNDES said, he hoped the gentleman from Massachusetts would permit such a modification of his motion, as should include in the inquiry not only the policy of Great Britain, but of other nations. He could see no reason why the measures of France, Spain, and Holland, respecting the trade with their colonies, should not meet the same counteraction. He could not, however, see the subject in the serious aspect in which it had appeared to the gentleman from Virginia. He could not agree in the opinion that it would involve us in a serious commercial conflict with England, because it did not propose an abandonment of her commercial system. Some discriminating duties might be adopted, not by way of retaliation of those imposed by Great Britain, but to induce her, by considerations of reciprocity and mutual convenience, to abandon those regulations. The adoption by this country of a policy which would only burden with considerable duties the vessels of those countries which exclude our vessels, &c., would merely have the effect of inviting a change of their system. It would be merely offering them an inducement to reciprocity. He could see no reason, however, why a distinction should be made in this proposition between Great Britain and other nations.

Mr. KING professed his readiness to give the inquiry the utmost latitude although his object had been more limited; and was willing to accept any amendment proposed for that purpose.

Mr. LOWNDES then moved to amend the resolve by striking out the words "of His Britannic Majesty."

Mr. WILDE said he did not rise for the purpose of opposing the motion of the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. KING.) He had no objection to consider the resolution, and he was in favor of the amendment proposed by the gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. LOWNDES.) But as his friend and colleague, the chairman of the Committee of Foreign Relations (Mr. FORSYTH) was not in the House at the time the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. KING) commenced his remarks, and therefore could not reply to some of them which he had not heard; Mr. W. thought it his duty to say a few words in answer to what had fallen from the honorable gentleman. He begged leave in the first place to recall to the remembrance of the House the fact that some days ago his friend, the chairman of the Committee of Foreign Relations, proposed certain amendments to the bill regulating the commerce of the United States with Great Britain according to the late convention, the object of which was to exclude vessels and goods not coming directly from the European territories of His Britannic Majesty, from the benefits of the act, agreeably to the fair and evident construction of the convention, as understood by both parties. These amendments were then rejected, although the effect of them was, to a certain extent, the same as the measures contemplated by the resolution of the gentleman from Massachusetts, and were rejected from a very fastidious delicacy about the construction of the treaty. Then it was contended that the terms of the treaty did not authorize us to say that British vessels coming from or touching at the West India islands or his Britannic Majesty's colonies in North America should be subjected to the payment of our discriminating duties. Now it is asked of us to increase those discriminating duties upon such vessels and their cargoes, on the ground that this species of trade is not at all within the provisions of the treaty. He would leave gentlemen to reconcile these different constructions of the same instrument as they could. To him it appeared there was no small share of inconsistency in such conduct. When the terms of the convention were to be found fault with—when those who made it were to be accused of sacrificing the interests of the country—then it meant one thing; when the interests of gentlemen's constituents required it, then it meant another. Mr. W. said, that on this subject it was also his duty to correct a mistake into which the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts had fallen—he called it a mistake, for as he was sincere himself he was willing to allow sincerity to all others; yet he certainly thought it strange that one so well informed as that honorable gentleman should have been misled upon such a subject. The honorable gentleman had stated to-day, and he had stated the same thing some days since in reference to the treaty, it might be taken as his deliberate opinion, that the interests of his part of the country were sacrificed in this convention to the interests of the cotton States—that the fisheries had been given up to preserve these interests—and that the grand object of the treaty seemed to be to secure to the Southern planters a saving upon their cotton, by the reduction of the British discriminating duties upon that article. Now, sir, I can assure the honorable gentleman that the Southern planter never felt the slightest inconvenience from the operation of those duties. He never got a cent less for his cotton—he only shipped it in British instead of American vessels, and the loss therefore fell upon the American shipowner, not on the agriculturist. Mr. W. said, he himself had received previous to his arrival at Washington various communications on this subject, but they all related to the owners of American tonnage and not to the planters of American produce. The argument which they all contained, was, not that our agriculture, but that our navigation would be ruined. Whom, sir, (said Mr. W.) would the ruin of our navigation most severely affect? Who own nine-tenths of the tonnage of the United States? Certainly the Eastern and Northern States. Mr. W. hoped it was unnecessary to say, that neither here nor elsewhere, had he been or would he ever be the advocate of local interests or the encourager of narrow and selfish jealousies, which had so long disturbed the repose and happiness of this Union. It was for this very reason that he had wished to correct the mistake of the gentleman from Massachusetts. Such statements go abroad and make injurious impressions; they induce our brethren of the East to believe that we of the South are hostile to their prosperity, destroyers of their commerce, in short, enemies and oppressors who have no community of feeling or of interest with them. It was very possible, Mr. W. said that his reply to this statement would have very little effect; most probably it would never reach the people of Massachusetts, whose prejudices, prejudices which had been purposely fomented, it was intended to remove. Still, however, he had felt it his duty to make it, in justice to the people whom he had the honor to represent, in justice to the Administration whom that people by choice supported, and for the sake of that union and harmony among the people of the United States, which all such mistaken views of public measures as that taken by the gentleman from Massachusetts had a tendency to destroy.

Mr. RANDOLPH said, we had just got out of a war with Great Britain, the foundation of which was laid some eight or nine years ago, by a resolution moved in this House at the instigation of commercial meetings in different seaport towns of the United States. He was not prepared now to say whether he was ready to recommence a system which might lead to the same practical and disastrous results; but this he would say, that the House ought not to act on a subject of this importance without one day's previous notice. He therefore moved to lay the resolution on the table.

Mr. KING, of Massachusetts, said, he had no more desire for a new war with Great Britain than the honorable gentleman; nor had he more agency in the late war than that gentleman—nor did he view his motion of that nature which could possibly lead to war, &c. He was proceeding to discuss its merits, when the SPEAKER reminded him the question was merely on postponement.

The question to lay the resolution on the table was decided in the affirmative.

THE REVENUE.

The House resumed the consideration of the proposition of the Committee of Ways and Means to continue the direct tax at three millions. Mr. PICKENS's motion to reduce the direct tax from three to two millions was negatived after a few observations from Mr. BRIGHAM and Mr. PICKENS. He then moved to reconsider the vote on repealing the tax. Mr. BARBOUR, in a neat and forcible speech, assigned the reasons why he was opposed to the continuance of this tax, because he believed it might be dispensed with without any detriment to the public interest. On motion of Mr. FORSYTH, Mr. LOWNDES assenting to it, the subject was ordered to lie on the table, to take up the following, the decision of which was considered to be more urgently demanded:

COMMERCE WITH GREAT BRITAIN.

The House then, on motion of Mr. FORSYTH, resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill from the Senate, concerning the commercial convention with Great Britain.

On motion of Mr. FORSYTH, the bill was amended from its declaratory form by striking out the whole of the bill, and inserting in lieu thereof, in the very terms, the bill which passed this House several days ago, and was rejected in the Senate.

This motion Mr. FORSYTH supported by a speech, in which he compared the merits of the two bills, and condemned the Senate's bill as an interference with the judicial power, and also as an attempt to deprive this House of its just powers in relation to the origination of propositions affecting the public revenue.

The bill having been thus amended, was reported to the House; and the question being on the concurrence in the amendments made in Committee—

Mr. LYON spoke as follows:

Mr. Speaker, it was my intention to have observed the same silence on this question, as I have on all others, since I had the honor of a seat in this House. But being called, once more, to give my negative, I deem it my duty, in a very simple and brief manner, to adduce some of the reasons which influence my conduct. The subject is of great moment, not as involving the acceptance or rejection of this treaty, on which all are agreed, but as defining the powers of the different branches of this Government—fixing the limits prescribed by the Constitution. It has been in operation for more than twenty years; and are we yet ignorant of the duties assigned, and the bounds set to our authority.

While my mind is whirling in the vast circle generated by the debate on this question, I can fix on objects with sufficient distinctness to influence my decision. I am obliged to cast from my notice a multitude of subjects brought into view, as being wholly unconnected with the point in debate.

The precedents which have been adduced, are discarded, as arising from questions totally distinct from that now before us. Precedents are in themselves important. When well founded, they should have their full weight, and cannot fail strongly to influence the inquiring mind; but when drawn from subjects remote from those which they are designed to influence, they mislead the judgment, and produce the most erroneous conclusions.

We have been often referred to the ratification of the British Treaty in 1795; but the ground then taken was very different from that which has now been assumed. The Opposition, in the House of Representatives, then condemned the President for proclaiming the treaty before it had been submitted for their sanction. They demanded that the whole correspondence, in forming the treaty, should be laid before them, that they might judge of its merits, and determine on the propriety of confirming or rejecting. Nothing like this has been avowed on the present occasion. No censure has been attempted against the proclamation, no resolutions have been moved for documents. The question on which the House then decided, was an appropriation of money, which all agree that this treaty does not require. The cases are so totally different, that proceedings on the one, can form no example for measures on the other. I know well that resolutions were then passed expressive of the opinion of the House, that when a treaty embraces those subjects which are expressly by the Constitution placed under the power of Congress, the concurrence of the House of Representatives is necessary to its full operation. This resolution I however considered as the manœuvre of a rear guard, to cover a retreat—they found they had occupied untenable ground, and they wished to retire as safely and decently as possible—the deliberation on an appropriation only, and even then they dare not risk the responsibility of refusing it. The first question was then above what was now assumed, and the last below it—neither, therefore, afford a precedent for the present occasion.

Concerning the law of 1798, it has been said, that, in requiring bonds to be given by the commanders of private armed vessels, the stipulations of the British Treaty of 1794 were enacted. This, however, is a misconception of that law. It requires that these bonds shall secure the observance, not only of the British Treaty, but of all treaties. We had treaties then existing with Prussia, with Sweden, the States General, and some others. In some of these, there was no formal stipulation for bonds to be given. That with the States General, required sufficient caution to be given, but did not fix the amount of the penalty. The law joined all these in one system, required the bond, fixed the penalty, and enjoined the observance of those that required no bonds, as well of those that did. It was not a mere echo of the British Treaty, but embraced subjects far more extensive.

The Treaty with Spain provided that goods, landed in our ports in consequence of distress and to make repairs, should not be subject to duties, on being reladen. A law is said to have been passed, enacting this stipulation, for the sake of carrying it into effect. A recurrence to this act will show, that it was not a repetition of that clause of the treaty, but embraced a very different subject. On the face of the treaty the provision appears to be for goods reladen on board the same vessel, after being repaired. The law provides for the case wherein the vessel should be found not seaworthy, and the goods should be laden on board another vessel. It also requires, that as duties had been received, in the case of the Nancy, they should be refunded. That law was entirely different from the amendment proposed to the bill from the Senate. This merely enacts the stipulations of the treaty—that embraced a new subject. That was necessary—this must be wholly useless.

The law making appropriations for carrying into effect the Treaty with France, is said to mention the restoration of vessels, and we are told that the Berceau was given up under this law, and not by the authority of the treaty. But does that statute require that vessels shall be restored? It does not. No such enacting clause is to be found. The restoration was made under the authority of the treaty, or by no authority whatever. The act gives the form of law to no stipulation of the treaty, but appropriates a specific sum to fulfil that obligation which the treaty itself had created.

The act authorizing the President to take possession of Louisiana, has also been mentioned as an instance of authority being given to a treaty by law. But surely this is wide from the purpose for which it has been adduced. The law contemplates a very different mode from that expressed by the treaty. The treaty proposes possession to be taken by commissaries, the law authorizes the President to possess and hold, by a military force.

The law regulating duties and drawbacks, in Louisiana, is said to have been unnecessary, on the principle which opposes this amendment. If the treaty, it is said, was sufficient to make that country a part of the United States, then all our laws would take effect there of course, and those which contravened them would be repealed. Waiving here any question whether the Constitution would admit of that addition, it is admitted that the treaty had made Louisiana a part of the United States, as to all its privileges. A similar effect of a treaty has been lately witnessed, on our Eastern border. By the Treaty of Peace, without any law to echo or enact its provisions, a part of the citizens of the United States have been placed beyond the power and privileges of our laws. But the treaty did not place Louisiana under the benefit of our laws. It stipulated that this should be done at an early future time. This could be effected only by law. The treaty contemplated this law, not to give effect to what it had done, but to perform what it had not done. By the law regulating trade the treaty was partly fulfilled, and, by the admission of that country into the Union as a State, all its privileges were conferred.

That part of this law which secured privileges to French and Spanish vessels, trading from their respective countries to Louisiana, has been mentioned as enacting merely the provisions of the treaty. It is true both the treaty and the subsequent law gave this right, for twelve years, but, in one essential point, the law differs from the treaty. The commencement of this term was not fixed by the treaty, but by the law it is particularly defined.

The law providing for the punishment of crimes committed in the Indian territory, has been also noticed as enacting the stipulations of the treaties with certain tribes. It does more. It fixes the place and process of trial, and extends its provisions not only to the territories of those tribes, with whom we have stipulations, but to all others. It is not the response of any particular treaty, but enacts those rules concerning which every treaty is silent.

The honorable gentleman who moved this amendment, has just brought into view the act of 1799, respecting the inland trade with Canada, as enacting the stipulations of the Treaty of 1794. This, sir, was a general law imposing and regulating the collection of duties. It was not by law giving effect to a particular treaty, as is now contemplated, but an extensive system, made in conformity to all existing treaties. When we pass a general law, as we must do when we establish our new tariff, it will be proper to fix, specifically, the duty and tonnage to be paid both by the British and Americans. That this act is not a mere echo of the treaty, will be seen by referring to the section on the importation of furs. By the treaty those only are free from duty which are brought by land, or inland navigation, the law exempts those introduced in any direction.

In all these precedents there is not one which compares with the amendment now proposed. Not one of them is merely the re-enacting the stipulations of a treaty. In every instance the law which was passed secures that, for which the treaty did not provide. Not one of them throws any light on this question, and, therefore, all are to be rejected.

I also dismiss from my consideration the British practice which has been so often brought into view. In that country, the genius of the Government is so different from ours, that no analogy, applicable to this case, can be traced. There the people can have no influence in making or confirming treaties but through the medium of the Commons in Parliament. The treaty-making power is hereditary, in the creation and continuance of which the freemen have no voice; the House of Lords is also hereditary or created by the breath of the Monarch. In the King belongs the power of making war, and peace, and all other international regulations. The voice of the nation cannot be heard, except in the act of Parliament, enacting or refusing the necessary laws. Here the case is very different, the President is chosen, once in four years, almost immediately by the people. The Senators are the representatives of the States. They are selected for a longer period than the President or the Representatives, and consequently, are further removed from the effects of party influence and popular change. The power of making treaties is lodged in safe hands, by the Constitution, nor can we need the check from the Commons, which is so important in Britain.

On this question I am not to be influenced by that frightful display of consequences, which has so often been made. We are not inquiring what rule ought to have been prescribed, but what is the path actually delineated by the Constitution. Recurrence to consequences would be highly proper, were we establishing a new Constitution, or passing resolutions to amend that which we now have. Were such our present business, we might, with propriety, view consequences in all their inviting and frightful forms, and shape our decisions accordingly. We might then talk of our own fatherly care, and the dreaded usurpation of the other branches. We might paint to our imaginations, convulsions, insurrections, revolutions, and freedom prostrate. We might listen, to use the language of the gentleman from Virginia, to the voice from Heaven and the blast from Erebus. But with these, our present subject has no connexion. No consequences, however dreadful in anticipation, should induce us to overleap the bounds prescribed by the Constitution. We are to presume that these were all considered, by those who made it. If we have doubts, a motion to amend that fundamental instrument is always in order.

Rejecting, then, from my consideration the precedents, the appeal to British practice, and the list of consequences which have been adduced, the subject is presented distinctly and within very narrow limits. The people are the sovereign—from them all power is derived. They have a right to withhold it, to give it, and to prescribe to it, when given, what limits they please. The different branches of this Government have been created and are limited by their will; on assuming a national character they perceived that different kinds of laws would be needed; they saw the necessity of laws regulating their intercourse with other nations, and the importance that they should be the result of the wisdom of both nations concerned, securing the rights of each, and having the binding authority of international compacts. These laws are called treaties; they embrace all subjects in which different nations can have a legitimate and proper concern. Whatever does not directly and intimately affect the interest of the other nation, cannot be the subject of an international compact; it must be left for each nation to determine in its own way. We made a treaty with Great Britain, stipulating, for certain good reasons, to pay her a sum of money. The sum and the rate of exchange were of importance to both nations, and therefore proper subjects of treaty. But from what sources this money should be derived, whether from imposts, excise, the sale of public lands, loans, or direct taxes, was of no importance only to ourselves. This, therefore, could not be the subject of treaty stipulations, but was to be determined by ourselves alone. This, sir, is the true boundary to which treaties may come, but should proceed no further. The people also, saw the necessity of other laws, not international, but binding only within our own territory and its dependencies. These municipal regulations are of different kinds, some operating only on the members of this body, some only on those of the other, as the rules of each House; others binding on all the inhabitants of our country, as the objects to be obtained may require. The making of these laws the people have assigned to different hands, and have pointed out the manner in which that duty shall be performed. The making of treaties they have committed to the President of the United States, but have enjoined, that he shall perform his duty, by and with the advice and consent of two-thirds of the Senators who shall be present. The power of corresponding and agreeing with foreign nations, of reducing the articles to form, giving them the force of a compact and finally ratifying the same, is with the President only. The Senate have no part but that of advising and consenting. In making some of the other laws each House has entire and exclusive authority. The rules by them made, within their proper sphere, have as high authority as any laws of the United States can have. Of the other laws, those for raising revenue must commence, be embodied and matured in this House only. We alone can introduce a new system for replenishing our Treasury, or bring forward a new tax, or move for the alteration of an old one. On this subject the Senate has no power but to propose or concur with amendments. Other laws may originate either in this House or in the Senate, and may be revised, amended, adopted, or rejected by either. All general acts and resolutions, before they become laws, must be laid before the President for his approbation; nor can they have any authority without his consent, or their being again passed by two-thirds of each House. In making treaties the President consults, proposes, arranges, and forces the compact, and the Senate can only accept or reject. In passing laws the two Houses propose, arrange, amend, and enact, and the President has only the power of recommending and approving and disapproving. Thus particularly have the people declared who shall make their different laws, and in what precise manner they shall be enacted. The code by which they have thus declared their sovereign will, is the Constitution, which they have made the supreme law, paramount to every other law, and the foundation of all the authority which this Government or any of its branches can use. In this distribution of power no right is given to this House to interfere with the treaty-making power. This is as exclusively given to the President, with the advice and consent of the Senate, as the making of our own rules is given to this House, or the enacting of laws, with the approbation of the President to the two Houses. The President and Senate with as much propriety may claim to ratify or reject the rules of this House as we can interfere with the confirmation of any treaty which they have made. We adopt rules and execute them by the admission, expulsion, or punishment of our members. Has the President or the Senate any right to control or say it shall not be, because they are a part of the law-making power? They are part of that power with respect to general laws, but over the laws of this body they have no control; and as little have we over those laws which are called treaties. It was a charge of the great WASHINGTON, "let nothing be done by usurpations." The safety and life of this Government depend on each branch knowing and performing its particular duty. Should the President this day recommend a particular branch of revenue, should the Senate send us a bill to impose a tax for that purpose, how should we receive it? Should we not spurn it with indignation from our table? Should we not consider it a high encroachment upon our rights, an unwarrantable contempt of the Constitution? In the same light may they view our interference with the ratification of treaties. I am aware the 1st section of the Constitution declares that "all legislative powers therein granted shall be vested in a Congress, which shall consist of a Senate and House of Representatives." But attention to the different articles, will show that "all legislative powers," in that section, does not mean all the powers to be used in making laws. Powers to be so used, to say nothing here of the rules of the two Houses, are granted to the President, to a convention, and to the Legislatures of the different States. No act of the two Houses, can become a law till it has been presented to the President for his approbation. Articles of the Constitution become laws, when proposed by two-thirds of both Houses, or by a convention, and are ratified by the Legislatures of three-fourths of the several States. Powers to be used in making laws are lodged in different hands, besides those of Congress. "All legislative powers," in the first section, therefore, must mean, not all that are authorized to be employed in making laws, but such as are distinct from the other two branches of powers the Executive and the Judicial. An act may have all the authority which these legislative powers can give it, and yet not be a law; and that may be a law, and paramount to other laws, which these legislative powers have never enacted. Law is, whatever the Constitution has declared to be such. Legislative acts, made in pursuance of the Constitution, are laws, because the Constitution has so declared them. Conventional acts, duly ratified, are laws, because the Constitution has made them so. And Executive acts, called treaties, made under the authority of the United States, are equally laws; because the Constitution has given them that authority. Neither are laws merely because the legislative powers have passed them, but each are the supreme laws of the land, because they are so declared by that authority over which the legislative powers have no control.

Treaties, then, are laws, and as such, have operative force as other laws. They cannot repeal or set aside the Constitution; nor can this be done by any legislative acts. That they have equal grade with other laws, subordinate to the Constitution, is certain, from their being declared the supreme laws of the land; and from the judges in every State, and of the supreme and inferior courts of the United States, being bound by them. If they are laws, they have power to repeal prior, contravening laws; for it is absurd to suppose two conflicting laws, in equal force, at the same time. According to this interpretation of the Constitution, all its provisions perfectly harmonize; on any other, they are at variance with themselves.

If further reasons, in support of this opinion are demanded, I answer, it was the intention of the Convention which formed the Constitution to give this power to the President and Senate. They said "the President shall have power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties," without mentioning this House, because they intended to exclude the Representatives from any share in making or confirming those laws. A proposition was made in that body that "no treaty should be valid, until it should be ratified by law." This restriction was rejected, and nothing more was required, to give a treaty its utmost validity, as a supreme law, than its ratification by the President, in conformity to the advice and consent of two-thirds of the Senate. It has, indeed, been said, that the makers of the Constitution are not its best interpreters. This is, in a degree, true, for we are not to be governed by what they intended, but by what they have declared. But when the interpretation appears to conform to the most natural meaning of the words, and the framers of the instrument assure us, that they used those words with intent to convey such meaning, and confirm their testimony by the record of their proceedings, we have the highest possible evidence that it is the true import.

The State conventions for ratifying the Constitution gave it that construction which is now contended for. In more than one it was made an objection, that as the Representatives were not to be consulted in forming treaties, the majority in the Senate ought to have been, not two-thirds of those present, but two-thirds of the whole number. It does not appear that, in a single instance, it was supposed that this House was to be consulted in the ratification of any treaty.

The same opinion appears to have been held by Congress, in all its sessions, down to the present time. Not one treaty in ten has had any law passed concerning it. Are these all yet invalid? Where laws have been passed, they have not been for enacting the provisions of the treaties, but for extending them, providing means for carrying them into effect, or fixing what they had left uncertain. No act like that now contemplated, a mere echo of the treaty, has ever become a law, or, until now, been reported to this House. Treaties embracing almost every subject, receiving foreigners as citizens, and yielding citizens to the control of foreigners; making goods contraband of war, or free; establishing boundaries, and regulating duties and tonnage have been carried into full effect, without any laws enacting their particular stipulations. Without legislative enactment they have set aside all laws interfering with them; they have been the rule by which the Executive has been guided, the judiciary has decided, and by which the most important national concerns have been conducted. Would this have been, if legislative interference had been necessary?

If treaties have not the authority of laws until their provisions have been enacted by Congress, we ought surely to pass those laws with that well-informed deliberation which their importance demands. A view of the instructions and correspondence, according to which the various concessions and arrangements were made, is as necessary for this House as for the Senate. But no such documents have accompanied any treaty, which has been laid before the House of Representatives. They have been called for but in one instance, and that call was positively refused by WASHINGTON himself, because the treaty had full authority without their decision. In this refusal, every succeeding Congress has acquiesced.

That a treaty has all the force of law, without the aid of Congress, was the decided opinion of President WASHINGTON, as was read by an honorable gentleman the other day. As a member of the Convention, and its President, he must have known the intention of that body, and finding it plainly expressed in the written Constitution, he uniformly declared this to be the true construction, and practiced accordingly, under the most solemn responsibility.

Mr. Jefferson also early embraced the same opinion. Of his decisions, when correct, I most cordially approve. In 1790 a treaty was made with the Indians of the Creek nation. They wished that the goods they should receive should be imported free from duties. The President submitted to the Heads of Department this question, whether a treaty with that nation would authorize the admission of those goods, without paying the duties. Mr. Jefferson, then Secretary of State, gave his opinion, that "a treaty made by the President, with the advice and consent of two-thirds of the Senate, was a law of the land, and would repeal past laws." In this opinion it is believed the whole Cabinet agreed. This was not a vapor of philosophy—a mere theoretic fancy—it was a solemn decision of an important question brought to the test of practice.

Mr. Madison appears also to be of the same opinion. The late Treaty of Peace contains many important stipulations. It cedes the present possession of territory, it authorizes Commissioners to establish our whole Eastern and Northern boundary, it submits to their decision the jurisdiction of tracts of much value and of great importance to our frontiers. On this he has acted; he is carrying its provisions into effect; he has commanded all officers, civil and military, faithfully to observe and fulfil it; he has appointed the Commissioners, and doubtless assigned them their pay, and given them their instructions. All this has been done without a legislative act, confirming the treaty or enacting any of its stipulations. He has called for no such act, and appears never to have deemed it necessary. Does he require a ratification of the treaty to be carried into effect by this amendment? What, sir, has he sent us? Take it from your table, look at it, examine it carefully. What is it? It is nothing more than a scrap of a newspaper. It purports to be nothing more than the copy of a proclamation, not of a treaty. Are we to ratify, confirm, give life and energy to this? Had he deemed our approbation necessary, his wishes would have been expressed in a very different manner. Before the Senate he laid the original official treaty. Such documents as were necessary to understand it, and the reasons why it was made, were also presented for their information. As nothing of these came to us, it is evident he contemplated the passage of no such bill as is contained in this amendment. He considers the treaty as being now in full force, and needing no aid from us. It is, however, said that this cannot be the opinion of the President, for he instructed Mr. Russell to stipulate "that the employment of British seamen should be prohibited by law." If he considered a treaty to be law, why engage, by a treaty, to make a law? The answer is at hand. The manner and the penalty of the prohibition are entirely municipal, and therefore could not be fixed by treaty. In the thing promised the other nation has a concern, but the manner of fulfilling the stipulation belongs wholly to ourselves, and must be determined by our legislative acts.

Where, then, it is gravely inquired, is the power of Congress to regulate trade? It is not certainly in this House, the Constitution has not placed it there, but in the two Houses of Congress. There it remains entire, notwithstanding the extent of the treaty-making power. Whatever regulations we make, with the concurrence of the Senate, and approbation of the President, or without his assent, under certain restrictions will be the laws of the land, and will repeal all prior conflicting laws, whether in the form of acts or treaties. But can the consent of the Senate be obtained to any bill in opposition to the provisions of the convention? We know it cannot. The power then contended for by the advocates of this amendment is not of regulating trade, but of embarrassing the regulations that are attempted. Not of introducing order, but confusion into all proceedings on that important concern. But is the power of regulating trade taken away, by the interpretation of the Constitution contended for, even in the case now before us? Not in the least? The treaty fixes only the equality of duties and tonnage, not the quantum; this is yet to be determined by law. We may reduce the rate of British vessels until they shall equal the American, or raise our own until they equal the foreign standard, or we may deviate from both, either by diminution or excess. A law thus regulating our trade with Great Britain will be necessary, and will doubtless be comprised in the bill for a new tariff, if not otherwise obtained. This law, when it shall be passed, will determine not the equality, which is already fixed by the treaty, as is proposed by this amendment, but the precise sum which is to be received from British subjects and from Americans.

It has often been inquired whether this House is bound to carry into effect such treaties as the President and Senate shall make? Most certainly. We are bound by all laws which are constitutionally enacted. If the treaty is so made as to become the law of the land, it binds this House, the other branches of the Government and every individual of the community. After the Government has been in operation for so many years, have we yet to learn that all laws, while they continue laws, are binding on all persons and all bodies? In some countries there are orders and individuals who are above the laws, but we have reason to be thankful that here there are no such privileged orders. Whatever is necessary to be done to give effect to a law by the President, by the Senate, by this House, by any officer or by any citizen, each is bound by that law to perform it. There is, there can be no exception. If we can obtain the necessary consent of the other branches, we can repeal a law, but until that repeal is effected, we are, and must be bound to observe it. Treaties may be repealed, or set aside for good reasons, as well as other laws, and a majority of the two Houses, with the approbation of the President, can at any time render them void. But, while they remain in force, this House is bound to obey them, and do every incumbent act to give them complete effect.

The late Treaty of Peace has been confirmed by no law enacting its stipulations. The President and Senate, however, have appointed the Commissioners, as agreed, to ascertain our Eastern and Northern boundary. One honorable gentleman has been taken from this House. They have probably made arrangements for the performance of their duties, and will soon enter upon them. When the arduous task is performed, shall we be under no obligations to make appropriations for their services? Can we plead we never ratified the treaty, and therefore we are not bound? The principle is too absurd to be admitted for a moment.

If it be so, says an honorable gentleman, the President and Senate, by the aid of a foreign Power, or even of a Chickasaw chief, may levy and repeal taxes. Not so; such monstrous consequences do not follow. The laying and repealing of taxes are municipal acts, with which foreign nations can have no proper concern. They cannot, therefore, be the subjects of treaty stipulations. Beside, all bills for raising revenue must originate in this House. They cannot be introduced, much less completed, by the President, nor Senate, nor by both united.

It has been, however, confidently asserted, that if such be the treaty-making power it may obtain a subsidy, and apply it for its own purposes. One gentleman has assured us that, by treaty, money to any amount may be placed in the hands of the Paymaster General, and thus wars, if not commenced, may be prolonged without legislative consent. But here, too, the Constitution has introduced an ample guard. If the subsidy be made to the United States, it must be paid into the Treasury, and cannot be drawn therefrom but by an appropriation passed in this House. If it be made to an individual officer it is expressly forbidden—"that no person holding any office of 'profit or trust, shall, without the consent of Congress, accept of any present or emolument from 'any king, prince, or foreign State.'" A gentleman from Virginia has with much complacency inquired, which is most safe, to lodge this extensive power with the President and Senate only, or to require the consent of the popular branch, the more immediate representatives of the people? With leave from that gentleman, and from his known candor I am sure he will indulge me, I would somewhat vary the question. Would it not be more safe to disregard the Constitution than to obey it; to leap the bounds prescribed, than to keep within them? I might ask, also, would it not be more safe to extend our case not only to the Senate, but to the courts of justice? They may be ignorant or corrupt—juries may be led astray—would it not increase our safety for the representatives of the people to revise their proceedings; to make it more certain that the innocent shall be acquitted and the guilty condemned?

Is this, Mr. Speaker, the inquiry of the people? No; they have already declared, by the adoption of the Constitution, in whose hands they deem this concern most safely lodged. Their laws for raising revenue they have intrusted to us in the first place; their ordinary municipal regulations they have placed in our hands, in concurrence with the Senate and President, but the formation of their compacts with other nations they have committed exclusively to the President and Senate. It is this House that makes the inquiry. Flushed with self-approbation, we imagine ourselves not only immaculate, but impeccable. This, sir, is natural. It is no new language to say, O that I were made judge in the land, and I would do justice. All that need to be said here is, the people in their wisdom have thought differently.

But what is this House, concerning which this inquiry of safety has been made? It is that body which, when the people, by their representatives, would have complained, has commanded silence; when they were proposing measures of relief, has denied the liberty of speech; when presenting amendments to burdensome laws, has refused to hear them; when attempting to plead their own cause, to use a favorite expression of a gentleman from Virginia, has put a gag in their mouth, lest a shriek should give the alarm. This is the body with whom it is imagined our treaty-making concerns might be intrusted with such perfect safety. Is it said this obnoxious rule is now to be laid aside? I ardently hope and confidently believe it will; but does not the fact of its having existed so long, in opposition to every correct principle and every right, but that of power in the minority, give us reason to fear it may return? The people, sir, have made a wise choice; they have placed this important power in the safest hands, as appears from abundant experience.

This bill has been called a disease; a disease, not dangerous from its nature, but from the treatment it has received. I, sir, would rather call this itch for power the disease. This leaping Constitutional bounds, this grasping at authority on every side, is a political disease, contagious, malignant, and extremely dangerous. Unless promptly checked, it will inevitably prove fatal. It has brought to the dust most of the free Governments which have been in the world; some by sudden revolutionary spasms, and some by more lingering, but not less certain decay. This disease, unless speedily cured, will prove fatal to us. Its symptoms are many; it indicates to be deeply seated in this House, the very vitals of our Government.

It is but a few hours, Mr. Speaker, since I had the honor of a seat on this floor. During this short space, within these walls, which should be sacred to liberty and Constitutional order, I have heard that, at which I am astonished, at which my soul has trembled. Authority, sovereign, uncontrolled, unbounded by any law, has been claimed for this House. On the one hand, the treaty-making power is denounced for pursuing the plainest directions of the Constitution, for not stooping to the high command which we are pleased to assume. On the other, the courts of justice are condemned for presuming to give preference to the Constitution over the laws which we have enacted. Though their power extends to "all cases in law and equity, arising under the Constitution and the laws;" yet, if they dare to decide against an act of ours, which opposes the Constitution, here it is declared usurpation—an abridgment of the sacred rights of the guardians of the people. Where, sir, will this thirst for power, this spurning at all restraint, lead us? Go but a little further, sir, and decrees of condemnation, and execution for treason will issue from your table. Go but a little further, sir, and your Sergeant-at-Arms will bring from his cell your prisoners, to the block or the stake. Yes, sir, take but a few steps more, and you plunge whence you never, never can return, but by blood, convulsion, and all the horrors of revolution.

When Mr. LYON concluded, Mr. FORSYTH briefly replied.

The question on concurring in the amendments which go to substitute the bill which first passed this House, in lieu of the Senate's bill, was then decided: For the amendments 81, against them 70, as follows:

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill read a third time to-morrow.

TUESDAY, February 5.

Mr. HUGER submitted the following resolution, which was read and ordered to lie on the table:

Resolved, That a select committee of — members be appointed, to examine generally into the subject of unsettled balances due the United States, and especially into the annual statements laid before Congress by the Comptroller of the Treasury, in conformity to an act of the third of March, 1809, requiring that an annual statement should be laid before Congress of the accounts in the Treasury, War, and Navy Departments, which may have remained more than three years unsettled, or on which balances appear to have been due more than three years prior to the 30th September then last past; to investigate the causes which have given rise to such extensive unsettled balances; to recommend such measures as may in their opinion be most likely to bring defaulters to a speedy settlement of their accounts, and prevent, in time to come, the recurrence and continuance of unsettled balances to so large and alarming an amount.

A message was received from the President of the United States respecting the lands in the Michigan Territory, designated by law towards satisfying the land bounties promised to the soldiers of the late army, &c.; which was referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a letter from the Register of the Treasury, and two statements in answer to the resolution submitted by Mr. RANDOLPH on the second instant, and adopted by the House yesterday; which were ordered to lie on the table.

The bill from the Senate "concerning the convention to regulate the commerce between the United States and His Britannic Majesty," was read the third time as amended, and passed.

The House, on motion of Mr. KING, resumed the consideration of the resolution submitted by him yesterday. He then withdrew his motion, and in lieu thereof laid on the table, for future consideration, the following:

Resolved, That the Committee of Foreign Relations be instructed to inquire into the expediency of excluding from the ports of the United States, or of increasing the duties on all foreign vessels owned in, coming from, bound to, or touching at, any of the possessions of any nation of Europe in the West Indies, and in the continent of America, from which the vessels of the United States are excluded, and of prohibiting or of increasing the duties on the importation in foreign vessels of any articles of the growth, produce, or manufacture of such possessions.

This motion lies on the table.

STAFF OF THE ARMY.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported a bill for organizing the general staff, and making further provision for the Army of the United States, which was read twice and committed to the Committee of the Whole on the bill making provision for an additional military academy.

Mr. JOHNSON also communicated the following document:

WAR DEPARTMENT, Dec. 27, 1815.

SIR: In replying to your letter of the 21st instant, inquiring into the expediency of providing by law for the staff appointments which have been provisionally retained, and for such others as the interest of the service may require, it is presumed that the intention of the Committee over whose deliberations you preside is to give to the Military Peace Establishment that organization which is necessary to secure to it all the efficiency which can be expected from its numerical force. The experience of the two first campaigns of the last war, which has furnished volumes of evidence upon this subject, has incontestably established not only the expediency, but the necessity of giving to the Military Establishment, in time of peace, the organization which it must have to render it efficient in a state of war.

It is believed also to be demonstrable, that a complete organization of the staff will contribute as much to the economy of the establishment as to its efficiency.

The stationary staff of a military establishment should be substantially the same in peace as in war, without reference to the number or distribution of the troops of which it is composed. It is, therefore, respectfully proposed that this branch of the general staff be organized in the manner following, viz :

One adjutant and inspector general, at Washington.
 One quartermaster general, at Washington.
 One paymaster general, do.
 One commissary general, at Philadelphia.
 One apothecary general, do

The organization of the division of staff should be regulated by the number of independent corps into which the military force is distributed. By general order of the 17th May last, the United States were divided into military divisions, commanded by generals, independent of each other, within their respective divisions. As nothing has occurred, since this distribution of the military force has been made, to change the opinion which was then entertained of its expediency, it is proposed to organize the division staff so that each division shall comprehend—

One adjutant general and two assistant adjutant generals;

One inspector general and two assistant inspector generals;

One quartermaster general and two deputy quartermasters general, with regimental quartermasters, as at present authorized;

Three judge advocates;

Two chaplains;

One deputy commissary general and two assistant commissaries of issues, four hospital surgeons, and eight hospital surgeons' mates, and as many post surgeons, with the pay and emoluments of hospital surgeons' mates, as the distribution of the forces into garrisons and posts may require, not exceeding twelve;

Four assistant apothecaries;

Two assistant deputy paymasters, with regimental paymasters, as now established.

It is not deemed necessary to change the organization of the corps of artillery, the corps of engineers, or the ordnance department, unless the committee should be disposed to increase the corps of engineers. Considering the qualifications of the officers of that corps, and the great utility which may be derived from transferring them into the line of the Army, when a sudden augmentation of the Military Establishment should become necessary at the approach of war, some increase of that scientific corps is respectfully submitted.

The act fixing the Military Peace Establishment has produced some inequalities in the pay and emoluments of the officers, which, owing to the particular circumstances under which that act was passed, it is probable were neither foreseen nor intended. One case of this nature is the allowance of forage to a major general of twenty dollars a month, whilst the adjutant general is allowed thirty. The allowance of a clerk to one of the major generals, and not to the other, must have proceeded from the same cause. The fact of these inequalities are mentioned here with a view to attract the attention of the committee to the pay and emoluments of the officers of the Army generally.

Should any explanations growing out of this communication be required, it will afford me great pleasure to give them, in writing or verbally, to the committee, whenever it shall suit their convenience.

I have the honor to be, respectfully, your very humble servant,

WM. H. CRAWFORD.

THE REVENUE.

The House resumed the consideration of the proposition of the Committee of Ways and Means to continue the direct tax of three millions another year.

Mr. PICKENS's motion to reconsider the vote on the question of repealing said tax being under consideration—

Messrs. LOWNDES, HANSON, and SERGEANT, spoke at length against this motion, and Messrs. STEARNS, ATHERTON, RANDOLPH, and PICKENS, in favor of it; the debate turning on the merits of the proposed direct tax, on general principles, at the present conjuncture of our affairs. Mr. TUCKER spoke briefly in explanation.

Mr. ATHERTON spoke as follows:

Mr. Speaker, if it appeared to me that a direct tax was necessary, either for the support of the public credit, or to meet any system of public expenditure, of which I could approve, it should not fall for the want of my support. But believing, as I do, that a direct tax is not wanted for either of those purposes, I shall use my vote and my endeavors to procure its repeal. This course I should take, even if I did not feel any particular hostility to a direct tax; for I should think it correct to avail myself of what I hope will be the prevailing disposition of the House, to effect an alleviation of the public burdens, where there seems the greatest probability of success. Yet there are gentlemen, no enemies to lessening those burdens, who will take no reduction, because they cannot procure it in taxes, which they esteem more objectionable. They are willing to sacrifice a general object to one of minor consequence. I shall act, sir, upon a different principle. I say retrench; and if I cannot have retrenchment when I would, I will take it when I can.

I presume, sir, there is no member of this House so little acquainted with the concerns and feelings of his constituents, as not to know that the direct tax is the most offensive of any on the long catalogue of taxation. This is not a sudden and impetuous disgust on the part of the people. It is of long standing; it has been uniform and universal. "Consideration, like an angel, has come;" yet the people are hostile to this tax. Upon every principle that binds a representative to his constituent, these circumstances are entitled to great weight and deep consideration in all parts of this House. By this repeal, we should diffuse a general joy throughout the great mass of the American population. It is certainly worthy our most serious deliberation, whether these universal impressions of the people upon this subject are not well founded.

During this discussion, various reasons have been assigned why the people do, and why they ought to, feel a peculiar jealousy against this mode of approaching their purses and property, on the part of the General Government—these reasons I shall not repeat. But, there are gentlemen here who profess to be attached to this tax, because they say it is an equal tax; others say, that if not equal, it has the happy power of making even the inequalities of the other taxes; that it bears with a light hand where other taxes press heavily, and that it bears with a heavy hand where other taxes press lightly. They, in short, represent it as a smoothing plane, that reduces to a perfect level the superficies of taxation, and that no system of taxation can be perfect without it. Others imagine that the States not holding slaves ought to cling to this mode of raising money as favorable to them—as the consideration which they receive for having consented to a diminished representation in this body. To these views, I wish to draw the consideration of the House. From a document that has been laid upon our tables, in pursuance of a resolution which I had the honor of moving the other day, and from some other sources of information, of the correctness of which I entertain no doubt, results follow not favorable to either of the positions above stated. No proposition can be more fallacious than that a tax is equal, because it is apportioned according to numbers. This pre-supposes an equality of property, which does not exist. If the rate per centum on a hundred dollars of valuation be not the same, the tax is unequal. How is this with us, next to the direct tax of six millions? Massachusetts pays forty-two cents on the hundred dollars of valuation; New Hampshire fifty-two cents, and Vermont sixty-two cents; while Connecticut pays only twenty-six cents, New York thirty cents, and Pennsylvania twenty-two cents. That is to say, New Hampshire pays twice as much as Connecticut, and Vermont twice as much as New York, and nearly three times as much as Pennsylvania. New York as easily pays its proportion of a direct tax of four millions as New Hampshire does its proportion of a direct tax of two millions. Vermont pays its proportion of a direct tax of six millions, when Pennsylvania only pays its proportion of two millions—that is, if the valuation of property be taken as the basis of taxation. These returns are in the office of the Secretary of the Treasury; the results are undeniable. Where, then, I ask, is the boasted equality of this tax, and how does it show its mercy to those States that pay an undue proportion of the other taxes? What States pay the tax on salt? Massachusetts, New Hampshire, and Vermont. What States pay the enormous duty on imported rum? Massachusetts, New Hampshire, and Vermont. What States are most severely oppressed with the land tax? The same. Nor do I find any relief from this picture, by observing how it operates on the slaveholding States. Maryland, for instance, pays twenty-five cents on the valuation of one hundred dollars; Virginia pays twenty-eight cents. But it may be said that this includes the valuation of their States. True, it does; but exclusive of their slaves the tax would only be increased four cents in Maryland, and perhaps six cents in Virginia, leaving them at about one-half what New Hampshire and Virginia pays. If, sir, any confidence is to be attached to these results, it follows—

1st. That a direct tax is oppressively unequal.

2d. That it does not restore the inequalities of the other taxes, but increases their unequal operation.

3d. That the States not holding slaves cannot discover in this mode of raising money anything favorable to them.

Indeed, sir, if they expected to receive, in direct taxation, as regulated by the Constitution, a compensation for having bartered a portion of their independence, they have been most grossly deceived. In the language of poor Richard, they have "paid too dear for the whistle." This tax is also particularly severe in its pressure upon those farmers who are in debt for their land, which is the case with a large portion of our young men, and upon those whose farms are only cultivated in part, when the labor goes to improving and enhancing the value of the farm, but not to the production of a crop. In such case it operates as a tax on industry, and not on income. The fluctuating state of the population of the United States is also another source of inequality. While some States have, since the last census, gained an additional population, sufficient to entitle them to two and three Representatives, other States have been nearly stationary; but the tax is levied according to the population of 1810, which varies materially from the present population, and weighs most heavily against those States that have so many other reasons to complain against this tax.

Besides, sir, I must confess that I feel strong objections against the apparatus and machinery which this tax requires. I accord most sincerely with the honorable member from Massachusetts, whose head is whitened with the frosts of seventy, but whose mind still blooms in the verdure of Spring, in a reply which he so happily made the other day, that "Executive influence had increased, was increasing, and ought to be diminished." As nearly as I can calculate, it takes a standing army of about three thousand retainers of the Government to assess and collect a direct tax in the United States. That is, about one man to every thousand dollars of tax, of which he takes from one to two hundred dollars. This is an army, in my opinion, quite too numerous for a Peace Establishment. I am for disbanding them, and for doing it so effectually that there shall be no excuse for retaining, brevetting, or paying any portion of the staff provisionally. I cannot, sir, but indulge the hope that a revenue of thirty-six millions, exclusive of the direct tax, will satisfy the demands of the Government for the current year.

We are too, sir, at the close of a war which has not added to the resources of our country—of a war in which Canada has not been taken—of a war in which no rights have been secured to the merchant flag. Gentlemen do not seem to remember, that prior to this war, and as if preparatory to it, we were sweated to exhaustion by the empiricism of embargo, non-importation, and non-intercourse; that while we were suffering under the weakening influence of their prescriptions, there was administered to our unwilling throats the caustic bolus of war. The people, sir do not expect to be followed up by a course of mercurials in the form of taxes. Your encour agements their expectations require; their condition will imperatively demand of you the adoption of a system of economy and retrenchment. Sir, like the gentleman from South Carolina, I would cultivate moral power. I would cherish that high and independent spirit which should make this people feel and know that they were superior to the people of every other country on earth, superior in intelligence, superior in mental resources, superior in civil and political privileges. But how would I do this? Not by causing them to doubt whether they possessed these privileges. Not by alienating their affections from the Government by exactions unreasonably severe. No, sir, I would cause them to know, that upon them you depended for the essential defence of the country; that you cherished their comforts and rejoiced at their blessings. Leave them something worth preserving, and they will preserve it by their valor and virtue. I would cause them ever to be more proud of their condition than of your establishments, however great, supported at their expense. Sir, I would not repudiate a Navy; I would support and increase it. But I would reject most promptly and decisively all those wild, magnificent projects of expense and military fame which seem to have seized the imaginations of some. They are of the most alarming import to the American people. I see in them an entire change of the policy of our ancestors; I see in them interminable wars—a great crop of military glory; but the subversion of the Constitution, and a system of unrelenting taxation, that will make this people the veriest slaves to the exactions of the General Government. Between the adoption of such a policy and the liberties of this country there is no Rubicon—it is already passed—the die is cast, and Cæsar is in hostile march to the Capitol.

At no period since the establishment of the independence of the United States has there been, in my opinion, a fairer prospect for the continuance of peace than at the present moment. Happy, thrice happy should we be, if we would learn justly to appreciate our own blessings. Yes, sir, never a fairer prospect for the continuance of peace, unless we destroy that prospect by the blasting mildew of our own folly and madness. Great Britain, sir, made a peace with you, at a time when all her other enemies were prostrated at her feet; when she was flushed with victory; when her army and navy were in the highest possible state of discipline and preparation; when her undivided force could have been directed against us. And, what is of more importance, she concluded a peace with you when it was universally believed in England that her forces were in possession of New Orleans. If, sir, she made peace with us under such circumstances, how heated with an unreasonable jealousy must be that imagination which can see in the relative situation of the two countries, an interest and a desire on her part to renew the contest. Spain must feel the deepest interest to preserve the relations of peace with this country. This she must continue to do so long as she has any claims upon Mexico and South America. I hope we shall treat Spain with the most exemplary justice, but such is the crippled condition of that monarchy, and such her peculiar situation as respects the United States, that although we should treat her with the most direct and positive injustice, however she might complain, she would not push those complaints to the extremity of war. Whence then, sir, these alarms of war? Whence the necessity of great military preparations and expensive enterprises? Why is the war-whoop kept up? Why are ghosts and hobgoblins so adroitly moved back and forth before terrified imaginations? One gentleman imagines that he sees in the circumstance that our territory is limited by that of a neighboring Power, not only a speck of war, but a black threatening cloud of impending war. And so, sir, he would go on conquering and to conquer, till the limits of our empire shall be continuous with the continent we inhabit. Another gentleman is for directing our military prowess and resources to succor the cause of the oppressed in countries remote and foreign from our own. Let the oppressed of our own country ever find eloquent counsel here; but I hope never to see in this House any person in character of the orator of the human race. These are the patent munitions that have given rise to the standing armies, and oppressed even them, by which Europe has been bound in vassalage. Never may I see them introduced into the country of my birth; against such an abandonment of our good old principles—against the inception of such a policy I enter my most solemn protest. Again, sir, I say retrench. It is written there is a time for peace; we have had it. That there is a time for war; we have had that also. I hope the leaf is not torn from our political bible which says there is a time for retrenchment. If there be that time, it is now present with us. Let it not escape; it is a precious moment. In allusion again to what fell from the gentleman from South Carolina: Dash, yes, sir, dash the Circean cup from the mouth of sycophants, contractors, and office-seekers. Do not enervate the American Hercules by steeping him in the hot-bed of Executive patronage. The people are in no danger from the corruption of delicious draughts and inglorious ease. They are far, far enough removed from these evils. This disease does not attack the extremities of the body politic. It begins at the heart; it has there been manifested. Here, then, let gentlemen direct their caution, and not to the great mass of the American population, where there is no danger of the enemy. Moderate the car of State; cease, at least for a while, to whip and to goad the generous but almost breathless animal that draws the burden.

Mr. STEARNS spoke as follows:

Mr. Speaker, after the very full discussion which this subject has undergone in Committee of the Whole, I shall not long detain the House with the remarks I have to offer. Just beginning to take a share in its deliberations, I have been inclined rather to listen to the opinions and arguments of others than to obtrude upon them my own. I hope, sir, that I have not listened without profit. Not only the general principles, but the minute details of the report have been examined. Honorable gentlemen, with whose views I in the main coincide, have produced their estimates and calculations, and urged their reasoning with a conclusiveness and force which I might in vain desire to imitate. It only remains for me to explain, in as few words as I can, the grounds and reasons of the vote which I am about to give on this important question. For such I consider every question which relates to the burdens to be imposed upon our constituents.

It is not my purpose to inquire whether the necessity which we are told exists for these burdens might have been avoided. Whatever opinions I may have entertained of the impolicy and injustice of the war, from which we were so providentially rescued, peace, objectionable as its terms were to my mind, was by me hailed with gratitude, because it saved the country when on the brink of ruin. I will not, therefore, on this occasion, inquire, whether the avowed objects of the war have been obtained or abandoned, or whether the terms of peace were calculated, or were intended to be equally advantageous to all parts of this widely extended empire. Nor yet, sir, shall I ask a question, in which my constituents are, perhaps, more particularly interested, whether it was just or necessary to barter the fisheries or the territory of the East for an exclusive right and navigation at the West. These are subjects about which gentlemen on different sides of this House totally disagree; and I shall not attempt to accord the difference.

But, sir, honorable gentlemen on the other side have even gone out of their way to allude to the war, and its consequences; a subject which I expected, because I thought it would be their wisdom, they never would have wished to revive. If they have thought otherwise, if those who made the war, and those who concluded the peace, choose to describe the one as an act of manifest justice and necessity, and the other, as productive of incalculable honor and advantage, I must attribute it to the different meaning which words have in the mouths of patriots and politicians, from the common import of language, or set it down to the account of that partiality which every parent has towards its own offspring. They are, perhaps, not much more extravagant or farther from the truth than the crow in the fable, who dotingly called her young ones "little snow-white swans."

Sir, I have no inclination to indulge in irritating remark; but I am not bound to forbear to expose misrepresentation, and to repel unmerited reproach. When those who hurried the country into a dangerous war, without preparation, and without plan, and brought upon it accumulated disaster and disgrace—the monuments of which, even here, meet the reluctant eye at every turn—when such men attempt to throw upon the government and people of a respectable and patriotic State the blame and odium of suffering a small portion of territory, which the General Government was bound to protect, to be occupied by the enemy;—and above all, sir, when they endeavor to conceal their nakedness and shame by snatching from the Navy and Army a share of that honor, or (if you please) that glory, which belongs exclusively to them—if my aid were needed, I would lend it to strip and expose the pilferer, and restore the stolen garment to its owner. But this has already been promptly done by my honorable friends on this side of the House, and my feeble help is not needed.

Sir, when the credit of the nation is languishing, I am willing to forbear the inquiry, how the burdens which are required became necessary: it is sufficient for me, if a manifest necessity exists. When that is the case, if I can be assured that they will be faithfully appropriated, I am not disposed to withhold the requisite supplies. If those who made the war refused to count the cost of it, I know that we and our constituents must count it; yes, sir, and pay it, too. And I am ready to vote all the taxes which, with reasonable regard to economy, may be necessary. I only require this one condition, that they be the least burdensome in their operation, and imposed equally, upon all parts of the country. On these terms, I will give my consent to a direct tax—a permanent one, if necessary.

But, sir, I consider that the honorable committee who gave shape and direction to the financial concerns of the Government in this House, require of us what is unreasonable. By the course which they have adopted, they compel us, in effect, to legislate inverso ordine. They would have us first vote immense revenues, and then look at the objects of appropriation and expenditure pointed out by the Government. I know very well that this course has the apology of precedent—too long established precedent among ourselves—and so have a great many other measures which tend to improvidence and profusion. Sir, it is so common, that it has almost become a trite observation that Governments always demand revenues commensurate to the utmost resources of their country; and I am sure, from melancholy experience, we are not to expect this Government to form an exception.

Will it be said that it is necessary, first, to grant the revenues, that we may know how to limit the expenditure? that, if we first make the appropriations, we may go beyond the ability of the country? Sir, that is not the case. Exhausted as the country is, the people are yet able—more than that, they are willing—to bear every burden that, with reasonable economy in expenditure, may be necessary. Satisfy them that their money is fairly and prudently appropriated to pay the public creditors, and to defray only useful and necessary expenditures—that you do not demand these enormous sums to extend influence and patronage, but to restore the public credit—and nothing will be denied you which they ought to give or you to require.

Sir, it should always be remembered, that is not wisdom and prudence in a Government which would be folly and madness in an individual.

What course would the discreet merchant or tradesman or planter adopt, in the circumstances of this Government? He would first consider, what sum it would require for his necessary expenses and to perform his engagements and maintain his credit—how much might be saved by diminishing some expenditures and wholly retrenching others. And he would not mortgage the freehold until it became necessary, nor until he had at least endeavored to collect his debts, and ascertained the eventual deficiency. The builder, sir, first determines the necessary dimensions and figure and strength of the edifice, and then sets about providing the materials.

Mr. Speaker, we have had thrown upon our tables, this morning, a long and shameful list of balances, which have been due more than three years to one Department of the Government. A similar document from another Department we were favored with some days ago. I say shameful, sir, because, though the whole amount is enormous, and many of the items very large, it appears by these documents that none of the officers of the Government know who or where a great proportion of the debtors are. This race of unknown, unaccountable nondescripts, are the consumers or the scape-goats of no very small part of the revenues of this country. If these long lists of balances are something real and substantial, it is the duty of this House to make the proper use of information which some of them contain, and let those debts be made to furnish a part of the revenue required. But, if these are a mere phantom—if they are only form, and to all useful purposes no better than waste paper—let us know it, and let them never again encumber our tables.

But, sir, this is not all. From other documents and reports and letters laid before us, it appears, that within these three years, immense sums have been appropriated and furnished to the various Departments and officers of the Government, the disposition of which we and our constituents ought to be informed of, and which still remain unaccounted for. How much of it has been honestly applied to its legitimate object, God knows; but I will venture to affirm, that with respect to the disposition of thousands and hundreds of thousands of it, no one in this House or this nation will ever be informed. Do our constituents know this, or do they believe that all the money which has been taken from them has been faithfully and honestly expended? If they do, (blessed be the slumbers of honest, unsuspecting ignorance!) the pilferer and defaulter need not fear that my voice will be heard—that any effort of mine will rouse the deluded people of this land from their death-like sleep. And perhaps, if it were possible, it would be an offence of indiscreet friendship to discover to them those injuries and abuses which I might wish in vain to correct.

Sir, I wish not to indulge unreasonable jealousy and suspicion of any of those who are or have been intrusted with the disposition of the public money. We are assured by their friends, their dependents, and not very unfrequently even by themselves, that they are the best patriots and best men of the country. We are told that there is a perfect system of accountability, and that it is impossible public money should be purloined, or even misapplied. Granted, sir. The system, in theory, is most beautiful and perfect. We have Accountants and Comptrollers, and all the checks and balances of the most perfect machinery: we need only give ourselves the trouble to wind it up. How well the practice might formerly have corresponded with this fine theory, I cannot pretend to decide: at present, it seems to be quite at variance with it. It has grown old, and everything human is liable to deterioration and decay. Yes, sir, "there's the rub." The impelling force is wasted by friction; it is diminished by the continually increasing tendency to the great centre of attraction; and the whole force of the country will hardly keep it in motion. What, then, is the value of all our checks and balances? And where is the intrepid, or rather the rash and imprudent man, who would dare attempt to apply them? Who will venture to demand a voucher, or disallow a claim, when the consequence might be dismissal from office; to effect which, if necessary, perhaps, even the Head of the Government might be induced to lend his aid? When the struggle is between conscience and the loss of office—perhaps of bread—it does not require the gift of prophecy to foretell the event.

Sir, it is seriously asked, what ought to be done—what course should be pursued? In the answer, at least, there is no difficulty. Commence a reform; correct the abuses of office—those open, notorious abuses, which are so manifest that no man can wink so hard as not to see them;—institute an examination into the management and expenditure of public money; collect your debts; dismiss from office the speculator—yes, sir, and (if you can detect him) the peculator too—those wonder-working jugglers, who out of hundreds expend thousands, and grow rich; cherish and protect the honest, faithful public servant, who dares to do his duty, and brave the menaces prava juventium; abolish sinecure and unnecessary offices; create no new ones, for the purpose of extending influence and patronage; place the Navy and the Army upon a respectable, and (as far as is consistent with the interest and security of the country) upon an economical establishment. But, beware you do not excite and nourish a love of military glory and a thirst for conquest: it would be fatal to your liberty and national happiness. Abundance of military resources and preparation has a certain tendency to produce war, though the want of them may not always prevent it. The man who wears his pistols and his dirk is much more likely to get into collision with those whom he may meet, than the plain citizen who is without them.

Sir, I believe that when the errors in the estimates presented by the Committee of Ways and Means shall be corrected, and some moderate and reasonable deductions made, it will be found that remaining sources of revenue will yield even more than is demanded. Let it be first clearly ascertained what amount is indispensable to support the Government, and maintain the credit of the nation, and then, if the ordinary sources prove insufficient, resort to the land. Impose a direct tax of three, or even four millions—a permanent one, if necessary. I have no instinctive dread of taxes. With the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania, (Mr. HOPKINSON,) I will say, I came here to impose taxes, but to impose only necessary ones. And, until I have more satisfactory evidence than I now have that this tax is necessary—until I see some mistake or fallacy in the calculations and estimates of gentlemen opposed to this measure—I feel bound to withhold my consent from the imposition of this (as I deem it) unnecessary burden upon my constituents.

Mr. HANSON said he could not conceal the regret he felt at the additional evidence just given by the worthy gentlemen who preceded him, (Messrs. ARTHURTON and STEARNS,) of a strong opposition by his political friends to the whole system under discussion. But, however much he might lament the diversity of opinion prevailing, and what he considered a departure from the soundest principles and wisest maxims of the party in concert with which he had always acted, yet his conscience and judgment left him no choice but to separate from most of his friends in the vote to be given. Even if he stood alone in the present question, he should consider himself as dishonoring his station, as unworthy the seat he occupied, if he surrendered his judgment or fled the question. Let the responsibility and the consequences be what they might, he would encounter them; preferring, as he hoped he ever should, the people's good to the people's favor. For one, he was free to declare his willingness to have permitted the question of supplies to be taken without debate. Having made up his mind to accept, in the main, the system reported by the Committee of Finance, he saw no object in provoking a discussion, which, if not exactly challenged by the Speaker, had certainly been provoked, as far as the introduction of irritating topics could provoke it. He was too well acquainted with Parliamentary etiquette to reply to the Speaker when he was not on the floor. Another opportunity could be embraced for that purpose. But as the House had seen fit to entertain a discussion in its most extended form, he saw no reason to regret the course the debate had taken. Indeed, a review of the remarks which fell from prominent gentlemen on the other side, afforded ample cause of congratulation and triumph to those who were bred in the school of Washington and Hamilton. By one gentleman, (Mr. ROSS, of Pennsylvania,) the House had been favored with the confession that a morbid languor had seized the Government under Mr. Jefferson, as soon as the impetus given to it by the preceding Administrations ceased to be felt. A second honorable gentleman, from South Carolina, (Mr. CALHOUN,) whose manly frankness and independence deserve the highest commendation, had substantially admitted that all the embarrassments, difficulties, and disasters suffered by the country, were ascribable to an unfortunate departure, by those who administered the Government, from those cardinal maxims and principles which constituted the system of Washington and the creed of his disciples. A third honorable gentleman, from Virginia, (Mr. TUCKER,) modestly, but eloquently, echoing the sentiments of his friend who had preceded him, pushed his admissions yet a key higher, and, acknowledging that the men in power had all along proceeded upon mistaken and false principles of Government, he adjured his friends around him to subdue their pride of opinion, to renounce and abandon their vicious system, which they had learnt in the school of adversity, and which could be productive of only disappointment, disgrace, and danger to the country. Though not claimed as an intentional, studied, panegyric upon the system of the minority, yet a more splendid eulogy could not be pronounced upon it, because it was praise, extorted by truth, from the mouth of an enemy. As such, I receive it, said Mr. H., though not without amazement, for that would be impossible; but I receive it as a just and noble tribute to the purity and wisdom of Federal counsels. What more unequivocal and conclusive proof could be required, that the principles and conduct of the minority were right, than the admission by the majority that they themselves were in the wrong? From my heart, Mr. Speaker, do I wish they had sooner become sensible of their errors. Pity, indeed, it is that their eyes had not been sooner opened; what suffering, how much distress, what sorrows, what agonizing spasms, how much disgrace, how much treasure, blood, and national character would have been saved to this much abused people. Had the conviction of the most obvious and solemn truths been earlier wrought in the minds of gentlemen, the saving to the nation would be incalculable, and many a black and dismal page of our history would have been most fair to view.

The honorable gentlemen not only profess themselves converts to the principles of Washington and Federalism, but to my great joy they are engaged in reducing them to practice. Let the nation rejoice, for it forms a new and glorious era in its affairs. Yes, sir, I recognise in the language and the actions of the gentlemen, the influence of Federal principles; and come from whom those principles may, no matter how presented, or in what form I find them, whether "vamped up," as one gentleman had said, (Mr. RANDOLPH,) in the shape of Executive Messages, or assuming the more substantial and intelligible form of legislative acts. Though they come in the questionable shape of repairing the ravages of a war which the Opposition had deprecated and resisted, by all the Constitutional means they possessed, yet will I afford every proper aid to resuscitate and sustain the public credit, to retrieve the national character, and provide in the most ample manner for the future defence and security of the country. We warned you of the consequences of plunging the country into an unjust, unnecessary, and wicked war; we portrayed, with a faithful pencil, the black and midnight counsels which lurked at the bottom of the measure. Did we not caution you against the rashness of precipitating the country from a state of peace, unprepared, unqualified, and unprovided, into a fearful contest, with the most powerful nation the world ever saw? Who will deny it? Did we not clearly foresee and foretell the consequences of your obstinate refusal to provide a solid basis for the finances, by an adequate system of revenue; preferring, as you did, the precarious and desperate reliance upon loans to pay the interest of loans? We never ceased to admonish you of the result of such a war, commenced without armies and competent commanders; without an adequate marine, and sufficient fortifications; without revenue, or any of the warlike means of self-defence prepared, much less to dash beyond our borders in quest of conquest. True as I consider all this, it is no justification for holding back, now that we are invited, upon our own principles, to join in repairing acknowledged mischief; and, while we endeavor to remedy the evil effects of past political errors, to guard against future misfortune. Upon such terms, and for such professed objects, I unite with all my heart in the effort to staunch and heal the deep wounds inflicted upon the country. While I agree to grant all the means necessary to these ends, I shall not be unmindful of the danger of falling into the extreme, opposite to that of feebleness and imbecility, which led us to the brink of ruin. I need not say my back is turned upon every plan to disturb the repose of the country, by romantic schemes of future war and conquest, if such are now really entertained. My views extend not beyond the defence of the country, against any and every nation able to attack us. For this purpose, pursuing the advice of WASHINGTON, to be found in his last legacy to his children, and in almost every Message sent to Congress, I would rely upon the preparation for war to preserve peace. I would prefer the season of peace for providing the means of defence, by pushing forward the necessary preparations for war. Thus far would I go—at least to the utmost of our power—to restore the public credit, and place it upon a solid, permanent basis, enabling the Government to pay punctually the interest of the public debt, and gradually to extinguish the principal; which is "the true secret," says Hamilton, "of rendering public credit immortal." I would increase the navy as rapidly as the finances would allow; I would keep embodied troops sufficient to garrison all our fortifications at exposed positions; and, while they were preserved from decay, I would erect others at every vulnerable point. I would omit nothing, nor spare any expense, to place the United States in a posture of complete defence, as the best means of preventing war; and, should war unfortunately come, of abridging its evils.

On this subject, summoning to their aid the principles and maxims of WASHINGTON and HAMILTON, the gentlemen already referred to on the other side have introduced them in debate with all the air of novelty, for which they have taken, and, strange to say, received credit as the inventors. Why sir, the first book put into the hands of those who were bred in the school of the illustrious men at its head, taught us all this. We read in the horn-book of Federal politics, that, in return for the protection the people receive from Government, the people must contribute to the support of Government; that the public credit must be maintained inviolate; the faith of the nation preserved without a stain. And upon the subject of defence and security, we are taught to consider no sacrifice too great, no burdens too heavy, to insure both, as the end of all Government. All these ideas, as old as the Federal party itself, with which the gentlemen have bespangled and embellished their orations, are borrowed from that system upon which the Federal Administrations constantly acted, and the writings of WASHINGTON and HAMILTON, which will remain forever recorded, though the remnant of our archives be consigned to the flames kindled by another war.

Mr. H. said, in approving the policy now in contemplation, therefore, for the defence of the country, and the maintenance, against the world, of its just rights and dignity, we were only pursuing the advice of the immortal founder of the Republic. I cannot agree, said he, with the gentleman from North Carolina, (Mr. GASTON,) that our resorting to preparatory measures of defence will have a tendency to excite and cultivate a sentiment of hostility to England, which would ultimately grow into a national feeling of inveterate and deadly hatred, such as the British and French nations cherish against each other. In the very nature of our relations with that country, there will always exist a powerful impulse produced by natural causes, unfavorable to causeless enmity. Sprung from one ancestry, speaking the same language, our customs, manners, and domestic habits, nearly the same; they will tend to produce, on both sides, a sentiment adverse to hostility. I could wish to speak plainly, without reserve, leaving nothing to inference; for I have nothing to conceal, nothing to regret, nothing to retract. I consider it, then, the true policy of this Government to be frank, to be just, rigidly impartial, and friendly to Great Britain, cultivating assiduously, by all fair and manly means, the best possible understanding with her. But we should not forget that the state of things which made it wise and patriotic to pray fervently for her success, to overlook or bear with her wrongs, to strengthen her hands to the utmost of our power, for the combat with our enemy and the enemy of all nations, and to exult in her final triumph, we should not forget that this state of things is now at an end. Thank God, in his mercy and goodness, they are at an end; that the disturber of the repose of mankind, is hurled from his dizzy eminence, and delivered over to captivity, I trust, forever. Yes, sir, the state of things which once made hostility to England criminal and base, no longer exists, she is not now, as she then was, the world's sole defence against a colossal tyranny that bestrode it.

The Revenue.

H. OF R.

Is it too much to say, sir, (I know I am imprudently venturing on ticklish ground,) is it too much to say that England is now mistress of the ascendant, and it will be a duty, henceforward, to be on our guard against her as a powerful nation, if not a natural and jealous rival, impelled by her interests, if not her best policy, to keep us down, and check our quick march to that high rank which, sooner or later, this people must take among the nations? Is it venturing too far to say, that the balance of power is now restored, or rather, that France, if not already, is in danger of being reduced too low, while her great rival is too much exalted? May I not venture a little further and say, with that rival, few who look into futurity can doubt, we must ultimately be called to contend for the liberty, if not the empire of the seas; for to that, I believe, it must at last come. Shall I be pardoned for advancing yet a step further, by saying that, for this great contest, we ought to begin to prepare, gradually, if preferred, but to begin to prepare, and never to relax our precautionary preparations until we are prepared; at the same time, however, always observing the most frank, friendly, and scrupulously just conduct towards her, while we equally bear in mind the necessity of so regulating our partiality as not to permit ourselves to be rendered blind to her policy? I repeat, the interesting and critical state of things which not only justified, but rendered patriotic, our sympathy and partiality for England, is past. Far from my wish or intention is it to deny that, before the tyrant was overthrown, I rejoiced in the success of England; I gloried in her triumphs; I triumphed whenever victory perched upon her banners; but, now, I regard her with no kinder feelings than France, or any other nation. She is not now fighting our battles, and those of the civilized world, against a despotic and overgrown Power, which threatened all; we should view her, therefore, as that nation we have most to fear, and with whom, as a maritime and commercial people, we are most likely to come in collision. In a word, Mr. Speaker, I mean to be understood as saying, it is the part of wisdom to make the best use of our means and the season of peace to prepare for the worst, while we hope and labor for the best, resolving to bear and forbear to the utmost, thinking few sacrifices, short of national honor, too great to preserve our pacific relations.

Such are my ideas, sir, upon the subject of preparation for defence, and the relation in which England and this country stand towards each other. I am not entering the course to run the race of popularity. Upon the usual terms of acquiring, and the common means of seeking it, I should despise myself if I had it in possession. If excused for referring to events of the last session of Congress, one object would be to show how I lost what little popularity I may have possessed. By the same motives and the same principles which I am now actuated, I was then actuated, and trust I shall ever be guided, the good of the country, not of self or of party. Meanly as I think and no man can hold a meaner opinion of the capacity and honesty of the men who administer the Government, profligate and corrupt as I always considered, and still consider the motives of the authors of the late war, I never lost sight of principles which govern my conduct now. In all the vicissitudes of the war, the security and welfare of the country were at no time separate from my thoughts. True, I opposed the war with a zeal and constancy not to be denied, and as little to be repented of. Though selected for one of its first victims at home, no sooner did it change its aggressive for a defensive character, than I took the ground of granting the supplies asked for, and strengthening the arm of Government. I distinctly took the ground of recovering and restoring the public credit, of uniting for the purpose of defence, and until the danger had passed by to forget and forgive, unmindful of the past, and looking only to the future. This ground was promptly taken as soon as the memorable November despatches were communicated to the House, and it was steadily maintained by voting for the most odious taxes. This ground was taken at the most critical juncture in our annals, when all was confusion, dismay, and terror. Your Treasury publicly bankrupt, the Government had been put to flight, the Capitol reduced to ashes, the Army without pay, food, or clothing, and dying by hundreds, like sheep, of the rot. Though power seemed ready to drop into our hands, like fruit rotten-ripe, I was willing to overlook for a moment the necessity of a change of rulers, and to take a stand in opposition to the feelings of those who sent me here, and in the teeth of their known opinions, roused as they reasonably were, to the highest pitch of indignation against the authors of our danger. But the country was threatened with dismemberment and ruin, and I felt there was no choice but to assist in its salvation. My aid was certainly not solicited; perhaps it was not wanted; but I judged for myself in affording it, trifling as may have been the benefit derived from it.

Perhaps an apology is due to the House for detaining them a moment, by referring, after the manner of some gentlemen, to my own peculiar situation. If on this occasion guilty of what may be considered egotism, the best plea I can offer, is that it is my first transgression of the kind, and I will avail myself of the patience kindly manifested by the House to advert to the style of remark, upon the two parties, occasionally indulged by an honorable gentleman from Virginia (Mr. RANDOLPH) and his estimable friend (Mr. STANFORD.) My feelings are too kind and warm towards these gentlemen to harbor any resentment, though I cannot refrain from saying their allusions are sometimes too strong to pass without being repelled. Whatever, sir, may be the opinion of a third party in this House, who think that the other two like factions seek to make their country a prey, and are squabbling only about dividing the spoil, while they possess all the integrity and virtue, I shall forbear to institute a comparison of political honesty and consistency.

It is undoubtedly true, unfortunately for the country it is true, as more than once alluded to, the party now in the minority lost the power they once enjoyed. They lost it, if gentlemen please, first through indiscretion, but secondly, because they disdained resorting to the vile means of retaining power which others found successful in obtaining it. Nor can any one of us reproach ourselves for having at any time, under any delusion, sanctioned and given currency to principles which, fully put in practice, have reduced the country to the condition which all now unite in deploring. Most true, the people were to their cost seduced to discard us, but we have acted out of power as we did in power; we have heretofore maintained, and I trust will continue to maintain, the same steadiness and uniformity of conduct, the reverse of which is generally reducible to no principle but self interest, and often renders even integrity itself suspicious. I hold, that the principles of Federalism, old and new, as they have been denominated, are the same, having consistency at least to recommend them, and let who may be placed at the helm of Government, they must be the star and compass to steer by. Like the beams of the great luminary of the heavens, which bear on their bosom both light and general heat to earth, our principles are not the offspring of fleeting circumstances, which rise like the floating vapors to disappear again. Clinging to the right, spurning the expedient, we cleave to our principles, though found in the measures of our opponents. And why? because we look not to power and office, but to the country, to advance the good, the greatness and true glory of which has ever been, and now is, our sole aim. Who amongst this minority has not been ever ready to sacrifice his prejudices, his resentments, everything, upon the altar of his country? May I not say, love of country has ever been their mother feeling, the fountain of their principles, the main-spring of all their political actions?

Can it be supposed that we will now abandon our principles, and shift sides with the majority, because they have been driven to the necessity of adopting them? I will never disown and renounce the holy Scriptures though preached by a depraved minister of the Gospel! I will not reject good because proffered by an evil hand. If they have been taught by adversity the important lesson, that the country can only flourish and grow great by administering the Government upon our principles, shall we disown and renounce them? Never; I trust never. I sicken with disgust at the bare idea of taking up their old, exploded, discarded notions of false economy, the cheap defence of nations, gunboats, dry docks, and militia. No man in this House, shall I not say in this nation, has more cause to hold out to the last than I have, in a dead, decided opposition to all the measures of Government. God knows none have more cause to detest the war, and deprecate the doctrines disseminated and successfully put in practice at its commencement—doctrines which levelled at civil liberty itself the blow of death—doctrines sapping the foundation of Government and social order, and unhinging society—doctrines involving a complication of slavery and chains, misery and torture, an agony both of body and mind, and death with every horrible aggravation of its terrors and its pains. The torments of the cross and stake may equal them; he who is broken upon the wheel may suffer more, but the pains of the gallows, or the gloom of the dungeon, are mercy compared with the torments inflicted by the hell-hounds of Jacobinism. All these do not influence my political conduct, nor prevent me from looking back with unclouded contentment of conscience, if not with pride and exultation, upon the course I have pursued from the beginning of the war down to the present hour.

A few words more, and any claim I may have had upon the politeness of the House is discharged. Gentlemen doubt the propriety of granting further means to the Administration until it is shown that former supplies have not been corruptly expended, and they see no reason to doubt that corruption will continue its depredations upon the public treasure. I have not a doubt it will, unless the majority unite in devising a system of checks and accountability in the Departments. To this I understand prominent gentlemen on the other side have freely pledged themselves. But allowing the utmost weight to this argument, drawn from the probable abuse of power, corruption has taken such deep root in the Government, and attained so rank a growth, I much fear, let who may administer the Government, it will not totally disappear. Corruption has taken so strong a hold upon the political system of this country that it can no more be cured than the leprosy of Gahazy, which was hereditary to all his posterity.

This argument of corruption, however, goes to the withholding of all means from the Government, which would soon terminate all our contests by bringing them to a violent end. Confidence must be placed somewhere; that kind of confidence, I mean, necessary to prevent the Government from stopping. There must be oil supplied or the lamp will expire. That confidence must be placed in the men whom the people, however mistakenly and blindly, have chosen to administer the Government. To them, therefore, must be intrusted the execution of the system which looks to the defence of the country, the extinguishment of the war debt, and the restoration of the public credit. I shall support the system of finance, I believe unanimously agreed to by the committee who reported it, trusting that the means it provides will be used in promoting the prosperity, the honor, and the security of the country.

The question on the motion to reconsider, essentially the question to repeal the tax altogether, was decided by yeas and nays—for the reconsideration 67, against it 86, as follows:

The resolution to continue the direct tax of three millions for one year was then agreed to, and referred to the Financial Committee to bring in a bill accordingly.

The House then proceeded, in Committee of the Whole, to consider the next proposition of the Committee of Ways and Means, viz: that which proposes the continuance of certain duties on distillation; when, on motion of Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, who considered this question too important to be decided without discussion, the Committee rose, reported progress, and the House adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, February 7.

Two other members, to wit, from New Hampshire, DANIEL WEBSTER, and from North Carolina, WELDON N. EDWARDS, (elected in the place of Nathaniel Macon, resigned,) appeared, produced their credentials, were qualified, and took their seats.

Mr. INGHAM presented petitions from sundry inhabitants of the State of Pennsylvania, praying that Congress will take into their consideration the manufacturing interest in the United States, and adopt such measures as will afford to the said interest the best security and protection.

Mr. RANDOLPH gave notice of his intention to move an inquiry into the constitutionality of the appointment of Peter B. Porter, late a member of this House, to the office of a Commissioner under the Treaty of Great Britain, he being at the time of his appointment a member of this House.

Mr. PLEASANTS, from the Naval Committee, reported amendments to the bill from the Senate, authorizing the appointment of Admirals, the object of which are to create one Vice Admiral and two Rear Admirals, instead of one Admiral and two Vice Admirals—a mere change of denomination. The bill and amendments were referred to a Committee of the Whole.

On motion of Mr. ROOR, the Committee of Ways and Means were instructed to inquire into the expediency of discharging Ebenezer Keeler and John Francis from their confinement in the county of Delaware, New York, at the suit of the United States.

Mr. MOSELEY, from the select committee, to whom was referred the petition of sundry inhabitants of the State of Connecticut, on behalf of the widow and children of Charles Dolph, deceased, reported a bill for the relief of the widow and children of said Dolph; which was twice read, and committed.

Mr. BASSETT, from the committee to whom was referred the memorial of Commodore John Rodgers, of the Navy, respecting a judgment obtained against him by John Donnell, of Baltimore, for the value of a vessel detained by a frigate belonging to a squadron under the command of Commodore R., reported a resolution for his relief.

This resolution, after some conversation on the form of the report, it being contended that it should have been by bill instead of resolution, was twice read, and referred to a Committee of the Whole.

COMMERCIAL RESTRICTIONS.

The House, on motion of Mr. KING, of Massachusetts, resumed the consideration of the following resolution, submitted by him yesterday:

Resolved, That the Committee on Foreign Relations be instructed to inquire into the expediency of excluding from the ports of the United States, or of increasing the duties on, all foreign vessels owned in, coming from, bound to, or touching at, any of the possessions of any nation of Europe in the West Indies, and on the continent of America, from which the vessels of the United States are excluded; and of prohibiting, or of increasing the duties on the importation in foreign vessels, of any articles the growth, produce, or manufacture of such possessions.

Mr. BRADYRUP moved to amend the resolution of Mr. KING, by striking out the words, "excluding from the ports of the United States foreign vessels," so as to confine the inquiry to the expediency of increasing the tonnage duty, &c., only. He observed, in support of his motion, that he was not in the habit of obtruding his opinions and views of subjects upon the House; and, on this occasion, should have been silent, had not the subject under consideration presented itself to his mind in a different light from what it appeared to have done to the mind of his honorable colleague, (Mr. KING.) As we both represent a district of country in Maine, said Mr. B., whose commercial interests are precisely similar, their Representatives, it is fairly to be presumed, cannot have views or wishes hostile to those interests, however they may differ as to the methods most likely to advance them. I object to one of the phrases in the resolution, that which I have proposed to strike out; because, sir, it appears to me to be a renewal of the old, and to the people of that part of the country, odious restrictive system. The restrictive energies of this country have, in my judgment, had a fair experiment; and, as was observed on another occasion the other day, "been found wanting." In my humble opinion the true policy on this subject is regulation simply, and not exclusion. I believe more beneficial effects can be accomplished by the mild and clement sun of regulation, than by the fierce and rude winds of exclusion and prohibition. If the course, on this occasion, most congenial to my views could be adopted, it should be a simple direction to the Committee on Foreign Relations to inquire "Whether any measures ought to be adopted by Congress to regulate the intercourse between the United States and His Britannic Majesty's possessions in the West Indies, and on the continent of North America," agreeably to the power reserved in the second article of the treaty. But I am, nevertheless, willing to adopt the resolution of my colleague, if amended; that is, sir, I am willing to inquire, and if, on mature consideration it is thought best, to say, increase the tonnage duty on foreign vessels coming from ports and places from which our vessels are excluded. Increase also the additional per centage on the permanent rate of duties to a reasonable amount; at least commence only in this way, and reserve the severer measures of exclusion and prohibition, until the efficacy of this course is tried. I believe, sir, such a course is the safest and the wisest—more congenial to the wishes of mercantile men, and in my judgment to their true interests. The opposite course is, I fear, calculated to build up the British colonies at American expense. Prohibit intercourse in foreign vessels between the British West Indies and this country, and it operates as a bounty or encouragement to the colonies adjacent to us on this continent; to the export of lumber and bread stuff from those colonies. It is not difficult for a reflecting mind to trace this as the sure consequence of such a course of policy. It is, in my opinion, owing to the restrictive system, and its necessary consequence, the war, that we have now to deplore the loss of the valuable trade to the British West Indies. Prior to the war we enjoyed that commerce substantially as a permanent trade, though, in point of form, we held it by the uncertain tenure of a British proclamation of the colonial Governors, issued semi-annually, under an Order in Council. But the merchants could calculate, and did calculate on its continuance, for a long period prior to the war, with nearly as much certainty as if it was regulated by convention. To restore this trade is, indeed, all-important; but I am disposed to think it cannot be effected by measures merely compulsory. Prior to the war, also, we enjoyed a valuable commerce in plaster of paris; it was to a number of my constituents, while it continued, a source of wealth, and to the cultivators of land at the South served to fertilize and enrich their fields and plantations. It has been enjoyed also since the peace until recently, and I know not that it is not still enjoyed. But reports are in circulation, as I perceive from newspapers, that our shippers are by British regulations to be deprived of this branch of trade. It has been stated in the papers that the British have laid a duty of $5 per ton on all plaster of paris exported from the colonies in English bottoms, which shall be landed east of New Haven; the effect of which will inevitably be to exclude our vessels from this branch of commerce. Whether this information be correct, ought forthwith to be ascertained, and I trust the committee will instantly institute the necessary inquiry on this subject, by applying through the Executive to the British agent here, to ascertain whether any and what duties have been imposed on any merchandise, more especially this article. To preserve and restore branches of commerce to my constituents so valuable and important, is highly desirable; but, in our haste to do this, I hope no measure will be adopted calculated eventually to injure and defeat the object in view, or to become a source of future regret.

This motion was opposed by Mr. KING, of Massachusetts, on the grounds he took on originally proposing the resolution.

Mr. S. SMITH said, that he was adverse to the amendment; that he thought the resolution ought to go to the Committee of Foreign Relations, on the broad ground which it assumed; the committee would consider whether the object contemplated would be answered best by an exclusion or by laying extraordinary duties. He said, he had not made up his own mind as to which course would be best. The duties might operate as a charge on the consumer, unless they were such as would be prohibitory. The total exclusion of the importation of goods from such ports as the vessels of the United States were not permitted to enter and trade freely, for similar articles, might operate to induce the parties to meet at some port free for both, and there interchange their cargoes; for instance, at a Swedish or Danish island, to all which the ships of the United States were received as freely as their own vessels. He said, he would take a short view of the subject. The European Powers which had established colonies, had generally maintained the principles of an exclusive commerce thereto. This monopoly they claimed as a remuneration for the expense of their first establishment, and their future protection; and there appeared to be some reasons on their side. It behooved the United States to inquire whether they could not procure on equal terms, or nearly so, commodities similar to those produced by such colonies, from countries into which their own vessels were permitted to enter and trade freely. If such ports are open to them, then it becomes a duty of the United States to favor the importations therefrom, and to exclude those from the countries which will not permit our vessels to enter and trade on equal terms with their own; nor can any such country complain. It ought not to be a cause of commercial warfare by such nation. He said, he would take a view of the conduct of the nations possessing colonies which produced coffee and sugar. Spain had uniformly excluded from all her colonies the ships of other nations, unless when compelled to open the ports of Cuba, when at war with Great Britain, and since the French Revolution. During peace, she drew the flour necessary for Cuba, from the United States to Cadiz, where it was bought by the Commissary of the Indies, and by him sent to Cuba; at present the trade to Cuba is open as well for imports as for exports, but it cannot be expected to continue so. She has granted a free trade to her colony of Porto Rico, but confined to Spanish subjects or residents of the island, and in Spanish vessels only, intending, perhaps, to supply Cuba with flour through that island, as she may hereafter grant similar privileges to Cuba; the fact is, that this system is to the exclusion of the vessels of the United States.

Portugal prohibited all intercourse with her colonies of the Brazils until the King removed his Court. Since then the ports of that immense country are open. The Brazils produce an immense quantity of sugar, from whence a supply, equal perhaps to our wants, might be drawn; but the Brazils require very few of our products; the balance of trade with them would be greatly against the United States.

The Dutch have two free ports—St. Eustatia and Curacao; they produce very little; their ports of Surinam, Essequibo, and Berbice have been partially open to our trade. Molasses was permitted to be exported from thence in American bottoms; at present those ports are in possession of the British, who exclude our vessels.

France, I believe, admitted our vessels with fish, lumber, and pork. She excluded our flour, and permitted the export of molasses and taffia. She prohibited us from exporting sugar and coffee.

Great Britain excludes the entry of American vessels from her colonies, except when necessity compels their Governors to issue their proclamations; this has frequently happened during her war with France. Seldom in time of peace their supplies have been furnished from the United States, either in their own vessels direct, or from St. Jago de Cuba, where they come for our flour, or from St. Bartholomews, a Swedish island.

The Danes and Swedes have pursued a more liberal policy; they admit our vessels freely to their islands, and they might perhaps become entrepôts where the vessels of both parties would meet and exchange cargoes. The Island of St. Croix produces sugar to a considerable amount.

The State of Louisiana, and lately Georgia, produce sugar. With the supply they can furnish, and what may be drawn from Hispaniola, and other countries in the East and West Indies, (where our vessels are admitted,) I am inclined to think that ample supplies of colonial produce may be obtained. But, Mr. Speaker, the subject is one of great delicacy, and will require the serious attention of the committee before they report upon it. He was not prepared to say, that the present is the proper time to decide upon it;

however, he was willing to send the resolution to the committee. He was, however, prepared to say, that Congress ought to use every exertion to favor the navigation of the Eastern States—a navigation which gave us the seamen, by whose bravery the United States would, at no very distant day, be enabled to maintain an equality on the high seas with any nation now in existence.

The amendment was negatived without a division, and the resolution was then agreed to.

THE REVENUE.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the subject of the report of the Committee of Ways and Means on the Revenue.

The following resolution, reported by the committee being under consideration:

Resolved, That it is expedient to repeal an act, entitled "An act to provide additional revenues for defraying the expenses of Government, and maintaining the public credit, by laying duties on spirits distilled within the United States and Territories thereof, and by amending the act laying duties on licenses to distillers of spirituous liquors," passed on the 21st of December, 1814, excepting only the 16th, 18th, 19th, and 24th sections thereof, from and after the first day of April next, and from the same day to add 100 per cent. to the amount of the duty which all stills now subject to duty are liable to pay.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, moved to amend the same, so as to read as follows:

Resolved, That it is expedient to repeal the act, entitled "An act laying a duty on licenses to distillers of spirituous liquors, passed on the 24th of December, 1813;" also the act, entitled "An act laying a duty on spirits distilled within the United States," passed on the 21st of December, 1814, and that, in lieu thereof, an act be passed laying a duty of — cents on each gallon of spirits distilled within the United States from the material of fruit, and of — cents on each gallon distilled from the material of grain.

Mr. WILLIAMS spoke as follows:—Permit me to solicit the indulgence of the Committee, while I offer the reasons which have induced the motion just made. The amendment is submitted with diffidence; because I am sensible of that superior deference which is due to the judgment and measures of senior members in this House, and from my perfect acquiescence in a custom, which attributes to age, both in and out of this House, additional respect and consideration; I should certainly have forborne an attempt to obtrude upon your notice any of my remarks; but, sir, the interest of my constituents is as dear to them as any other portion of the community; and I should betray a culpable neglect of that interest, were I to remain silent when it is, as I think, about to be sacrificed.

I propose the amendment with diffidence again, because I am also sensible of that deference which is always due, and generally paid, to the Committee of Ways and Means. A course different from this, would hardly be practicable at any time, and frequently improper; for it is presumed the committee have examined the subjects referred to them, with a patience and scrutiny, which the House would scarcely be adequate to undergo in its corporate and legislative capacity. They have free and familiar access to facts and opinions, which the House, from its very nature and its numbers, could not have; being a small body, they perform their business with a facility and despatch, which would be impracticable to a large legislative assembly. Hence, I apprehend, the custom of referring all subjects to the committee in the first instance; of receiving their reports when made, with great deference, and of allowing them to contain the best evidence which the nature of the case will admit.

By no means, sir, would I object to the custom of the House. On the contrary, I think it is generally the best course to be pursued with all committees, and particularly so with the present committee; for, so far as my acquaintance with that body will enable me to judge, I must say, that the selections were made with discernment as to the talents and promised zeal of the committee. But as the greatest judge or most profound lawyer may sometimes advance an erroneous opinion, so, I think, the committee, in this case, have misconceived the true interest of the country. If I should be so fortunate as to make this appear, the House, I know, will give their support to the amendment I have proposed.

It has, Mr. Chairman, been asserted by gentlemen, that it would be politic to impose a heavy duty, amounting in many cases almost to a prohibition, on the distilling of spirituous liquors, because it would tend to counteract that habit of intemperance which we sometimes see prevalent in the country. But if the argument has any force, I am unable to perceive it. To a certain extent, spirits are a necessary of life, to every extent in which they are used they will not be dispensed with. If not made at home, they will be imported from abroad. However much, therefore, morality may condemn the use of spirituous liquors, and however wise it might be to prevent, as much as possible, intemperance in that way, I do not yet understand that it is the object of Government to prohibit, entirely, the use or distillation of spirits. On the contrary, the object of Government, as I have understood it, is to raise a revenue, is to bring money into the Treasury.

It will be admitted, that stills are a fair object of taxation. Perhaps no species of property, owned by the citizen, can better sustain a tax, which is moderate and duly equalized; and while contributions are necessary to defray the expenses of Government, no one is able or more willing to furnish his proportionable part than the distiller. If it were consistent with the public engagements to abolish all other taxes except this, I should not object to the measure, merely because it would operate on those whom I represent. So far as I could ascertain the sentiments of my constituents, they did not expect, nor did they wish that the tax on stills, under existing circumstances of the country, should be entirely removed; they know we had a great debt to pay, and that money must be raised to support the credit of the nation. But, sir, they well know, and I myself also know, that the duty proposed by the committee is impolitic; that it is excessive; and that it will thereby defeat its own object—the raising of the revenue.

By the law of 1813, the following duties were imposed, to wit: for two weeks, nine cents per gallon on the capacity of the still; for one month, eighteen cents per gallon on the capacity of the still; and so on.

The most experienced distillers in the country where I live, and I speak in reference to that particularly, have estimated that this duty would have amounted to ten cents per gallon, if it had been imposed on the quantity made, instead of the capacity of the still; and moderate as it may seem, many persons stopped their distilleries; others worked them not more than half the time they would have done, if the law had not been passed. The revenue accruing under this law for the year 1814, as stated by the Secretary of the Treasury, amounted to $1,681,087. In 1814 a law was passed, imposing a duty of twenty cents on the gallon, in addition to that which had been laid on the capacity. If, therefore, the aggregate duty be estimated at thirty cents per gallon; and if it be supposed that the same number of stills were used, as under the former law, then there ought, in a direct proportion, to have accrued for the year 1815, the sum of $5,063,661. But the Secretary of the Treasury states the sum accruing for the year 1815, to be only $3,500,000.

If the aggregate duty be estimated at twenty-five cents per gallon, then there ought to have accrued, in the same proportion, for the year 1815, the sum of $4,202,777; consequently, in both cases there was a defalcation of revenue; in the first case, of more than $1,500,000; in the second, of more than $700,000.

But the idea may be placed in a still stronger point of view. The Secretary states the revenue accruing in 1814 for licenses on stills and boilers to be $1,681,087, as before mentioned. But in 1815, the revenue accruing from the same source amounted only to $1,000,000. This was owing, no doubt, to the imposition of the additional tax. Hence, then, it will appear, that more than one-third of the distillers must, in 1815, have ceased their operations altogether.

I am well aware, sir, that we have no very certain data on which to found our calculations in regard to this subject. But knowing, from my own observation, that a great stop was put to the business of distilling, by the additional duty imposed in 1814, I have submitted these calculations more for the purpose of exemplifying the manner in which a defalcation of the revenue was produced, than of offering anything like substantial or incontrovertible evidence. It is not by calculation that we are to ascertain whether or not a tax is oppressive, whether it operates on the people as a grievance. This must be collected from the people themselves, by being among them; by attending to their statements; and finally, by observing the difficulty with which the demands of Government are met. This, sir, is the most safe and best practical criterion by which to judge of the extent and operation of a tax. In the district I represent, many persons who carried on distillation, most extensively, put a total stop to their business, although there was a great surplus of grain, and a greater abundance of fruit than was ever known at any antecedent period. Sir, the fruit alone, in many parts of North Carolina, if it had been saved and converted into brandy, would, in my judgment, have yielded a greater revenue than has been yielded in that quarter by the distillation, both of grain and fruit, under the superadded and almost prohibitory duties of 1815.

FEBRUARY, 1816.

The Revenue.

H. OF R.

The committee now propose to repeal the law imposing a duty on distilled spirits, and to double the duty on licenses to distillers. If the measure should be carried, the duty will amount to about twenty cents on each gallon. This cannot be a sufficient reduction of the tax. It is indeed alleviating the burdens imposed by the necessity of the war with a vengeance; for twenty cents, in time of peace, is as great a duty, as thirty cents in a state of war. In war, very few importations of foreign liquors can take place. The distillers of domestic spirits have then a monopoly of the market; whereas in time of peace they are obliged to struggle with competition from abroad. I appeal to the experimental knowledge of commercial gentlemen to support the truth of the position, and am confident that I shall not be answered in the negative. Besides, if you contemplate no greater reduction than that proposed by the committee, you conflict with the policy which our Government announced to the world it was ready to pursue. The President has recommended the propriety of encouraging domestic manufactures, either by laying a protecting duty on foreign importations, or by repealing that on domestic articles. Accordingly, we have found it proposed by the committee to repeal all the duties on domestic manufactures. Not only so, but to reduce the customs more than one-half; the direct tax to one-half; and to repeal entirely the duty on furniture, and some other articles; but the duty on domestic distilled spirits is proposed to be reduced not more than a third. Can it, I would ask, be just or reasonable, that all other duties should be greatly reduced, or entirely repealed, except that on domestic distilled spirits? Why should it not be encouraged, as well as the manufacture of any other article? It is as necessary, to give us complete independence of foreign nations, as any other kind of manufacture. I trust, sir, that the just, equal, and magnanimous spirit which induces us to alleviate the burdens of the war, will not, cannot fail to direct us on this occasion, to an enlightened and upright policy. Such a policy as our constituents, in every quarter, and of every profession, may expect at our hands.

In another point of view this tax is impolitic. If it does not, on account of its excess, prohibit the manufacture of domestic spirits, it will, at least, cause the people to look out for expedients to evade the law, and will, thereby, be injurious, not only to the revenue, but to the morals of the country. The arguments from all sides of the House, in favor of reducing the customs, were bottomed on the supposition that they would be evaded. The gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. PICKERING,) said, the other day, that but one of the excessive duties growing out of the war had been enforced. Our merchants knew not how to smuggle. Now, if the merchants were thus honest and upright before those burdens were laid on them, will not the same argument apply with equal force to the distiller? Excessive taxes will ever produce smuggling and evasion; but when moderate and equal, they never have that tendency. I have heard that distillers would, under the enormous duties of 1815, run their spirits to fourth proof; that they would return only this to the collector, and then bring it down with water to the usual strength of saleable spirits. Though this act could not be called a violation of the law, it may yet be an evasion of that duty which the Government expected to receive; whereas, if the duty had been less, the distillers would have run their spirits to the usual strength, have given an account of it to the collector, and would have paid on it a greater amount of revenue, than they did when the duty was so high as to make them think of evading it; nay, when they were almost compelled to evade it. There is, in fine, a certain point in the taxation of every object to which you may go, and beyond which you cannot go, with any hope of augmenting your revenue. If a tax shall have gone beyond that point, the people will see and feel that the hand of Government is upon them, and, by a species of reaction, natural and inevitable, they will either oppose or evade the pressure. That the tax on stills has been much too high, we have every reason to believe, from the smaller number employed, and the less quantity of spirits distilled than would have been if the duty had been moderate.

Thus far, sir, as to the amount of the tax. I think it, however, objectionable on the score of inequality in its operation. It may be laid down as a rule, as a principle the most consistent with our Government, that all taxes should be equal in their operation; but this tax will violate that rule, and operate with an extreme and inordinate pressure on particular sections of the country. In a grain-growing country, or one producing orchards, remotely situated from market, spirits may be called the staple commodity. It is, then, extremely unequal to impose a tax on this staple almost prohibitory of its production. You might, with as much propriety, lay an exorbitant duty on the tobacco of Virginia, or the cotton of South Carolina and Georgia, as on the whiskey produced in other sections of the country. But gentlemen have said it is impossible to devise a tax which will not operate unequally. That in order to remedy this you must impose various taxes; that as some will operate unequally on this, and some on that section of the country, it may be fairly concluded that a general equality will be the result. But if the argument is correct in principle, it is far from being supported by the practice of the House. The salt tax is continued, although it is the most improper of all objects of indirect taxation. On whom does it operate? Certainly on the interior of the country. A direct tax of three millions is to be continued, notwithstanding it also operates most oppressively on the interior. But the furniture tax, which operates on our seaboard and our towns, and which, therefore, according to the argument of gentlemen, is necessary to produce equality, is proposed to be repealed. If to these instances be added the still tax, that unequal pressure on the interior of the country of which we complain will be increased, and the grievance can be lessened only by reducing the tax.

Another objection as to the inequality of the tax grows out of the manner in which it is to be laid, to wit: on the capacity of the still, and not on the quantity of spirits distilled, by which the duty is oppressive in some parts, and is scarcely felt in others. Owing to a peculiar structure of the stills in a certain section of the country, the distillers can, in twenty-four hours, make seven or eight times the quantity they are enabled to make in other sections. By this means the former class have greatly the advantage over the latter, while the latter may have performed as much labor, and been at as great an expense as the former. Does it, then, seem right or just that not only the cotton and tobacco planter should have the advantage over the distiller, but that one distiller should have the advantage over another? For my part, I cannot think it is; on the contrary, it is evidently more just and proper that the duty should be on the quantity. Then, he who makes one hundred gallons per day, will pay ten times as much tax as he who makes only ten gallons per day; and certainly he should do so, because the expense of making a hundred gallons is not ten times as great as the expense of making only ten gallons. In a direct proportion, therefore, he is more able to pay ten times the tax. In confirmation of this, let me ask, what is the principle universally aimed at in the levying and collecting of all our taxes? It is, that each individual should contribute revenue to the Government, in proportion to his pecuniary means or ability to do so. Land, for instance, ten times more fertile and productive than other land, is required to pay ten times the tax. The product of the soil, in this case, constitutes the ability of the landholder to contribute to Government. Why, then, should not the same criterion be adopted in regard to the distiller, from the product of his still, and the sales of spirits which he makes, (and the one supposition necessarily includes the other,) we may as fairly judge of his ability as of the ability of the landholder. I should, therefore, hope that the House would subject stills to the operation of the same equal and impartial rules as other objects of taxation are subjected to; that they alone would not be an exception to the general principles observed in the system of revenue which is proposed to be adopted.

I am aware, sir, of the reasons which have suggested this mode to the committee. They have thought that it would prevent abuses and evasions of the law; but I am unable to perceive the force of such argument. A man disposed to cheat the Government cannot be made honest and upright by the provisions and penalties of law, however circumspect and vindictory they may be. The sanguinary code of Great Britain has not yet been, and never will be, sufficient to restrain offenders. A dishonest man, who enters his still for two weeks or one month, when the duty is on the capacity, can work it for six weeks or two months with nearly as much ease as he could practise the deception of running spirits to fourth proof and bringing it down with water; or, as he could commit the fraud of making two thousand gallons and returning only one thousand to the collector, when the duty was on the quantity distilled. I cannot, therefore, feel the force of the argument offered by the committee. On the contrary, I think it better to make laws so easy and agreeable to the people that no inducements to transgress them will be afforded, than to aim at preventing violations by rigorous enactments.

A tax on the capacity of the still is injurious in another respect. One great advantage always to be derived from distillation is the support of stock. Some men, of experience and economy, have estimated that for every five bushels of grain worked daily, thirty head of stock could be fed. Upon trial, this is found to be so great a benefit, that many distillers continue their operations more for the advantage of their stock than for the profits of their whiskey. When the duty is on the capacity, they are forced to use great and wasteful exertions, and of course they are deprived of considerable advantage in that way; whereas, when the duty is on the quantity distilled, they may operate at leisure, according as they find it to their interest; and at certain times, when the season does not suit, when it is too warm or too cold, they may stop altogether.

In short, sir, there is a repugnance in the mind of the community against employing their stills by the capacity. The people see that a certain duty imposed on the capacity, operates partially; that if applied to the gallon, it would be more convenient to them, and more profitable to the Government. An evidence of this has lately occurred in Virginia; a gentleman from that State has favored me with the sight of a communication received from the collector of the district he represents. It is stated in the communication, that of near seven hundred stills which had been entered on his books, not more than about sixty had taken licenses. This proves indisputably the point for which I contend, that there is a repugnance in the mind of the community against the tax in that mode. Is it not, therefore, the duty and the policy of the Legislature to make laws agreeable to the people, especially when those laws, formed and fashioned to the will of the people, are not likely to be less productive of revenue to the Government? It is the mode, and not so much the amount of taxation, that renders it at any time odious and unacceptable to the people. But gentlemen have said, that if you do not lay the tax on the capacity of the still, you must either subject the citizens to domiciliary visits, or require them to make returns upon oath of the quantity of spirits they have distilled. But will a duty on licenses wholly remedy the evil, if it is one, of which you have such fears? No, I apprehend not. How did you ascertain the capacity of stills under the law of 1813, if your officers did not visit the houses of citizens, or if the latter were not permitted to state the capacity on oath? It is a fact coming within my own knowledge, that under the law of 1813 domiciliary visits were made by the collectors or their deputies—the people did not complain of this, but of the inconvenience to which they were subjected in not being permitted to use their stills at leisure by the gallon. Contrast the two objections, that of domiciliary visits, and that of their convenience just alluded to, and my word for it the people will choose the former. These visits are not so frightful as gentlemen would imagine. The collector, when not the messenger of an oppressive law, will be received as a visiting acquaintance or friend, more than as a person to whom odium should attach.

FEBRUARY, 1816.

The Revenue.

H. OF R.

But, sir, you have already acted on both the principles of which you are now so fearful. Under the laws of 1813 domiciliary visits were made; by the law of 1814, distillers were required to keep an account of the quantity of spirits they had distilled, and to verify or return the same upon oath. Why then should we at this time be so apprehensive of those which have heretofore been in use? For my own part, I see as much necessity for their continuance as for their original adoption.

But farther, sir, I should have no objection against allowing the citizens to make their returns by a simple statement or declaration—upon such statements you collect evidence for equalizing the direct tax. The assessors did not visit the houses of the citizens in one case out of twenty, and I have never heard of attempts to evade the law; on the contrary, there is a principle in human nature always to respect and reverence a confidence which has been liberally reposed. Laws which are tedious in detail, watchful and vindictive in their provisions, almost necessarily address themselves to the ingenuity of the evil-minded and excite a wish to evade them. Solon laid down the principle, that in order to prevent certain offences, it was better not to enact laws against them, because, as he maintained, those laws would only remind his fellow-citizens of the crimes which he had thus silently denounced and effectually prohibited. In like manner, sir, I would not remind our fellow-citizens of the possibility of swearing falsely by the multiplying oaths on every occasion—let us trust to their justice and their generosity. It is to be hoped, not indeed without assurance, that our confidence will not be misplaced. An individual who makes his return by a simple statement will feel that he is called upon by every noble principle of his nature to declare the truth—he will see that this Government has generously reposed in him a confidence, which his pride as a citizen, and his conscience as a man, cannot fail to reciprocate fully and sincerely. Believe me, sir, that any man who, under such circumstances, would state falsely, would not be much too good to swear falsely or to violate any other law which you can possibly make. If, however, gentlemen should think it better to require returns to be made upon oath, I am willing to the measure. Only accommodate your laws to the convenience of the people, and I shall be satisfied. In doing which it may be considered a rule, liable to very few exceptions, that the same degree of rigor necessary to prevent violations of the law when the duty is imposed on the gallon, will also be necessary to prevent violations when the duty is on the capacity. If the latter mode of taxation should be preferred, your laws, I think, must be as rigorous, as circumspect, and as offensive to the people, in order to obstruct abuses and evasions, as if the former mode were to be adopted.

The last part of my proposition is, that there should be a distinction between the tax on the distillation of spirits from the material of fruit, and that on the distillation of spirits from the material of grain. This I should think requires no confirmation, as the propriety of it must be obvious. The reasons are: first, that grain is a necessary of life, and it may sometimes happen, even in the most plentiful country, that this article will be scarce—hence no one will doubt but that as little of it as possible should be consumed by distillation. If then the difference which I propose should be adopted, it will have a tendency to promote the distillation of less grain and more fruit.

In the second place, grain is a necessary of life; but when converted into spirits it becomes a luxury. Fruit, on the other hand, is not a necessary of life, and when distilled it is the converting of one luxury into another. It would then seem an object worthy of legislative attention, so to provide by law that an article of necessity should not be converted into a luxury, when it is practicable to produce the latter, by the conversion of one luxury into another.

In the third place, if grain is not distilled it is an article which may be preserved. It may be applied to the various purposes of life not necessary now to be mentioned; or if not used by the grower, it may always be disposed of for a value at least equivalent to the toil of producing it. Fruit, on the contrary, is an article which cannot be kept. If not distilled within a short and given time it will perish, and we lose so much of the produce of our lands and profits of our labor. In proportion then as fruit is more perishable than grain, in the same proportion let it be more practicable and easy to distil the former than the latter.

The propriety of the distinction, in the fourth place, appears to be enforced by a consideration of more weight than any yet mentioned. Who, sir, are the persons that generally distil brandy? Are they men of the greatest wealth, or the less opulent portion of the community? I answer that they are generally of the latter class—men who live on poor lands and who derive much of their subsistence from the profit of their orchards. They are not cultivators of fertile lands producing rice, corn, or tobacco, but high, arid, and thin soils, which yield a greater profit from orchards than anything else in which they can be planted. Now, sir, if you make no difference in the duty, you confine or limit the business of distilling almost exclusively to one class of citizens. Those who distil whiskey are generally men somewhat advanced as to property, &c. They have such command of the products of the country that they can at any time purchase grain for their distilleries, whatever be the price or scarcity of the article, and can also at any time pay the tax to Government. Being possessed of wealth, they can shield themselves against any grievance or oppression to which by the operation of your laws they might otherwise be subjected. But with regard to fruit, although the rich have orchards, yet the poor have them also, and, when productive, the most indigent man in the community can have a little brandy to exchange for such articles of subsistence as he may want. By adopting then the distinction which I propose, you consult the interest, not of the wealthy or indigent alone, but of both together, whereas, when there is no distinction, you consult more the interest of the former and disparage that of the latter.

H. OF R.

The Revenue.

FEBRUARY, 1816.

It has in the last place been laid down as the most correct principle of policy in a course of legislation, that the rights and interests of the poor should be the objects of chief concern; for this plain reason, that the rich can always take care of themselves. But, sir, as my proposition does not contemplate any partial or exclusive advantage to either, but a common benefit to both, I hope it will meet with the general support of the House.

Mr. YANCEY made a speech of some length in support of Mr. WILLIAMS's motion; and against it Mr. INGHAM and Mr. BURNSIDE.

Mr. HARDIN preferred the amendment to the original proposition, though desiring a different modification.

Mr. WILLIAMS's motion was negatived by a large majority.

Mr. YANCEY successively moved two amendments, (having nearly the same object as that of Mr. WILLIAMS,) which were negatived, by majorities of 20 or 30 votes.

A motion was then made to strike out of the original resolution the words "one hundred," and in lieu thereof to insert "fifty," so as to reduce one-half the proposed addition to the capacity tax.

On motion of Mr. INGHAM the Committee rose, reported progress, and obtained leave to sit again.

THURSDAY, February 8.

Mr. CONDIOT presented a petition of sundry manufacturers of woollen goods in the States of New Jersey, Pennsylvania, and Delaware, praying that such measures may be adopted by Congress as will afford to them, and others engaged in similar manufactures, the security and encouragement necessary to a continuance of their labors.—Referred to the Committee on Commerce and Manufactures.

Mr. McLEAN, of Ohio, presented a resolution of the General Assembly of the State of Ohio, respecting the settlers on reserved lands within said State.—Referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

Mr. YANCEY, from the Committee of Claims, reported a bill for the relief of Thomas B. Farish; which was read twice, and committed.

Mr. ROBERTSON reported a bill confirming pre-emption rights given on the purchase of lands, to certain settlers in the State of Louisiana, and Territories of Missouri and Illinois; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. NELSON, of Virginia, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported that it was inexpedient to grant the prayer of the petition, for the removal of the district court, of the District of Maine, from the place where it is now held.—Agreed to.

Mr. CANNON laid before the House a resolution of the Legislature of Tennessee, requesting that the collection of the direct tax of the present year may be delayed wholly, or in part, to the next or a subsequent year; and also a resolution rejecting the amendments proposed to the Constitution of the United States by the States of Massachusetts and Connecticut.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the annual report of the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund.

On motion of Mr. INGHAM, the Secretary of the Treasury was requested to lay before the House a statement of the valuation of lands, &c., under the direct tax.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed bills of the following titles, to wit: "An act providing for the settlement of certain accounts against the Library of Congress, and for establishing the salary of the Librarian;" and "An act concerning certain courts of the United States in the State of New York;" in which bills they ask the concurrence of this House.

THE REVENUE.

The House resumed the consideration of the report of the Committee of Ways and Means, on the revenue.

The proposition to amend the resolve respecting the whiskey tax, by reducing the proposed addition of 100 per cent. on the capacity of the still to 50 per cent., was further debated at much length; supported by Messrs. CANNON, TAUL, THROOP, ROSS, McKEE, and YANCEY.

Mr. TAUL observed, that he had not expected to have participated in the debate on the subject now before the House. He was admonished, by his want of parliamentary experience, to be silent. Instead of attempting to lecture others, he felt it to be his duty to receive from them the lessons of wisdom and experience. In adhering to the resolution thus formed he had already (he hoped) profited much. To no member of this House had he listened with more pleasure as well as profit, than the honorable gentleman from South Carolina, at the head of the Committee of Ways and Means. Though he had the highest confidence in the opinions and views of that gentleman, and the members composing the committee, he believed that on this particular subject they were in an error; and, believing so, he should be an unfaithful public servant, were he to be silent. Should the resolution as reported by the committee be adopted, serious injury will be inflicted upon the Western country generally, without a countervailing benefit to the revenue of the country.

The Revenue.

H. OF R.

We are in Committee of the Whole on the state of the nation; and when thus in committee, it seems to be the fashion for gentlemen to express their opinion of the past, as well as their views of the present, and what ought to be the future course of policy to be pursued in this nation.

I do not purpose following the example which has been set. I will only observe, that my opposition to the resolution of the Committee of Ways and Means, does not proceed from a want of confidence in the Administration. The Administration has had, and still has my confidence. It has received my support to the extent of my feeble abilities. This country has contracted a very considerable debt in asserting its just rights. The revenue of the country should be equal, in time of peace, to the demands against it. I for one am decidedly in favor of raising this revenue; but I may differ with other gentlemen, as to the proper subjects of taxation; and when we agree as to the subjects of taxation, we may differ as to the amount. Such is the case, as to the tax proposed on licenses to distillers. The amount recommended by the committee to be continued, is in my opinion too high. While I agree in the general with gentlemen on this side of the House, I must be permitted to enter my protest against some of the projects I have heard recommended.

The honorable member of the Committee of Ways and Means (Mr. INGHAM) to whom the defence of this branch of the report seems to have been committed, in the remarks made by him last evening, observed that he expected the members of this House to have communicated the local information which they possessed in relation to the particular subject now under consideration, I thank the gentleman, sir, for this remark. At the time of the adoption of the Constitution of the United States, one of the most prominent objections against it, was, that the people would not be sufficiently represented, particularly in laying taxes. Gentlemen may talk of voting and taking that course which their judgment dictates; but the first principles of political science teach me to look to the situation, the wants, the feelings, and wishes of the people I represent. Sir, it is impossible to arrive at any just conclusions in legislative deliberations without adhering to those principles.

If one of the foreign tourists or journalists who travel through your country for the purpose of abusing it, had been in your gallery last evening and heard gentlemen narrating the various shifts and devices which they had understood had been resorted to, to evade the particular tax in question, he would have been much gratified. He would have flattered himself that he had conclusive evidence of everything that had been said or written to the disadvantage of this country—that our patriotism was idle rant, nothing of reality about it. Sir, unwise revenue laws will be evaded in every country; it is no reproach upon the people. I have no idea, however, that evasions have taken place to the extent which gentlemen suppose. The article of spirits distilled from domestic materials was taxed beyond what it could bear; hence, and hence only, the law was partially evaded. The tax may not be too high in some parts of the United States, particularly when distillation is carried on on a large capital. The committee doubtless labor under the impression, that the article in all parts of the United States will bear the tax; otherwise I am confident they would not have recommended it. The local information sought for by the honorable member before alluded to (Mr. INGHAM) most readily will I impart. I have no hesitation in stating it as a fact, that the heavy tax on spirits had the effect to prostrate nine out of ten of the distillers in the district which I represent. It is impossible for the manufacturer to sell the article for as much money as will pay the tax. A neighbor of mine (a distiller) informed me, not many days previous to my leaving home, that he had on hand nearly the whole of the spirits manufactured last Winter and Spring. He had paid the tax without being able to sell for money as much as would pay the one-twentieth part of the tax. This is not the case of a single individual only—it is the case of many, if not most of the distillers. Indeed I was credibly informed, previous to my leaving home, that the largest distillery in the district would not go into operation again under the existing rate of duties. Levy the tax contemplated, and it is certain death to all the small distilleries; the consequence of which will be a loss of all the capital invested in those establishments: besides the great loss to the farmer in not being able to convert his surplus grain into a less bulky article for importation, and the advantage of his distilling to his stock or cattle.

It is said, that the distiller has no cause of complaint; that the tax is paid by the consumer. Sir, it is true, that such is the belief, the expectation of most gentlemen; and the tax is laid under that impression. The practical result, however, proves the incorrectness of the theory. It would be correct, I grant you, if the article could be sold.

It is also contended, that, inasmuch as it is an article of luxury, it is a fit subject for taxation. It is perhaps not necessary to controvert the policy of the tax on principle, since there seems such a general, I may say almost unanimous determination to continue it in some shape. It ought to be recollected, however, that it is an article of luxury used by the poor, by the yeomanry of the country, by the laborer.

H. OF R.

The Revenue.

FEBRUARY, 1816.

The wealthy part of the country can afford to use a beverage of a different quality. Imported spirits and the juice of the grape are theirs. It has always been deemed politic to tax articles of luxury, not because they were such, but because they were used by those whose income was considerable, and of course were able and ought to pay.

The honorable member from Louisiana (Mr. ROBERTSON) certainly misunderstood my friend from Tennessee, (Mr. CANNON,) who moved the amendment, or he would not have imputed to him his being influenced by narrow views. He seems to have understood the gentleman from Tennessee as opposing the tax, solely on the ground of its inequality. Sir, it is unequal, highly unequal, as the gentleman from Tennessee has, in my opinion, clearly demonstrated; and this inequality ought to have great influence; but the gentleman from Tennessee opposed it, as I do, on broader ground. It is not only unequal, it is oppressive, ruinous; tax the article too high, and you prohibit its manufacture. Your revenue of course must be lost.

I am decidedly of opinion, that an addition of 50 per centum on licenses to distillers, will produce nearly, if not quite as much as 100 per cent., and I believe it is as heavy a duty as the article will bear.

But the gentleman from Louisiana says, that the spirit manufactured in the Western country is exported to the Orleans market and sold there. That honorable and enlightened gentleman well knows that the Orleans market is a very precarious one; that spirits distilled from grain or fruit is a dull article in the market at that port, as is almost every other article, the produce of Ohio, Kentucky, Tennessee, &c. This must be the case for many years to come. Such is the vast extent of fertile country, watered by the tributary streams of the Mississippi, that the Orleans market is generally glutted.

I do not pretend to have anything like a correct knowledge of the average price of whiskey, brandy, &c., at that market, but I doubt very much if an exporter could get the first cost of the article. I am well convinced that the exportation of this article from Kentucky, since the increased duty was laid, has been considered a bad business.

Sir, this is a dull subject; the House cannot be entertained with anything that could be said. Our opinion on estimating the amount of duty proper to be levied must be governed by practical results; a detail of which is all I have attempted.

Mr. THROOP said, that the interest his constituents had in the subject in debate, made it his duty to submit a few arguments to the consideration of the Committee. He lamented, that at a period when we were left calmly to consider and adopt such measures as would contribute to the wealth of the country, repair its finances, and restore its credit, the productions of the interior of the Northern States should be selected as the prey of a system of revenue, which, in every other respect, had his entire approbation and support. He approved of that system, not merely because it would enable the Government to keep up proper military and naval establishments, but because it would produce an extinguishment of a national debt in a short period of time. He should vote for the motion, and should have liked it better had it been to reduce the increase on the capacity of stills to twenty-five per cent., and would have been better pleased with the bill, had it proposed to leave the capacity-tax as it now stood. He should not vote this reduction because he was opposed to a tax on whiskey; he thought it as fit a subject of taxation as anything presented by the pursuits of the country. Our country at present affords but few subjects for internal taxation, and none which operate with exact equality. The tax on whiskey is paid by the consumer, and the consumption is so universal that he thought the tax would operate more equally than any other which had been selected. But while he was willing it should be taxed, all he asked was, that it should be reasonable, and not so heavy as to suppress the business, or distress the farmer. He spoke of the productions of the interior of the Northern States as the prey of the system, for these reasons: the world is now at peace, the inhabitants are relieved from that desolating warfare, which, for a long period of time, had depressed their resources; they would now return to their agricultural pursuits, and would make the earth yield sufficient of all the articles of provision for their own consumption, and that of their colonies. The produce of the interior of the Northern States is wheat, corn, and other grain, which go to market, either in their natural state, or as pork and beef. While war continued in Europe, a demand was created in that part of the world for these articles, and this demand raised the price of them sufficiently high to bear transportation. The interior of the Northern States derived their wealth from the sale of their surplus produce in this manner. But by the peace these resources were cut off; their productions will not bear transportation to other parts of the United States, where there is a deficit of those articles. What were these people to do? They cannot raise cotton, tobacco, and sugar, productions of the Southern States, which bear so high a price, and enrich the planter. Their climate will not admit of it; they must either sink into poverty, or turn their produce into a more portable as well as marketable form. This can only be done by making it into whiskey. A high tax upon whiskey would not tend very much to reduce the quantity which will be made, nor will it operate against the large distiller. On the contrary, the large distiller would profit by it. He would extend his business with immense profit, for, by driving the small distiller from the business, he would be enabled to regulate the price both of the article manufactured, and the material of which it is made. There are many persons engaged in that business of small capitals, say two or three thousand dollars, and many farmers who distil the surplus produce of their own farms. The small manufacturers and farmers were driven from the business by the heavy duties imposed during the war, and will not return to it, if we continue a heavy duty. The effect will be, by driving so many purchasers of grain from the market, to destroy competition, and particularly competition between credit and money, and to place the farmer in the power of those who continue the business; the latter will fix the market price of grain, and ask what they please for the liquor. The small distiller will be compelled to relinquish the business, because he cannot sell his production for money to meet the demands of the tax-gatherer, which will amount for stills in ordinary use, at the proposed rates of duty, to seven or eight hundred dollars. The manufacturer will be enriched, but the farmer will be impoverished. But it is said that a system of taxation is a system of compromise, and, therefore, it is necessary to lay a heavy duty on whiskey to equalize the other taxes to be imposed. He replied, that he did not understand how that reasoning applied to this case. The objection was not to a tax, but to an enormous and oppressive tax. But how was this tax to counterbalance or equalize other taxes? Do we not pay our proportion of the imposts? We certainly do so in the consumption of foreign articles. Do we not pay our share of the duty on refined sugar? We do. Do we not pay our share of the stamp duty? I think we do. We may not have as much business directly with banks as in some other parts of the country; but the returns of that source of revenue show that it is in the first place paid in the great mercantile places, probably by merchants; and there can be no doubt but it is added to the price of the goods those merchants sell. Do we not pay our part of the duty on sales at auction? We do; for this also is paid in the first place by merchants, who add what they pay to the price of their merchandise. Do we not pay our proportion of the salt tax? We do; and it needs no argument to show that we pay our proportion of the land tax. We pay our proportion of every other internal tax imposed, and have superadded to it the license to distillers.

But, sir, said Mr. T., there is another point of view in which the tax under consideration is very popular. It is said that the excessive use of ardent spirits is immoral. It is true, sir, that it is a vice, a deep-rooted vice; but it finds soil in the passions and propensities of man. I would gladly suppress it. But will you suppress it by imposing upon it a tax? No, sir. He who indulges in it knows that it leads directly to disease, poverty, and disgrace. If these are not sufficient restraints upon his appetite, vain will be the attempt to restrain him by increasing the price of the article. His inclinations will be indulged, and if he cannot find their gratification in the home production, he will seek the foreign. If, sir, it is intended seriously to suppress the vice, we set about it in the wrong way. It can be done only by prohibiting, under some penalties, the manufacture or importation of liquors. It, then, becomes every nation to develop its own resources, and by judicious laws to bring into action every pursuit which will add to its wealth. While man will indulge his appetite for spirituous liquors, it becomes our Government to encourage its manufacture at home, as one of the sources of national wealth. From the experience we have already had, we can form our conclusions to what extent it may be made to supply the place of importations. It is not only used in the simple form of whiskey, but after going through the process of rectification, by which the essential oil and offensive taste is extracted, it is made into gin, and mixed with rum and brandy. It may be in some cases practised as fraud, but the habit of mixing is so universal, and well understood, that the merchant will sell you, as brandy and rum, the mixed liquors at a reduced price. It forms a liquor less prejudicial than the mixture of poisonous drugs we receive from abroad, and, when skilfully done, would require a nice palate to distinguish it from unmixed liquors. Should, then, this manufacture be properly encouraged, it would, ere long, almost wholly supersede the necessity of importing those liquors, and thus stop to enrich our own soil, that flood of wealth which issues from it, for the purpose of those articles. It remains to be considered how the amendment proposed will affect the revenue.

The Committee of Ways and Means propose to raise, by this duty, $2,400,000. If we look at the proceeds of this tax it will be seen, that during the year 1814, the licenses to distillers produced about $1,688,000. If the amendment prevails, and the returns of 1814 be considered a correct data to judge of its produce, it will yield to the revenue between $2,500,000 and $2,600,000, being a sum more than is required. He believed, however, that it would produce more. If the heavy war excise is taken off, many persons will engage in the business, and the want of a foreign market for produce will compel the farmers to have their grain manufactured. Hence, as the manufacture increases, the revenue will also increase. But, should the estimate of the proceeds of the present capacity duty be correct, that is to say $1,200,000, then the addition of fifty per cent., as proposed by the amendment, would produce $1,800,000, leaving a deficit of $600,000. He said he believed that deficit would be abundantly supplied from other sources of revenue. The public lands were estimated to produce one million, but it will be seen that the revenue received from that source during the year 1815, amounted to nearly two and a half millions; and he had no doubt, from the excellence of the lands the Government had for sale, and the immense emigration to the Western countries, that those lands would be much more productive to the revenue than they have ever been. But even should this fail, we have, after making all the appropriations contemplated, a surplus revenue of more than two millions, from which the deficit may be supplied. And he thought it would be better to do so, should we be compelled to it, than to suppress a very important manufacture of the country.

Messrs. ROBERTSON, LOWNDES, SMITH, of Maryland, and TAYLOR, of New York, opposed the motion. It was negatived by a very small majority.

Mr. McLEAN, of Kentucky, then moved to amend the resolve, so as to equalize the rate of a license to distil per week, month, &c., to the rate of the license per year; which motion was agreed to by a majority of twenty or thirty votes.

The main resolution, to repeal the duty on the quantity of spirits distilled, and to increase the duty on the capacity of the still 100 per cent., was then agreed to.

The next resolution was then taken up, as follows, viz:

Resolved, That it is expedient to repeal the act, entitled "An act to provide additional revenues for defraying the expenses of Government, and maintaining the public credit, by laying duties on household furniture, and on gold and silver watches," passed on the 18th of January, 1815.

Mr. JACKSON, of Virginia, Mr. SOUTHARD, and Mr. ROSS, opposed the agreement to this resolution, on the ground of the equity of the tax, and the practicability of amending it so as to defeat the evasion of it, and to make it more productive.

Mr. LOWNDES defended the resolve, on the ground of the unproductiveness of the tax, having been calculated to produce $1,200,000, and producing in fact, only $70,000; though willing to listen and accede to any definite proposition for rendering it efficient and productive.

Mr. FORSYTH moved to amend the resolve, by adding at the end thereof the words, "except so far as relates to the duty on gold and silver watches." This motion was negatived.

Mr. JACKSON, of Virginia, then moved to amend the resolve, so as to embrace the continuance of the duty on household furniture, &c., "and also to provide against the evasion of said law." This motion was negatived—68 to 63.

The resolve of the Committee of Ways and Means was then agreed to by the Committee—ayes 68.

The remaining resolution was then taken up, as follows:

Resolved, That it is expedient so to amend the rates of duties upon imported articles, after the 30th of June next, as that they shall be estimated to produce an amount equal to that which would be produced by an average addition of 42 per cent. to the permanent rates of duties.

Agreed to without a division.

The Committee then rose, and reported their proceedings to the House.

Mr. LOWNDES, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported a bill to carry into effect the proposition respecting the direct tax, (adopted by the House the other day,) which bill was twice read, and committed.

And on motion, the House adjourned until tomorrow.

FRIDAY, February 9.

The bill from the Senate "providing for the settlement of certain accounts against the Library of Congress, and for establishing the salary of the Librarian," was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

The bill from the Senate "concerning certain courts of the United States in the State of New York," was read twice, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Ordered, That the Committee of the whole House to whom is committed the bill for the relief of the Canadian refugees who joined the American army during the late war with Great Britain, be discharged from a further consideration thereof, and that it be committed to the Committee of the whole House on the bill making provision for an additional military academy.

Mr. BURWELL, from the committee appointed on the petition of Dr. James Smith, reported a bill supplementary to "An act to encourage vaccination;" which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. KING, of Massachusetts, rose to make some observations in reply to some remarks from Mr. WILDE, which he had seen in the National Intelligencer, but which, not having distinctly heard, he had permitted to pass without reply, which he should not have done had he understood them. Mr. K. was proceeding to speak on this subject, when the Speaker reminded him that no debate could be permitted unless on some question before the House; in the justice of which Mr. K. acquiescing, waived his remarks until a fit occasion should offer for them.

Mr. WARD, of Massachusetts, offered for consideration the following resolutions:

Resolved, That all duties, imports, and excises, laid by Congress, ought not only to be laid uniformly throughout the United States, agreeably to the provision in the Constitution, but ought to be collected in all parts of the United States in the same currency, or in currencies equivalent in value.

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be instructed to receive, alone, in payment of duties, imposts, and excises, and debts due to the United States, gold, silver, and copper coin, Treasury notes, and the notes of such banks as pay specie for their bills, excepting in cases in which it is otherwise provided by law.

Mr. WARD briefly assigned his reasons for offering these propositions, which will be found concisely and clearly stated in the first of the above resolutions.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, rose to speak; but, on motion of Mr. TUCKER, the resolutions were laid on the table for the present.

INQUIRY RESPECTING OFFICE, &c.

Mr. RANDOLPH rose to make the motion of which he gave notice the day before yesterday, to inquire into the constitutionality of the late appointment of General P. B. Porter, not having got to the House in time to make it yesterday. It was not his purpose, he said, to amplify on this occasion at all. The House would recollect that at the time he had submitted notice of this motion he had distinctly stated that it was not for him to pronounce whether the office in question had or had not been created during the time for which the late honorable member of this House from New York had been elected to serve. Some very obliging friend had been kind enough to hint to him that perhaps he had not pondered on the subject so well as he ought to have done before he introduced it to the House; that this office, under the authority of the United States, being created by the Treaty, was called into existence, although it remained vacant until lately, at the moment when the exchange of the ratifications of that treaty took place. This might or might not be, Mr. R. said; for, what was this argument but to assume (he would not say to beg) the very question concerning the treaty-making power which this House had already once decided in the negative, viz., that a treaty, without the intervention, instrumentality, without the aid of this House, is ipso facto the law of the land. Mr. R. said he should be extremely ashamed ever to venture so crude a motion in this House as this would have been, if he had not taken into consideration, and deep and mature consideration too, the point which some were obliging enough to suppose he had overlooked, and civil enough to put him right in respect to it. If he understood the doctrines which he had heard, he did not say uttered, on this floor, in respect to the treaty-making power, this case of the honorable member from New York, who had recently vacated his seat in this House, came fully within the purview of the article in the Constitution of the United States; and he would go further, as special pleading was the order of the day, and say that if it did not come within its purview in this view of the subject, it nevertheless would in another. It did not follow, it was not logic, he said—it might be logic in Westminster Hall, but it was not in Parliament—that because the appointment in question did not come within the purview of this section for particular reasons, it might not for some other very substantial reason, which was not disclosed, but about which he had no concealment, as he had not, never had, and never would have, about public men or measures. After reading the following clause from the sixth section of the first article of the Constitution, viz.: "No Senator or Representative shall, during the time for which he was elected, be appointed to any civil office under the authority of the United States, which shall have been created, or the emoluments whereof shall have been increased during such time"—Mr. R. moved

"That a committee be appointed to inquire whether the acceptance, by the Hon. Peter B. Porter, late a member of this House from the State of New York, of a civil office under the authority of the United States, does contravene the provisions of the sixth section of the first article of the Constitution of the United States."

Mr. FORSYTH suggested that the terms of this motion did not embrace the question which he understood the gentleman to desire to place before the House—the acceptance of a civil office not being an offence against any provision of the Constitution of the United States. He should be pleased to see it modified so as to place the question distinctly before the House.

Mr. RANDOLPH said he had no objection to any modification which would attain his object. He bottomed himself, in proposing this inquiry, on facts which are on record, and which the House was presumed to know. Had not the gentleman vacated his seat in this House? Was he amenable to the order of the Speaker as a member of this House? How did his seat become vacated? By his acceptance of a civil office under the authority of the United States, which the gentleman from Georgia had said was no offence against the Constitution? No, said Mr. R., it is neither an offence against the Constitution, nor contra bonos mores, that I know; but there is a modification of the proposition which may make it contrary to the Constitution—the Committee are to try that question. Is there not an issue made up? The honorable gentleman has accepted an office; it is our duty to inquire whether the acceptance of it be Constitutional or not, because, if unconstitutional, then it is the duty of this House to see that the breach is repaired, that the wrong is redressed. Mr. R. said he was not acquainted with the styles and titles of the gentleman in question; he had had a great many; with the old one he was acquainted, with the new one he was not. Mr. R. said he had no more doubt that this appointment was a breach of the Constitution than the acceptance of another office by a late member of this House, the office having been created and the salary fixed a few days before his term of service expired, was an evasion, and scandalous evasion, of the provision of the Constitution which he had just quoted.

Mr. FORSYTH having suggested a modification of the motion, declaring at the same time that he should not vote for the inquiry, Mr. RANDOLPH accepted it, so as to read as follows:

"Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire whether the acceptance, by the Hon. Peter B. Porter, of the office of Commissioner under the late Treaty of Ghent, is in contravention of the sixth section of the first article in the Constitution of the United States."

On suggestion of Mr. WRIGHT, the words "appointment and" were inserted before the word "acceptance."

The question having been stated on the adoption of the resolve—

Mr. FORSYTH rose and said, it was with much reluctance he opposed any motion, the object of which was inquiry into alleged abuses under Government. But the appointment of a committee on this occasion, appeared to him so totally unnecessary, that he was compelled to oppose it. If he had understood the gentleman from Virginia, his idea was, that the office had been created during the time for which the gentleman in question had been elected to serve in this House. But the person named in the resolve had been elected to serve from the 4th of March, 1815, to the 4th of March, 1817. The office which he had accepted, had existence prior to the 4th of March, 1815; or it is not yet created. Either it has no existence, or it existed from the day on which the ratifications of the Treaty of Peace were exchanged—the 18th February, 1815. If the office was created by the Treaty of Peace, the acceptance of it was certainly no violation of the letter or spirit of the Constitution. If it was necessary this House should act on the treaty before the office has being, then Peter B. Porter has accepted no office; the office he is said to have accepted having no existence. The gentleman from Virginia seems to suppose, said Mr. F., that the doctrines maintained by this House as to the treaty-making power, are adverse to the idea of the office having been created by the treaty. Not so, said Mr. F., those doctrines are perfectly consistent with the idea that this office was created by the convention. It is not pretended that Commissioners for any purpose of foreign intercourse, as regulated by treaty, may not be created by the President and Senate; on the contrary, according to my understanding, the office is correctly created by the President and Senate, and entirely within their power. The agreement between the two Governments that certain questions should be settled by Commissioners, required not the sanction of this House, further than it would become necessary for the House to make an appropriation to pay them for their services. If their services were to be compensated by any act of this House which Peter B. Porter had assisted in passing, there would be some evidence of a violation of the Constitution; that no such fact existed, nor any other that was sufficient to authorize this House to inquire into the subject.

H. OF R.

Inquiry Respecting Offices, &c.

Mr. RANDOLPH said, the honorable gentleman's dilemma, which he had so triumphantly presented to the House, carried on its horns no terrors for him. The honorable gentleman ought to be obliged to him, he said, for having, by timely notice of this motion, given him an opportunity to sharpen the horns of his dilemma. They reminded him, he said, of a circumstance attending the exhibition of the bull-fights of the Portuguese, in their ancient and better days—the horns of the animal turned out were covered with leather; they threatened, but wounded not; and that is the case, said he, with the horns with which the gentleman makes full butt at me. The gentleman had said, that the office to which the late member from New York was appointed, has been in existence from the 18th day of February last; or, because the House has not definitively acted on the treaty, the office itself is yet in embryo, ready to be called, but not yet springing into existence. Would the honorable gentleman from Georgia tell this House, and would he tell this nation that to appoint to an office not in existence, and to accept an office which has no existence, is no offence? On the contrary, Mr. R. said, if the office was not in existence, then the indecent hurry to reward a political partisan with some of the fruits of the war, which was concocted under his auspices, called forth the decisive interference and correction of this House. So much for that horn of the dilemma—that horn, said he, I think is sawed off—the other will not remain on much longer. But this office was created by the treaty. Does it therefore follow, that it does not come within the purview of the part of the provision of the Constitution which I have read? There was not an instant of time from the creation of the office, be it created when it will, that the acceptor of the office was not a member of this House. Mr. R. here spoke of the precise time when the term of service of a new Congress commences—mathematically, at midnight of the 3d of March; politically, at that moment the index of the clock of the House, set backwards or forwards, to suit circumstances, pointed to twelve o'clock, &c. Was there a moment, he asked, from the creation of the office, supposing it to have been created under the treaty, in which that gentleman was not a member of this House? He would go farther—was not the acceptor of the office a member of the House pending the discussion of the question, whether the treaty should or should not be carried into effect by a vote of this House? [Mr. R. was here informed, that he was not.] I am mistaken, it appears, said he; I retract this inference—I do not say recant it; for I detest all sorts of canting, and particularly recanting. If the office had been created by the Treaty of Peace, Mr. R. said it did not follow that the honorable member was (if he might coin a word) appointable to that office? If the Constitution forbade the appointment of a member to an office, the salary of which was increased during the term for which he was elected, a fortiori the creation of the salary constitutes the same impediment. The gentleman from Georgia had told the House he deemed this inquiry wholly unnecessary. Mr. R. said, if he had understood the honorable gentleman's arguments during the discussion of the question lately decided by this House, respecting the treaty, he should have been led to believe, that of all the members of this body, he was that member to whom the necessity of such an inquiry would be obvious, and the propriety of it most readily acknowledged. Mr. R. said, he was not without expectations, knowing the honorable gentleman's lead in this House, that he would be a member of the committee, if raised, and would have an opportunity of showing much more satisfactorily than he had done this morning, of establishing, by facts and deductions too, that the appointment of Peter B. Porter was not a contravention of the Constitution. The inquiry would do very little harm, in any view. Mr. R. said that, for one, he was certainly not much pestered with committee business, and if the inquiry should devolve on him, he should endeavor to execute it to the best of his capacity—he certainly would present a report that would embrace all the facts; and he would endeavor to state even the law of the case as well as he could, in his hobbling way—not being even journeyman in the profession. If this inquiry was denied, Mr. R. said, he could easily come at his object in another way; he had only to lay a resolution on the table, that such an appointment was contrary to the provisions of the Constitution. But, if facts were wanted, a committee ought to be appointed to get them. We ought to reason from facts, and not to them. As to the legal question, Mr. R. said, he should not set much value on this particular clause of the Constitution, if it were not that it was a part of it, and his vote could not put it in or expunge it. He was no Constitution-monger or fancier—he took the Constitution, ita scripta est, as he found it. This clause was not, he repeated, of any value, as to its effect; it was about as good a fence around this House against the temptation of office, as the accountability at the Treasury was fence around it against the public robber. If you want mischievous stock on your farm or plantation, he said, you must keep bad fences; if you would have roguish hogs, cows, and horses, keep bad fences—those who would not otherwise have ventured to jump over a straw, will in that way soon learn to jump, as we say in the Southern country, over ten rails and a rider. As a fence round the purity of this House he said, this part of the Constitution was of little or no value—he considered it of none, and rather worse than none. The warnings of Patrick Henry and George Mason on this article of the Constitution were yet ringing in his ears. This clause, he said, was a stalking-horse, put into the Constitution, as if there was some guard set against the appointment of a member of the House by the Executive to office—some guard against the establishment of Executive influence over this body. There is none, said he. It is as good a defence as a fishing seine would be against a constant shower of rain. You may dart straws through it; and the honorable members from New York and Georgia have amused themselves with darting straws through it. It was so easy a thing, he said, to put new men in old offices, and old men in new, that the only thing that astonished him in this business was, the indecency of the appointment of such a man to such an office, in contravention of the Constitution—such a man, he said, for he had the honor of serving on the Committee of Foreign Relations with him during the session which ended in the declaration of war—the gentleman had been at that time chairman of the Committee of Foreign Relations—but he had vacated that office. Mr. R. said, he had nothing to do with that honorable gentleman, except in his public character as a member of this body—and, knowing the agency which he had had, at least at the eleventh hour—he returned to the war feast at the eleventh hour—knowing the agency he had had in bringing about the war, he was only astonished, when he considered how easy it was to get in, over, and around this provision of the Constitution, at the indelicacy with which it has been violated in this instance.

FEBRUARY, 1816.

Inquiry Respecting Offices, &c.

H. OF R.

Mr. FORSYTH said, he regretted that the gentleman from Virginia should have supposed he had come to the House with his horns sharpened to wound him. I had no such intention, said Mr. F.; whilst I continue a member of this House with that honorable gentleman, all that I expect is to escape his horns. Mr. F. said, that he had no intention to say, that an appointment to an office not created, was no violation of the Constitution; but it was no violation of the particular section of the Constitution which the gentleman had quoted. The inquiry was limited in its object, and if I show to the satisfaction of the House, said Mr. F., that there was no violation of the particular article of the Constitution, whether the office was or was not created, my object is answered. The honorable gentleman had said enough to show that he was mistaken in the facts which had induced him to submit this motion. The gentleman seemed to suppose that the late member from New York had been a member of Congress at the time of the ratification of the Treaty of Peace; but he was not at any time a member of the last Congress, having become a member on the 4th day of March last, a day posterior to the creation of the office, if the office were at all created.

With respect to the observation respecting the selection of such a man, Mr. F. observed he would say nothing; the appointment was before the people, for them to approve or condemn, and he trusted their decision would not be influenced, or at all affected by the observations of the gentleman from Virginia. Of General Porter, Mr. F. said, he knew nothing, but as he knew him here; he would, he doubted not, as well discharge the duties of his office as any gentleman who could have been appointed.

[Mr. RANDOLPH here explained. He had said nothing of the moral character of Mr. Porter. He had spoke of him as one of the agents in producing the war, and as being now rewarded by the fruits of the peace. He spoke of him and his appointment in that light only.]

Mr. F. said he knew not, as he had not been a member of the Twelfth Congress, how far he had an agency in producing that war. Such an agency would, in the eyes of the gentleman, be a crime—in his eyes, Mr. F. said, it was no crime; and he believed by the people generally it was not regarded as a criminal act. Mr. F. said he did not precisely understand the force of the gentleman's allusion to his having darted straws through the Constitution; so far as he understood the provisions of this Constitution, he had scrupulously obeyed its injunctions. He should do so with the same spirit of sincerity as the gentleman from Virginia, or any other gentleman. The gentleman from Virginia might have intended to intimate that the doctrines of Mr. F. were contradictory or inconsistent in regard to the construction of the Constitution; but to himself, Mr. F. said, it was sufficiently clear there was no contradiction between them; and the gentleman from Virginia must forgive me, said he, for preferring my own judgment in this respect to his.

Mr. WRIGHT was desirous to see a spirit of scrutiny prevail, but he did not wish to see it unnecessarily exerted. The provision of the Constitution which had been quoted, he said, was intended to guard against the creation of office, and the increase of emolument, by members of Congress, for the benefit of themselves. This appointment, however, cannot come within the purview of this provision of the Constitution. Did the treaty create the office; and, if it did, was that the kind of office which the Constitution had contemplated? He contended not. The terms of the treaty did not create the right, he argued, but imposed the obligation to appoint those Commissioners. The office to which the late member of this House was appointed, he considered not a civil but a ministerial office, for the execution of international objects. The President did not derive from the treaty his authority to appoint these Commissioners, but from the Constitution. The office was made necessary by the treaty, but the obligation to make the appointment is imposed by the Constitution. The office was created by the Constitution; the necessity of the appointment was created by the treaty. But even the treaty was ratified before the acceptor of this office became a member of this House; and the emolument attached to it had been neither diminished nor increased whilst he was a member. Mr. W., therefore, expressed his hope that his honorable friend from Virginia, for whom he had a great respect, particularly on account of his investigating spirit, would withdraw his motion; and that, if it was not withdrawn, it would not be agreed to.

Mr. RANDOLPH said he did not set up for the model of the gentleman from Georgia, or any other gentleman; he was the keeper of no man's conscience, the arbiter of no man's opinions. The consistency of the gentleman's opinions was his own affair; but if they are what I consider inconsistent, said Mr. R., it is my affair, and I must retain my opinion, however reluctant to think so of his opinions, &c. If the gentleman from Maryland had succeeded in convincing him that the appointment in question was not an office, Mr. R. said, he should certainly withdraw his proposition; but he had not succeeded. The words of the Constitution are—"any civil office under the authority of the United States." If the appointment in question be not an office, he said he should like to know what an office is. What could the duty of Commissioners be resolved into, if it was not resolvable into an office? If it were not an office, he asked, what was it? Officium—it had every character of an office, filled by the regular Constitutional power, the acceptance of which was incompatible with a seat on this floor. The acceptor of the office was himself conscious he could not retain his seat on this floor; he would have been very glad, I have no doubt, said Mr. R.—I judge of other men by no unfair criterion—he would have been very glad to have held his seat—for I have seen nothing in the history of the gentleman which leads me to suppose he has any very violent objection to pluralities. Mr. R. then proceeded to reply to Mr. WRIGHT's argument, and appealed to the older members of the House—to the fathers in point of age—and particularly to the honorable gentleman from North Carolina, (Mr. STANFORD,) who, he said, was the father of the House, as being the oldest member—he appealed to them for the doctrines laid down in 1793, and particularly by Mr. Gallatin, then a member from Pennsylvania, in respect to the power and discretion residing in the President and Senate as to the appointment of Ministers, &c., and stated more amply his argument in favor of the inquiry in this particular case.

Mr. GROSVENOR briefly examined this case. He did not incline to believe that the Constitutional objections to the appointment in question could be sustained. This appeared to be his general impression; but, as there were great doubts on the minds of some gentlemen, and he was not himself perfectly satisfied as to the question, the inquiry ought to be had. We ought never, said Mr. G., to permit the Executive to set his foot in this House without inquiry, nor even to suffer a suspicion to exist of his having done so.

Mr. FORSYTH spoke in explanation and reply to some incidental remarks by Mr. RANDOLPH when last up.

Mr. RANDOLPH explained in turn; and answered some of Mr. GROSVENOR's observations, &c.

Mr. GROSVENOR and Mr. WRIGHT further replied to Mr. RANDOLPH's observations on the construction of the Constitution; the first favoring, the other opposing the inquiry.

Mr. STANFORD advocated the inquiry, and quoted the records to show that the House had decided a violation of the spirit of the Constitution to be a sufficient ground for them to protest against the case in which it occurred. If he were, indeed, the father of the House, according to the figure used by Mr. RANDOLPH, he said he would advise its members to avoid the crumbs of office from the Executive, and to look to the People only, to whom they owed their appointments, as the source of honor, &c.

Mr. YATES, besides showing by argument the weakness of the grounds on which this motion was sustained, vindicated General Porter from any intimations or insinuations which had been thrown out unfavorable to him in the course of debate. He adverted to his high character and conduct, and particularly to his disinterestedness in supporting the late war, if he had contributed to it as was said; since, in so doing, he had devoted to certain destruction an immensely valuable property lying on the shores of the Niagara, which had since fallen a sacrifice, &c.

The question was then taken on Mr. RANDOLPH's motion, as modified, and agreed to—70 votes to 55.

Mr. RANDOLPH, Mr. GROSVENOR, Mr. FORSYTH, Mr. JACKSON, and Mr. YATES, were appointed the said committee.

THE REVENUE.

The House then resumed the consideration of the report of the Committee of the Whole on the remaining proposition of the Committee of Ways and Means.

The proposition respecting the duty on distillation (to repeal the duty on the quantity of spirits distilled, and to add one hundred per cent. to the present tax on the capacity of the still) first came up.

Mr. THROOP moved to amend the proposition by striking out one hundred and inserting fifty in lieu thereof, so as to reduce the additional capacity tax from one hundred to fifty per cent. on the existing duty.

This motion was decided without debate: For the amendment 74, against it 70, as follows:

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH then moved further to amend the resolve so as to exempt from this addition to the capacity-tax on stills, such stills as shall be wholly employed in the distillation of spirits derived from fruit, herbs, and roots.

This motion was opposed by Mr. LOWNDES and Mr. ROSS, (by the latter on the ground of the impossibility of guarding the duty, thus modified, from evasion.) and was negatived, by yeas and nays—107 to 36—as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. A motion was then made by Mr. THOMAS further to amend the said seventh resolution, by striking out all thereof after the word "expedient" and to insert as follows:

"To repeal the act entitled 'An act laying duties on licenses to distillers of spirituous liquors,' passed on the 24th of December, 1813; also the act entitled 'An act laying a duty on spirits distilled within the United States,' passed on the 21st of December, 1814, and that in lieu thereof, that all stills, boilers, and other instruments of machinery adapted to the distillation of spirits, be assessed and taxed in proportion to their assessed value, at a ratio corresponding with the tax paid in each of the States upon the hundred dollars' worth of lands and slaves."

And the question thereon being taken, it was determined in the negative.

Mr. KING, of Massachusetts, took the opportunity of pursuing the course of remarks indicated at the commencement of to-day's proceedings, in reply to Mr. WILDE's observations on Monday last, as reported in the National Intelligencer—to which Mr. WILDE replied at some length.

This debate lasted some time; and, when it terminated, the House adjourned without deciding the main question on the proposition of the Financial Committee.

SATURDAY, February 10.

Mr. YANCEY, from the Committee of Claims, reported a bill for the relief of Charles Todd; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. POWELL, from the committee appointed on the petition of Thomas H. Boyle, made a report thereon, which was read; when Mr. P. presented a bill for the relief of Thomas H. Boyle; which was read, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

The Committee on Military Affairs were discharged from a further consideration of the letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting information relative to the execution of the act fixing the Military Peace Establishment, and the said letter was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. EASTON presented a resolution of the Legislature of the Territory of Missouri, respecting the leasing and working the lead mines belonging to the United States in said Territory; which was referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

On motion of Mr. McKEE,
Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to have laid before this House such of the accounts of James Thomas, late a Deputy Quartermaster General of the United States, as relate to purchases made, or expenses incurred, under any order of General Smyth, in the years 1812 and 1813, together with all the evidence relating to such accounts, and the manner in which the said accounts were settled, and the principles established in the settlement thereof.

Mr. McKEE and Mr. HERBERT were appointed a committee to present the said resolution to the President.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a report from the Secretary of War, on the memorial of William Tatham; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

On motion of Mr. ROOR, the Committee on the Copper Coin were instructed to inquire into the expediency of increasing the alloy, or reducing the weight of the small silver coin of the United States.

THE REVENUE.

The House then resumed the consideration of the report of the Committee of Ways and Means, being the seventh resolution thereof, as amended by the Committee of the Whole, as follows:

Resolved, That it is expedient to repeal the act to provide additional revenues for defraying the expenses of Government and maintaining the public credit, by laying duties on spirits distilled within the United States and the Territories thereof, and by amending the act laying duties on licenses to distillers of spirituous liquors, passed on the 21st of December, 1814, excepting only the 16th, 18th, 19th, and 24th sections thereof, from and after the first day of April next, and from the same day to add fifty per centum to the amount of the duty which all stills, now subject to duty, are liable to pay; and that the act imposing duties on licenses to distillers be so amended, that licenses granted for periods of time less than a year, shall be paid for in proportion to the time for which they are granted.

On the adoption of this resolution, the question was decided in the affirmative, by yeas and nays, without further debate. For the resolution 105, against it, 37, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alexander, Atherton, Baker, Barbour, Bassett, Baylies, Bennett, Betts, Birdsall, Birdseye, Blount, Boss, Breckenridge, Brigham, Bryan, Burnside, Burwell, Caldwell, Calhoun, Cannon, Cillely, Clarke of North Carolina, Clendennin, Comstock, Connor, Culpeper, Cuthbert, Darlington, Desha, Forney, Forsyth, Gaston, Gold, Goodwyn, Griffin, Hahn, Hammond, Hardin, Hawes, Heister, Henderson, Hulbert, Hungerford, Ingham, Jackson, Johnson of Kentucky, Kerr of Virginia, King of Massachusetts, King of North Carolina, Lewis, Love, Lowndes, Lumpkin, Lyle, Maclay, Mayrant, McCoy, McKee, McLean of Kentucky, Mills, Moore of South Carolina, Nelson of Virginia, Newton, Ormsby, Parris, Pickens, Pickering, Piper, Pleasants, Powell, Roane, Root, Ross, Rugles, Sergeant, Savage, Schenck, Sheffield, Smith of Pennsylvania, Smith of Maryland, Smith of Virginia,

The House then proceeded to the consideration of the ninth resolution, reported by the Committee of Ways and Means, as follows:

Resolved, That it is expedient to repeal the act, entitled "An act to provide additional revenues for defraying the expenses of Government and maintaining the public credit, by laying duties on household furniture and gold and silver watches," passed on the 18th of January, 1815.

Mr. JACKSON of Virginia, moved to amend the resolution, so as to make it read as follows:

"Resolved, That it is expedient to continue the act laying duties on household furniture and gold and silver watches; and so to amend the said act as to insure the faithful execution thereof, and to guard against its violation, by specifying the articles liable to taxation, and the amount to be levied on each article, or by requiring a valuation to be made by the owner on both."

Mr. JACKSON said, he would submit his proposition with a few remarks, explanatory merely of his views. He would commence with answering the objections urged by the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means—1st, as to the expense of assessing and collecting, which it was said would be disproportionate to the product of the tax. It being decided that the direct tax shall be continued, said Mr. J., it necessarily follows that you must keep up the assessors, as the valuations of land, &c., must be annual; otherwise a tax would be collected for a house that was consumed by fire, or a slave who had died. As to the States who would assume the direct tax, if that feature in the existing law were preserved, he thought we might adopt provisions similar to those to be found in the law imposing the carriage tax. The second objection was, that the law had been evaded, and might be again evaded. This argument applied to all the indirect taxes, and the answer given was, and it was a complete answer, that further provisions might be adopted to remedy this evil. It was true, the law had been shamefully evaded. The estimate of the Treasury was, that the furniture tax would produce $1,238,000, and the duty on watches $230,000. Yet, although the duty on watches was $225,000, which proves the extreme accuracy of the calculation made by that department, the furniture tax has only produced $75,000. He would guard against these frauds, either by requiring the valuation to be made by the owner on oath, or laying the duty on the specific articles of furniture; these modes of taxing property were adopted by the State of Virginia, and had not been complained of. He would not allow of domiciliary visits, so justly odious to the people. The valuation or specification he proposed, should be made by the owner. This question he argued simply as a question of revenue; and he thought if so much money was requisite, as the Committee of Ways and Means contemplated, no subject of taxation was more fair and more just than this; indeed, all intelligent economists held that wealth, income, and luxury, were the fairest. These duties, proposed to be repealed, might be made to yield one-third of the amount of the direct tax, and authorize the reduction of that tax from three to two millions. The direct tax, as all direct taxes necessarily do, falls not upon the wealthy alone, but upon the extremely poor and middling classes of the people; it has no relation to income, for the lands may be cultivated and not appreciating in value; or, as is often the case, yielding a scanty subsistence to the humble owner.

Mr. J. estimated the number of families in the United States to be 1,000,000; one-tenth of these, he supposed, were liable to pay the tax, viz., 100,000; 50,000 he supposed owned furniture of the average value of $600; which, at three dollars each, as the law now is, would be $150,000. Twenty-five thousand persons would average one thousand dollars, at six - 150,000. The remaining twenty-five thousand would average two thousand dollars, at seventeen - 425,000. Which, with the product of the duty on watches of - - - 225,000. Will yield a total sum of - - - $950,000.

Which is equal to the proceeds of one-third of the direct tax—the whole being estimated to yield a net revenue of $2,700,000. When it was proposed to repeal the direct tax, we were met with the objection that it was pledged to the public creditor; yet those making that objection voted for the repeal of this duty, which is also pledged in the same language with the other. The pledge is only to supply an adequate revenue; and the revenue, independent of the proceeds of the land tax and the furniture tax, was adequate to all necessary purposes. He relied on the report of the Committee of Ways and Means for the proof of this assertion; they showed that, with the taxes recommended by them, we could increase the Sinking Fund to upwards of $13,000,000 per annum, and still have a surplus of $2,500,000 to appropriate to other objects. Although he wished to pay off the debt, he would not do it by giving another premium to those who, in the hour of difficulty, exacted twenty per cent. of us; and he contended, we could not employ a sinking fund to the amount recommended, without giving a premium to the holders of stock to part with it.

Of the new debt, there fell due in 1825	-	-	-	-	-	$11,129,449

In 1826	-	-	-	-	-	26,607,958
In 1827	-	-	-	-	-	25,407,763

Amounting, in those three years, to - $63,145,170

How, then, he asked, could a fund of any amount, upon the principles of a sinking fund, extinguish such a debt in twelve years, say in 1827, unless by purchasing the stock long before it became payable by the contract? And that it would rise above its par value, when the redundant stock was withdrawn from the market, was undoubted. He recollected that, under the operation of the $8,000,000 sinking fund, the creditors prayed to be exempted from its operation; and it was only by declaring that the stock should cease to bear interest after the day it was payable, by allotment, that the commissioners were enabled to pay it off.

The same result will again be produced, unless we have war, and he conceived it the idlest fantasy that ever entered the heads of intelligent gentlemen, that we were to be soon involved in war; for his part, he had no faith in the probable necessity or disposition to wage a new war with any nation; he confided as well in their pacific temper as in our own; and our strength, with such dispositions, was a safe guarantee. Augment the Sinking Fund, as the Secretary of the Treasury proposed, to $10,000,000, and repeal the direct tax, and then there will be a surplus of more than $2,900,000, according to the estimates of the Committee of Ways and Means. But if we are to have the direct tax continued as part of a permanent system, he was for continuing the furniture tax, also, in order that the accumulated revenue would enable us to dispense with both together, at some early period, even though the other parts of the recommendation of the committee should be adopted. A system of taxation to be just must draw, from every part of the community, a sum in proportion to their wealth and income. Expenditure was, in general, the best evidence of income. This was a tax upon expenditure, and did not embrace the necessities of life or domestic comfort; the articles excluded, and the extent of the exemption of such as are liable to valuation, rendered the duty inoperative upon those to whom the direct tax was oppressive; and this was the only internal tax that did bear upon the wealthy, in proportion to their ability. He concluded by saying, in his humble opinion, it was incorrect to urge, as an argument against a general proposition, objections applicable solely to the details. When the proposition was decided, it would be for its advocates to render the details unexceptionable; and on failure to do so, then, and not till then, was the argument admissible. As far as his observation extended, all the independent inhabitants of the towns possessed furniture of a kind and value falling within the provisions of the law; and he could not admit that they were so deprived as to violate it, when proper amendments were adopted.

Mr. LUMPKIN spoke as follows:

Mr. Speaker, I rise, sir, as an advocate for the amendment proposed by the honorable gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. JACKSON.) Since I took my seat in this House, no vote of mine has been withheld from the support of the plan for raising revenue, submitted by the Secretary of the Treasury, except the proposed continuance of the duties on imported salt, and my object at that time was to supply the deficiency of revenue accruing upon that article, (which I considered as one of the first necessities of life) by continuing the tax on watches and household furniture. In selecting objects or articles for taxation, I deem it to be a correct principle, that due regard should be given to wealth, luxury, and income; and the articles now proposed to be taxed are generally found in the possession of this class of citizens, and therefore are least affected by paying taxes. The agricultural part of your citizens, the planter and the farmer, are in many instances paying taxes upon very unproductive estates. The poor man who supports himself and family by the sweat of his face; the cultivator of the earth, has to pay a direct tax, when it is with difficulty, in many cases, that they can make a bare support for their families. While you are continuing taxes upon that part of society, on whom depends the best interests of this country, I will say more, on whom depends the stability of our republican institutions, shall we adopt a system of favoritism, in favor of the luxurious and wealthy, who have the largest income estates? I trust not, sir, I confess it excited my astonishment when I discovered that the Secretary of the Treasury had proposed a repeal of the watch and furniture tax. I was still more astonished, sir, when I found this recommendation had received the co-operation of the Committee of Ways and Means.

Sir, when the debate on the subject of revenue enlarged its course so as to lead to an investigation of the present state of the nation, I felt a desire to present my views to this honorable body. What prevented me from doing so, was, that the ground which I had marked out to take was completely occupied before a favorable opportunity presented itself for me to get the floor. Sir, it was occupied with such ability as to forbid any feeble attempt of mine to travel over the same ground. But, being a new member on this floor, I will use the present opportunity to state, that I differ with some gentlemen here who have expressed a want of confidence in those who administer the Government. The Administration has enjoyed my confidence and feeble support while I remained a private citizen, and becoming a member of this House has not changed my opinions. The principal difference between myself and the Administration has heretofore been, that instead of following, I have kept a little before the Administration. I was in favor of the late war with Great Britain, and wanted the declaration long before we got it; and after war was declared, I was in favor of energetic measures to support and prosecute the war before they were resorted to by the Government. The President of the United States, at the commencement of the present session, in performing his Constitutional duty, called the attention of Congress to many important national objects, which I have carefully examined, and which not only merit my general approbation, but which I consider of so much importance to the country, that I regret that they have been so long permitted to slumber; and I consider the present moment peculiarly auspicious to their commencement. The plan of finance submitted by the Secretary of the Treasury, and the report of the Committee of Ways and Means, founded on that plan, have received my particular examination and consideration, and the result is, I feel it to be my duty to support that plan generally, but am bound to dissent on some points, one of which is, the tax now under consideration. The watch and furniture tax, under the existing law, has produced a revenue to the Government of $300,000, and it is admitted that the law has been very frequently evaded. I therefore conclude, by proper amendments to the law, it may be made a source of considerable and sure revenue. And, as I consider these articles very proper objects of taxation, I shall give my vote in favor of the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. LOWNDES opposed the motion, and again explained the reasons which induced the Committee of Ways and Means to recommend the repeal of the tax, which recommendation he defended at some length, on its entire unproductiveness and vexatious character, as proved during the term it had been in operation.

On Mr. JACKSON'S proposition, a debate took place of nearly two hours continuance, in which several gentlemen participated. Messrs. CONDUCT, SOUTHARD, CANNON, WRIGHT, and BARBOUR, severally spoke in favor of the motion, and against the repeal of the tax; and Messrs. TAYLOR of New York, MILNOR, GASTON, and PICKERING, opposed the amendment and advocated the repeal. The ground occupied in the debate was not very extensive; a few prominent and obvious arguments, with some illustration, comprising the pith of the discussion. Those who advocated a repeal of the tax, did so, principally, on the ground of its failing to produce the anticipated revenue, its whole product amounting to about seventy-five thousand dollars, instead of upwards of a million, which had been calculated on; because, also, of its odious character which subjected every man's house to the intrusion of the collector, and to domiciliary visits, without sufficient object; because, after all, it would be evaded in many cases, and the odium of the tax be incurred, without affording a productive revenue, &c. Those opposed to repealing the tax, replied, that all taxes were, more or less, odious to the people; but this not particularly so; that its unproductiveness had arisen from evasions, and an unfaithful collection of the duty; that it was equitable, and, if repealed, would exempt a certain class of the community almost entirely from contributing to the public support; that it was a tax on wealth and luxury, and was necessary to equalize and perfect the system of revenue now in progress, &c.

The question on the motion to amend was taken by yeas and nays, and decided in the negative—yeas 64, nays 90, as follows:

The ninth resolution was then concurred in by the House, and, together with the seventh resolution, referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, with instructions to report a bill or bills conformably thereto.

The remainder of the orders of the day were then laid on the table, on motion of Mr. BASSETT, and the House went into Committee of the Whole on the resolution reported by a select committee for the relief of Commodore Rodgers. After some time spent on this subject, the Committee rose, and reported the resolution, which was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and the House adjourned at half past four o'clock.

MONDAY, February 12.

Mr. ROBERTSON, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to whom were referred the petition of the Legislature of the Mississippi Territory, the petitions from sundry inhabitants of said Territory, and of Seth Hunt, upon the subject of British grants of lands lying in that Territory, made a report; which was read; when Mr. R. reported a bill for quieting and adjusting claims to lands in the Mississippi Territory; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. NELSON, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported the bill from the Senate "concerning certain courts of the United States in the State of New York," without amendment, and the bill was read a third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. CADY, the Secretary of the Treasury was directed to report to this House what additions, if any, have been made to the funded public debt, and to the floating public debt, since the 30th day of September last.

Mr. PLEASANTS, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported a bill for the relief of Erastus Loomis; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

On motion of Mr. CADY, the Committee of Ways and Means were instructed to inquire into the expediency of so amending the act entitled "An act to provide additional revenues for defraying the expenses of Government and maintaining the public credit, by duties on carriages, and the harness used therefor," that no duty shall be paid for any carriage usually employed in husbandry, or for the transportation of goods.

On motion of Mr. JENNINGS, the Commissioner of the General Land Office was directed to lay before this House a statement exhibiting the number of acres of land to which rights of pre-emption have been granted to individuals, in any of the States or Territories of the United States respectively; together with the probable difference in the amounts of moneys received for lands sold at public sale, and such amounts received for lands sold at private sale.

The engrossed resolution for the relief of Commodore John Rodgers, having been announced for a third reading, it was, on motion of Mr. BASSETT, recommitted to a select committee. Mr. B. from that select committee subsequently reported an amendment to the resolution; which was agreed to, and the resolve was ordered to a third reading.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill for reducing the direct tax on the United States to three millions, &c. No amendment being proposed to it, the Committee rose and reported the bill; which was laid on the table, on suggestion of Mr. ROOT, of New York, to give him time to prepare an amendment to the detail of the bill.

The resolution expressive of the sense of Congress of the gallantry of Captain James Biddle, the officers and crew of the Hornet; and a similar resolution respecting Captain Charles Stewart, and the officers and crew of the Constitution, for their last victory, passed through a Committee of the Whole, and were severally ordered, nem. con., to be engrossed, and read a third time.

The bill for rewarding the officers and crew of the Hornet for the capture and destruction of the British sloop-of-war Penguin, passed through a Committee of the Whole. The blank was filled with $25,000, being the amount allowed in former cases; and the bill ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

CANADIAN REFUGEES.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill for the relief of certain refugees from the British Provinces during the late war.

Several papers were read respecting their merits and services, among which was a very strong testimony to their merits, &c., from General Porter, lately a member of this House.

Domestic Manufactures.

FEBRUARY, 1816.

This bill gave rise to a rather animated debate, in which the claim of the petitioners to indemnity or compensation was sustained by Messrs. THROOP, YATES, WRIGHT, GOLD, and JOHNSON, of Kentucky, and opposed by Messrs. HULBERT, WEBSTER, and STRONG.

This case has been fully presented to our readers in the shape of the petition of the committee on behalf of these sufferers. Their claim is precisely of a character with that for which ample provision was made at the close of the Revolutionary war. They were natives of this country, and, on the breaking out of the war, preferred ranging themselves under the banners of their native country, than that to which, for purposes of business, they had a temporary allegiance.

The opponents of the bill (which proposes to compensate the claimants' losses by donations of land) oppose it as rewarding treachery, as poisoning the fountains of morality, and use those general expressions of dislike, and even detestation, which such a bill is likely to call forth from those who view it in so odious a light.

The bill was not decided on; but, on motion of Mr. JOHNSON, laid on the table.

The Committee then proceeded to the consideration of another bill making further provision for the widows and orphans of those who fell in the late war.

The House was occupied on this subject until the usual hour of adjournment.

TUESDAY, February 13.

Mr. CALDWELL presented to the House a resolution adopted by the General Assembly of the State of Ohio, instructing their Senators, and requesting their Representatives in Congress, to use their endeavors to obtain the passage of an act of Congress providing for the organization, arming, and disciplining the militia, and for governing such parts of them as may be employed in the service of the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. STEPHENSON presented a petition of the Legislature of the Territory of Illinois, praying that the powers granted to, and enjoyed by the Governor of that Territory, may be abridged.—Referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. STEPHENSON presented another petition of the said Legislature, praying that the certificate of a Paymaster, given to certain companies of rangers lately raised in that Territory for military services, may be received in payment for public lands.—Referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. MIDDLETON, from the committee to whom were referred the petition of Lewis Bringier, made a report, which was read; when Mr. M. reported a bill to enable the President of the United States to lease out or grant, for a term of years, mines of the precious metals, discovered upon the public lands; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate disagree to the amendments of this House to their bill "concerning the convention to regulate the commerce between the territories of the United States and His Britannic Majesty." The Senate have passed a bill "authorizing a subscription for the printing of a second edition of the public documents;" and they have passed the bill "for the relief of William Morrisett," with an amendment; in which bill and amendment they ask the concurrence of this House.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, accompanied with a tariff of duties proper to be laid and imposed on all goods, wares, and merchandise, imported into the United States from any foreign port or place; which were referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.—[See Appendix.]

The message of the Senate rejecting the amendments of this House to their bill concerning the Convention of Commerce, &c., was taken up, and, on motion of Mr. FORSYTH, the House determined to insist on its amendments, and to ask a conference thereon with the Senate.

The bill from the Senate, entitled "An act authorizing a subscription for the printing of a second edition of the public documents," was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

The amendment of the Senate to the bill "for the relief of William Morrisett," was read and concurred in by the House.

An engrossed resolution, entitled "A resolution requesting the President to present medals to Captain James Biddle and the officers of the sloop-of-war Hornet," was read the third time, and passed unanimously.

An engrossed resolution, entitled "A resolution requesting the President to present medals to Captain Charles Stewart and the officers of the frigate Constitution," was read the third time, and passed unanimously.

An engrossed bill, entitled "An act rewarding the officers and crew of the sloop-of-war Hornet, for the capture and destruction of the sloop-of-war Penguin," was read the third time, and passed.

DOMESTIC MANUFACTURES.

Mr. NEWTON, from the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, to whom were referred the several memorials and petitions of the manufacturers of cotton wool, made a report thereon; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

The report is as follows:

The Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, to whom were referred the memorials and petitions of the manufacturers of cotton wool, respectfully submit the following report:

The Committee were conscious that they had no ordinary duty to perform, when the House of Representatives referred to their consideration the memorials and petitions of the manufacturers of cotton wool. In obedience to the instructions of the House, they have given great attention to the subject, and beg leave to present the result of their deliberations.

They are not a little apprehensive that they have not succeeded in doing justice to a subject so intimately connected with the advancement and prosperity of agriculture and commerce—a subject which enlightened statesmen and philosophers have deemed not unworthy of their attention and consideration.

It is not the intention of the Committee to offer any theoretical opinions of their own, or of others. They are persuaded that a display of speculative opinions would not meet with approbation. From these views the Committee are disposed to state facts, and to make such observations only as shall be intimately connected with and warranted by them.

Prior to the years 1806 and 1807, establishments for manufacturing cotton wool had not been attempted but in a few instances, and on a limited scale. Their rise and progress are attributable to embarrassments to which commerce was subjected; which embarrassments originated in causes not within the control of human prudence.

While commerce flourished, the trade which had been carried on with the continent of Europe, with the East Indies, and with the colonies of Spain and France, enriched our enterprising merchants, the benefits of which were sensibly felt by the agriculturists, whose wealth and industry were increased and extended. When external commerce was suspended, the capitalists throughout the Union became solicitous to give activity to their capital. A portion of it, it is believed, was directed to the improvement of agriculture, and not an inconsiderable portion of it, as it appears, was likewise employed in erecting establishments for manufacturing cotton wool. To make this statement as satisfactory as possible—to give it all the certainty that it is susceptible of attaining, the following facts are respectfully submitted to the consideration of the House. They show the rapid progress which has been made in a few years, and evidently the ability to carry them on with certainty of success, should a just and liberal policy regard them as objects deserving encouragement:

In the year 1800, 500 bales of cotton were manufactured in manufacturing establishments.

In the year 1805, 1,000 bales of cotton were manufactured in manufacturing establishments.

In the year 1810, 10,000 bales of cotton were manufactured in manufacturing establishments.

In the year 1815, 90,000 bales of cotton were manufactured in manufacturing establishments.

This statement the Committee have no reason to doubt; nor have they any question as to the truth of the following succinct statement of the capital which is employed, of the labor which it commands, and of the products of that labor:

Capital	$40,000,000
Males employed, from the age of 17 and upwards	10,000
Women and female children	66,000
Boys under 17 years of age	24,000
Wages of one hundred thousand persons, averaging $150 each	$15,000,000
Cotton wool manufactured, ninety thousand bales, amounting to	£27,000,000
Number of yards of cotton, of various kinds	81,000,000
Cost, per yard, averaging 30 cents	$24,000,000

This rise and progress of such establishments can excite no wonder. The inducements to industry in a free government are numerous and inviting. Effects are always in unison with their causes. The inducements consist in the certainty and security which every citizen enjoys of exercising exclusive dominion over the creations of his genius, and the products of his labor; in procuring from his native soil, at all times, with facility, the raw materials that are required, and in the liberal encouragement that will be accorded by agriculturists to those who, by their labor, keep up a constant and increasing demand for the produce of agriculture.

Every State will participate in those advantages. The resources of each will be explored, opened, and enlarged. Different sections of the nation will, according to their position, the climate, the population, the habits of the people, and the nature of the soil, strike into that line of industry which is best adapted to their interest and the good of the whole; an active and free intercourse, promoted and facilitated by roads and canals, will ensue; prejudices, which are generated by distance, and the want of inducements to approach each other and reciprocate benefits, will be removed; information will be extended; the Union will acquire strength and solidity, and the Constitution of the United States, and that of each State, will be regarded as fountains from which flow numerous streams of public and private prosperity.

Each government, moving in its appropriate orbit, performing with ability its separate functions, will be endeared to the hearts of a good and grateful people.

The States that are most disposed to manufactures, as regular occupations, will draw from the agricultural States all the raw materials which they want, and not an inconsiderable portion also of the necessities of life; while the latter will, in addition to the benefits which they at present enjoy, always command, in peace or in war, at moderate prices, every species of manufacture that their wants may require. Should they be inclined to manufacture for themselves, they can do so with success, because they have all the means in their power to erect and to extend at pleasure manufacturing establishments. Our wants being supplied by our own ingenuity and industry, exportation of specie, to pay for foreign manufactures, will cease.

The value of American produce, at this time exported, will not enable the importers to pay for the foreign manufacture imported. Whenever the two accounts shall be fairly stated, the balance against the United States will be found many millions of dollars. Such is the state of things, that the change must be to the advantage of the United States. The precious metals will be attracted to them; the diffusion of which, in a regular and uniform current, through the great arteries and veins of the body politic, will give to each member health and vigor.

In proportion as the commerce of the United States depends on agriculture and manufactures as a common basis, will it increase and become independent of those revolutions and fluctuations, which the ambition and jealousy of foreign Governments are too apt to produce. Our navigation will be quickened; and supported as it will be by internal resources, never before at the command of any nation, will advance to the extent of those resources.

New channels of trade to enterprise, no less important than productive, are opening, which can be se cured only by a wise and prudent policy appreciating their advantage.

If want of foresight should neglect the cultivation and improvement of them, the opportune moment may be lost, perhaps, for centuries, and the energies of this nation be thereby prevented from developing themselves, and from making the boon which is proffered our own. By trading on our own capital, collisions with other nations, if they be not entirely done away, will be greatly diminished.

This natural order of things exhibits the commencement of a new epoch, which promises peace, security, and repose, by a firm and steady reliance on the produce of agriculture; on the treasures that are embosomed in the earth; on the genius and ingenuity of our manufacturers and mechanics; and on the intelligence and enterprise of our merchants.

The Government, possessing the intelligence and the art of improving the resources of the nation, will increase its efficient powers, and, enjoying the confidence of those whom it has made happy, will oppose to the assailant of the nation's rights the true, the only invincibleegis, the unity of will and strength. Causes producing war will be few. Should war take place, its calamitous consequences will be mitigated, and the expenses and burdens of such a state of things will fall with a weight less oppressive and injurious on the nation. The expenditures of the last war were greatly increased by a dependence on foreign supplies. The prices incident to such a dependence will always be high.

Had not our nascent manufacturing establishments increased the quantity of commodities at that time in demand, the expenditures would have been much greater, and consequences the most fatal and disastrous—alarming even in contemplation—would have been the fate of this nation. The experience of the past teaches a lesson never to be forgotten, and points emphatically to the remedy. A wise Government should heed its admonitions, or the independence of this nation will be exposed to “the shafts of fortune.”

The committee, keeping in view the interests of the nation, cannot refrain from stating that cotton fabrics, imported from India, interfere not less with that encouragement to which agriculture is justly entitled, than they do with that which ought reasonably to be accorded to the manufacturers of cotton wool. The raw material of which they are made is the growth of India, and of a quality inferior to our own. The fabrics themselves, in point of duration and use, are likewise inferior to the substantial fabrics of American manufacture. Although the India cotton fabrics can be sold for a lower price than the American, yet, the difference in the texture is so much in favor of the American, that the latter may be safely considered as the cheapest.

The distance of most of the Western States from the ocean, the exuberant richness of the soil, and the variety of its products, forcibly impress the mind of the committee with a belief that all these causes conspire to encourage manufactures, and to give an impetus and direction to such a disposition. Although the Western States may be said to be in the gristle, in contemplation of that destiny to which they are hastening, yet the products of manufactures in those States are beyond every calculation that could reasonably be made; contrary to the opinion of many enlightened and virtuous men, who have supposed that the inducements of agriculture, and the superior advantages of that life, would suppress any disposition to that sort of industry. But theories, how ingeniously soever they may be constructed,—how much soever they may be made to conform to the laws of symmetry and beauty—are no sooner brought into conflict with facts, than they fall into ruins. In viewing their fragments, the mind is irresistibly led to render the homage due to the genius and taste of the architects; but cannot refrain from regretting the waste, to no purpose, of superior intellects. The Western States prove the fallacy of such theories; they appear in their growth and expansion to be in advance of thought. While the political economist is drawing their portraits, their features change and enlarge with such rapidity that his pencil in vain endeavors to catch their expressions, and to fix their physiognomy.

It is to their advantage to manufacture, because, by decreasing the bulk of the articles, they at the same time increase their value by labor, bring them to market with less expense, and with the certainty of obtaining the best prices. Those States, understanding their interest, will not be diverted from its pursuit. In the encouragement of manufactures, they find a stimulus for agriculture.

The manufacturers of cotton, in making application to the National Government for encouragement, have been induced to do so for many reasons. They know that their establishments are new and in their infancy, and that they have to encounter a competition with foreign establishments, that have arrived at maturity, that are supported by a large capital, and that have from the Government every protection that can be required.

The American manufacturers expect to meet with all the embarrassments which a jealous and monopolizing spirit can suggest. The committee are sensible of the force of such considerations. They are convinced that old practices and maxims will not be abandoned to favor the United States. The foreign manufacturers and merchants will put in requisition all the powers of ingenuity; will practise whatever art can devise, and capital can accomplish, to prevent the American manufacturing establishments from taking root and flourishing in their rich and native soil. By the allowance of bounties and drawbacks, the foreign manufacturers and merchants will be furnished with additional means of carrying on the conflict, and of insuring success.

The American manufacturers have good reasons for their apprehensions—they have much at stake. They have a large capital employed, and are feelingly alive for its fate. Should the National Government not afford them protection, the dangers which invest and threaten them will destroy all their hopes, and will close their prospects of utility to their country. A reasonable encouragement will sustain and keep them erect; but if they fall, they fall never to rise again.

The foreign manufacturers and merchants know this; and will redouble with renovated zeal the stroke to prostrate them. They also know, that should the American manufacturing establishments fall, their mouldering piles—the visible ruins of a legislative breath—will warn all who shall tread in the same footsteps, of the doom, the inevitable destiny, of their establishments.

The National Government, in viewing the disastrous effects of a short-sighted policy, may relent; but what can relenting avail? Can it raise the dead to life? Can it give, for injuries inflicted, the reparation that is due? Industry, in every ramification of society, will feel the shock, and generations will, as they succeed each other, feel the effects of its undulations. Dissatisfaction will be visible everywhere, and the lost confidence and affections of the citizens will not be the least of the evils the Government will have to deplore. But, should the National Government, pursuing an enlightened and liberal policy, sustain and foster the manufacturing establishments, a few years would place them in a condition to bid defiance to foreign competition, and would enable them to increase the industry, wealth, and prosperity of the nation; and to afford to the Government, in times of difficulty and distress, whatever it may require to support public credit, while maintaining the rights of the nation.

Domestic Manufactures.

Providence, in bountifully placing within our reach whatever can minister to happiness and comfort, indicates plainly to us our duty, and what we owe to ourselves. Our resources are abundant and inexhaustible.

The stand that Archimedes wanted, is given to the National and State Governments; and labor-saving machinery tenders the lever—the power of bringing those resources into use.

This power imparts incalculable advantages to a nation whose population is not full. The United States require the use of this power, because they do not abound in population. The diminution of manual labor, by means of machinery, in the cotton manufacture of Great Britain, was, in the year 1810, as two hundred to one. Our manufactures have already availed themselves of this power, and have profited by it. A little more experience in making machines, and in managing them with skill, will enable our manufacturers to supply more fabrics than are necessary for the home demand. Competition will make the prices of the articles low, and the extension of the cotton manufactories will produce that competition.

One striking and important advantage which labor-saving machines bestow is this, that in all their operations they require few men, as a reference to another part of this report will show. No apprehensions can, then, be seriously entertained, that agriculture will be in danger of having its efficient laborers withdrawn from its service. On the contrary, the manufacturing establishments, increasing the demand for raw materials, will give to agriculture new life and expansion.

The committee, after having with great deference and respect presented to the House this important subject, in various points of view, feel themselves constrained, before concluding the report, to offer a few observations, which they consider as being immediately connected with it, and not less so, with the present and future prosperity of this nation.

The prospects of an enlarged commerce are not flattering.

Every nation, in times of peace, will supply its own wants from its own resources, or from those of other nations.

When supplies are drawn from foreign countries, the intercourse which will ensue will furnish employment to the navigation only of the countries connected, by their reciprocal wants.

Our concern does not arise from, nor can it be increased by, the limitation which our navigation and trade will have prescribed to them, by the peace and apparent repose of Europe.

Our apprehensions arise from causes that cannot animate by their effects. Look wheresoever the eye can glance, and what are the objects that strike the vision? On the continent of Europe, industry, deprived of its motive and incitement, is paralyzed; the accumulated wealth of ages, seized by the hand of military despotism, is appropriated to, and squandered on objects of ambition; the order of things unsettled, and confidence between man and man annihilated. Every moment is looked for with tremulous, anxious, and increased solicitude; hope languishes, and commercial enterprise stiffens with fear. The political horizon appears to be calm, but many of no ordinary sagacity think they behold signs portentous of a violent tempest, which will again rage and desolate that devoted region. Should this prediction fail, no change for the better, under existing circumstances, can take place. Where despotism, military despotism, reigns, silence and fearful stillness must prevail.

Such is the prospect which continental Europe exhibits to the enterprise of American merchants. Can it be possible for them to find in that region sources which will supply them with more than seventeen millions of dollars, the balance due for British manufactures; this balance being over and above the value of all the exports to foreign countries from the United States. The view which is given to the dreary prospect of commercial advantages, accruing to the United States by an intercourse with continental Europe, is believed to be just. The statement made of the great balance in favor of Great Britain, due from the United States, is founded on matter of fact.

In the hands of Great Britain are gathered together and held many powers which they have not been accustomed hitherto to feel and to exercise. No improper motives are intended to be imputed to that Government. But does not experience teach a lesson that should never be forgotten, that Governments, like individuals, are apt "to feel power and forget right?" It is not inconsistent with national decorum to become circumspect and prudent. May not the Government of Great Britain be inclined, in analysing the basis of her political power, to consider and regard the United States as her rival, and to indulge an improper jealousy—the enemy of peace and repose? Can it be politic, in any point of view, to make the United States dependent on any nation for supplies absolutely necessary for defence, or comfort, and for accommodation? Will not the strength, the political energies of this nation, be materially impaired, at any time, but fatally so in those of difficulty and distress, by such dependence? Do not the suggestions of wisdom plainly show that the security, the peace, and the happiness of this nation depend on opening and enlarging all our resources, and drawing from them whatever shall be required for public use or private accommodation? The committee, from the views which they have taken, consider the situation of manufacturing establishments to be perilous. Some have decreased, and others have suspended business. A liberal encouragement will put them again into operation with increased powers; but should it be withheld they will be prostrated. Thousands will be reduced to want and wretchedness. A capital of near sixty millions of dollars will become inactive, the greater part of which will be a dead loss to the manufacturers. Our improvidence may lead to fatal consequences. The Powers jealous of our growth and prosperity, will acquire the resources and strength which this Government neglects to improve. It requires no prophet to foretell the use that foreign Powers will make of them. The committee, from all the considerations which they have given to this subject, are deeply impressed with a conviction that the manufacturing establishments of cotton wool are of real utility to the agricultural interest, and that they contribute much to the prosperity of the Union. Under the influence of this conviction, the committee beg leave to tender respectfully, with this report, the following resolution:

Resolved, That, from and after the 30th day of June next, in lieu of the duties now authorized by law, there be laid, levied, and collected on cotton goods imported into the United States, and Territories thereof, from any foreign country whatever, — per centum ad valorem, being not less than — cents per square yard.

THE REVENUE.

The House took up the bill to reduce the amount of direct tax upon the United States and the District of Columbia, for the year 1816; and the same being amended, a motion was made by Mr. ATHERTON further to amend the said bill by striking out from the third line the words so much of, and from the eighth, ninth, and tenth lines, the following words: "as lays a direct tax of six millions of dollars, for the year 1816, and for succeeding years;" and by adding to the end of the section the words following: "Provided, nevertheless, that the same shall be in force so far as may be necessary to complete the collection of the direct tax for the year 1815;" thereby proposing a total repeal of the act imposing a direct tax.

And the question thereon being taken, it was determined in the negative—yeas 65, nays 82, as follows:

Mr. PICKERING then moved further to amend the said bill by inserting in the second line of the second section, after the word "hereby," the word

"annually," and by striking out from the third and fourth lines the following words: "for the year one thousand eight hundred and sixteen;" thereby proposing to render the direct tax a permanent, and not an annual one.

Mr. LYON then moved to strike out the second section of the bill; which motion was negative.

A motion was made by Mr. MAYRANT to strike out the words "three millions," the amount of the direct tax proposed to be levied, and in lieu thereof to insert "two millions;" and the question thereon being taken, it was determined in the negative—yeas 54, nays 96, as follows:

Mr. McLEAN, of Ohio, moved an amendment, the object of which was, in case the States of Ohio or Louisiana should assume their quota of the direct tax, to authorize the Legislatures to collect their proportion of the same from the purchasers of public land from the Government, notwithstanding any provision in the contract between the United States and the States to the contrary. This motion was agreed to—ayes 82, noes 45.

A motion was made by Mr. TALLMADGE to add the following proviso to the second section thereof, to wit:

“Provided, That so much of the fortieth section of the aforesaid act, passed on the 9th of January, 1815, as authorizes any State to assume and pay its quota of the direct tax, is hereby repealed.”

And the question being taken thereon, it was determined in the negative. The question was then put, Shall the bill be engrossed and read a third time? It passed in the affirmative—yeas 106, nays 46, as follows:

The bill was then ordered to be read a third time to-morrow.

ORDNANCE DEPARTMENT.

The House resumed the consideration of the bill making appropriations for the ordnance and ordnance stores for the year 1816.

The question being on agreeing with the Committee of the Whole, to fill up the blank, for this purpose, with $1,065,224—

Mr. WRIGHT opposed this amount, and proposed to substitute $500,000 in lieu thereof.

Mr. DESHA said, although he should vote against filling the blank with one million and sixty-five thousand dollars, he did believe that the sum of five hundred thousand dollars, as proposed by the gentleman from Maryland, was rather under the mark, and was in hopes that the gentleman would modify his motion from five to six hundred thousand dollars, which was sufficient to answer every purpose of enabling the Government to meet its engagements, to keep up and regularly progress in manufacturing arms of every description necessary to meet a state of war, let it occur when it would, as well as to finish the fortifications, arsenals, and magazines, already commenced, and construct some new ones. Mr. D. said, that a state of war was always a state of extreme expense; that he could not be charged with a want of liberality pending the late war, in refusing to grant men or money, or anything that was necessary to insure an energetic and vigorous prosecution of the war. He said that he had supported everything (independent of expense) that was calculated to nerve the national arm and give it vigor, knowing the people would not hesitate to submit to any privations in defence of their rights. They gave personal service cheerfully, and paid taxes willingly; and the war terminating happily and triumphantly, is more to be attributed to the valor and native energies of the American people than management; and I rejoice to think, that while this native energy exists in the American character, this country never can be subjugated, even by a combination of despots, independent of management, or who may be at the helm. The war is now over; it was happily terminated; he felt disposed to retrench, to curtail our expenses, and lighten the burdens of the people, who acted so meritoriously throughout the most trying difficulties. Enormous expenses necessarily result from a state of war, but now was the time, not only to retrench in our expenses, but to go on an economical scale. Although the people submitted without a murmur to heavy burdens to sustain a state of war, where their rights were involved, they will expect those burdens to be measurably removed in a time of peace; they will expect frugality from our hands instead of profusion, and they have a right to expect it.

Gentlemen tell you that one million and sixty-five thousand dollars is necessary to fulfil engagements entered into in relation to the Ordinance department. If this was the case I would not hesitate a moment to grant it. I hold punctuality to be essential in Governments as well as individuals. There is not a man in this House who would go greater lengths to preserve the character of the nation than I would, or prevent its honor from being compromised; but if gentlemen would cast their eyes over the document that was this morning laid on their tables, they would discover this not to be the fact; they would discover that it requires only two hundred and ninety thousand dollars to meet the engagements in the Ordnance department. I am willing to give every facility to the Ordnance department, and if the one million and sixty-five thousand dollars, as contemplated, was to be appropriated for one year only, I should not hesitate about it; but it is intended, agreeable to the provisions of the bill, as an annual, a permanent regulation. As a permanent regulation, I think that six hundred thousand dollars would not only be an ample, but a liberal appropriation. It would not only enable Government to comply with its engagements, but finish the arsenals, magazines, and fortifications that have been commenced, and to construct new ones if it is found necessary. Mr. D. said, he had not as much confidence in fortifications for the defence of our extensive coast or frontiers as some gentlemen appeared to have; he depended more on the yeomanry of the country, under proper organization and discipline, to deter foreign Powers from encroaching on our rights, or making a descent on our territory, than batteries, fortifications, or even such a standing army as this country will ever be willing to keep up, while the people retain their present republican habits, which I hope will be while time lasts. Notwithstanding the good old doctrine of 1798, that a well organized militia is the bulwark of our safety and the sheet-anchor of our liberty, has been measurably exploded, and the predilection is so strong in favor of armies and expensive establishments, that it is almost unfashionable to mention militia, I have no hesitation in saying, that the militia, under a proper organization, is not only the cheapest, but the strongest and best walls, batteries, or fortifications, you can have for the defence of this country, as well as the most congenial with the nature of our Government and the habits of the people. I know that it is necessary to keep up a portion of regular forces to take care of our garrisons, and to keep them from dilapidating, as well as to keep our arms in repair. But I venture to say, without fear of contradiction, that our little Army, according to the number of forces, is the most expensive in the world. I have no doubt but it will cost the Government for the present year, independent of the million and sixty-five thousand dollars contemplated by this bill, for the Ordnance department, nearly five millions of dollars. What would it be if we were to lay aside our confidence in the militia, and increase the regular forces so as to amount to an adequate defence and strength in case of emergencies? Why, it would ultimately engulf this country in ruin—it would finally prostrate its liberties. It is presumed that a portion of the direct tax will have to be continued for one year, to meet the ordinary or extraordinary expense incurred by the late necessary but expensive war, and aid the Government in settling up claims for property lost while in the service. But if you continue to go on in this extravagant style, for expensive fortifications, expensive armies, expensive and extensive navies, (further than a moderate increase, providing gradually for the defence of our ports and harbors, to expel marauders from our waters, and give a reasonable protection to our commerce,) you will have to lay additional burdens on the people; you will have to increase your present taxes, resort to a new system, or involve the Government in a lasting national debt. But why do I talk of economy? The expression is unfashionable. Expensive establishments are the order of the day. It would seem that gentlemen have not taken into the account where the money is to come from to support such high notions. Gentlemen certainly have not reflected that it must ultimately come out of the pockets of the people. They will let them know, in language perhaps that will not be altogether pleasant, that both them and their extravagant projects must go down together. I hope it will not be considered offensive to say that in the districts we represent there are a number as capable of judging as ourselves. They will scrutinize our acts, and when they find that our hands bear heavy on them, they will apply the corrective. Mr. D. said he felicitated the gentleman from Georgia on his happy facility in attaching ridicule to everything said that did not comport with his ideas of propriety. He said he had attended closely to the specimen of eloquence the gentleman had favored the House with on this occasion, and, agreeable to his understanding of it, it was, in substance, simply this—that the Secretary of War had recommended the appropriation of one million and sixty-five thousand dollars for the Ordnance department, and it ought to be granted. Mr. D. said he had the highest opinion of the talents, capacity, integrity, and purity of intentions of that high and responsible officer, but he had too much confidence in his correct Republican principles to believe that the Secretary wished his recommendation to be binding where it did not convince the reason. As a representative of freemen, I certainly shall take the liberty of exercising my own judgment on this occasion, as well as all others that are laid before me for examination; and I do believe that we are going on in a degree of profusion not warranted by the occasion. I do believe that six hundred thousand dollars, as a permanent annual appropriation for the Ordnance department, is not only ample, but liberal, and that the blank in the bill ought not to be filled with one million and sixty-five thousand dollars.

On the question to concur in the amount reported by the Committee of the Whole, there arose a considerable debate; Mr. WRIGHT, Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH, and Mr. KING of Massachusetts opposing, and Mr. SMITH of Maryland, and Mr. FORTY, advocating this amount.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, said, the appropriation formed a part of the general estimate for the War Department, and nothing but the urgency of the case had induced the Secretary of War to recommend the passage of a separate law previous to the general appropriation. Mr. J. said he could not have anticipated objections to the bill, after its objects had been submitted to the House.

Arsenals, magazines, military depots, ordnance stores of every description, and munitions of war, were considered as indispensable to the security of every nation, in peace as well as in war; and while reasonable objections might be urged as to many objects of expenditure, in this he thought there should be but one opinion, after the experience of the late war. The duty of the ordnance corps was very important to the nation, and the present provision was indispensable to their continued and successful operation, in collecting public property; in finishing the arsenals and magazines, which were in a state of progression, and the hands now employed in them; the operations of the public armories at Springfield and Harper's Ferry; the public and private cannon foundries, and manufactories of small arms. The corps of ordnance was composed, he said, generally of valuable officers, scientific and practical men, and the privates were mechanics, enlisted like other soldiers, such as gunsmiths, wheelwrights, blacksmiths, and carpenters, of various descriptions. A considerable sum was due to these laborers and others, employed in finishing these valuable works; money was due for the materials furnished, and he did not suppose that any gentleman would wish to leave these public works unfinished, to lose the money expended on them that others might be built; nor did he suppose any wished to dismiss these laborers, or dismiss this useful corps.

Besides the places where arsenals and magazines had been commenced, other sites had been fixed upon to commence and create others, that the United States might have their own military depots for their ordnance stores, cannon, muskets, rifles, powder, balls, fixed ammunition, camp equipage, and not be dependent upon private store-houses, as was the case during the late war, and cost the Government near $600,000; nor to let the property injure and ruin, after being purchased, for want of safekeeping. He stated that the positions for the arsenals and magazines in the different parts of the United States had been selected with a view to any future war. The position was secure and convenient; and in case of successful invasion, such would be the construction that the military depots could be defended by a company of men against a large force; the walls were to be cannon-proof, and eighteen feet high, and defendable on every side with artillery.

It is necessary that this should be the case, as some millions of property may be deposited at one of these military depots at the same time. But, independent of the vast sum of upwards of $400,000 paid in a war of less than three years for the want of these places of safer deposite, the expenses of extra transportation of the munitions of war, and camp equipage, from one to other parts of the United States (increased expense) could not amount to less than a million of dollars, and to this it would be proper to add the incalculable consequences which did result on on many occasions for want of cannon, arms, ammunition, camp equipage, medical stores, &c. It is impossible to say what different results might have followed a well-digested and organized system of an ordnance office, some few years previous to the declaration of war.

But this appropriation is also to continue the operations of the armories, public and private, now engaged in the service of the United States; and it is to be presumed that gentlemen do not wish to diminish the present manufacture of arms, estimated at 30,000 stand annually; more especially as it is said, that at this moment the United States could not muster 80,000 stand of arms fit for use. The third object of the appropriation is to enable the Government to comply with contracts which they have made with individuals or companies, and to meet existing engagements, all of which originated during the late war, and with individuals who had failed in their contracts with the Government, and from advances made remained in debt to various amounts; and to secure these arrearages, contracts were renewed with these individuals, who have been compelled to give good security, rather than jeopardize that which was due to the United States by a tedious law suit; and in many cases the individual failed without any fault of his own, from the pressure of the times. Under these circumstances the Government pursued the wise course of securing such ordnance stores as could not be dispensed with. In concluding these remarks, Mr. J. said it was necessary to state, that in relation to arsenals, magazines, timber, &c., the appropriation at a subsequent period must be lessened, as these objects of expenditure will have been completed; and, indeed, as we increase our military stores the annual appropriation may diminish, but it will be indispensably necessary to make annual appropriations to a reasonable extent to manufacture arms, continue to improve the public armories, to purchase munitions of war, military stores, &c.

The letter from the Secretary of War gives the following estimate (with details) of the appropriation he deems necessary for the year:

For the United States Armory at Springfield	$165,793
For do. at Harper's Ferry	172,054
For erecting and completing arsenals, depots, &c., as prescribed	457,765
For timber to be seasoned	75,000
For coals, steel, iron, materials, &c.	79,000
For amount of existing contracts for articles to be delivered in 1816, viz:
For gunpowder	93,000
Cannon and shot, shells, &c.	111,000
Muskets and rifles	89,000
Transportation of ordnance, &c.	22,000

It was on the one hand contended, the amount of appropriation proposed was extravagant, under present circumstances entirely too large, and calculated unnecessarily to burden the people without adequate object. On the other hand, the advocates of the appropriation pointed to the items of the report, and supported the policy of authorizing the proposed expenditure on general principles of forecast and providence.

The question on concurring with the Committee was decided in the affirmative—yeas 92, nays 48, as follows:

WEDNESDAY, February 14.

Mr. BRADBURY presented a petition of sundry merchants and inhabitants of Portland, in the District of Maine, complaining of the loss of their fisheries, the West India trade, and plaster trade; and suggesting the propriety of imposing extra duties on foreign vessels and merchandise imported in them, coming from places from which our vessels are excluded.—Referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. RUGGLES presented a petition of a convention lately held in the county of Norfolk, in the State of Massachusetts, praying that the mails may not be opened or transported on Sundays.—Referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. HOPKINSON presented a petition of Lewis Enters and William Zeigler, praying the aid and patronage of Congress in carrying into execution a discovery which they have lately made, of producing light from the gas of stone coal.—Referred to Messrs. HOPKINSON, CONDUCT, and HAWES.

Mr. EASTON presented sundry resolutions passed by the Legislature of the Territory of Missouri, upon the subject of land titles in said Territory.—Referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

Mr. CHAPPELL, from the Committee on Pensions and Revolutionary Claims, reported the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act to increase the pensions of Robert White and Jacob Wright," with amendments; which were read, and the first thereof was disagreed to; when the said report and bill were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. LOWNDES, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported a bill for the relief of Henry Malcolm, which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the whole House, on the bill for the relief of Edward Hallowell.

On motion of Mr. FORSYTH, the Naval Committee were instructed to inquire into the expediency of making provision for those American seamen, who were wounded, and for the widows and families of those who were killed, at Dartmoor Prison on the 6th of April, 1815.

On motion, of Mr. STEPHENSON, the Committee on the Public Lands were instructed to inquire into the expediency of reporting a bill extending relief and certain permissions to the settlers on the public lands, embraced by the proclamation of the President of the United States, dated — day of — 1815, upon such reasonable conditions as will not prejudice the rights and interests of the United States, excepting such characters and settlers as may have used any violence, or made any resistance to the authority of the United States.

An engrossed bill, entitled "An act to reduce the amount of the direct tax upon the United States and the District of Columbia, for the year 1816," was read the third time. Mr. CADY moved to recommit the bill to a Committee of the whole House, and the question being taken thereon, it was determined in the negative; the question was then taken on the passage of the bill, and passed in the affirmative.

The House resumed the consideration of the report of the Committee on Pensions and Revolutionary Claims, upon the bill from the Senate, "to increase the pensions of Robert White and Jacob Wright:" whereupon the said report and bill were recommitted to the said committee.

WEST INDIA TRADE.

Mr. BURWELL moved the following motion:

"Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to inform the House whether discriminating duties are, at this time, levied in ports of the United States, on British vessels arriving from the West Indies, and laden with West India produce."

Mr. BURWELL said, he should not offer many remarks, to show the propriety of this resolution; he was satisfied they would not be required. The petitions offered to the House had given much importance to the subject, and he was convinced they had taken a view of it not entirely correct. The petitioners seemed to state, that they have to struggle against the impediments thrown in their way by the British colonial policy, without any countervailing advantages, in our own ports. Unless he misunderstood the provisions of the late convention, an equality of tonnage duty and imposts upon the cargoes, had been confined to vessels coming from the British European possessions, and goods the product of those possessions; the existing laws, applicable to foreign trade and produce, were enforced against the British colonial trade. This seemed the natural construction, and he had little doubt the instructions from the Treasury Department to the collectors were conformable to it; if they are not, the House should be informed. According to existing laws, all vessels coming from the British West Indies, are subject, until the 30th of June, to ten per cent. discriminating duty in favor of American vessels, and the tonnage duty of two dollars laid by that act; after that period, to the same discrimination upon an advance upon the old duties of forty-two per cent. These, said Mr. B. are important advantages, and such as will operate favorably in competition with British navigation in our own ports. Should any other arrangements become necessary, they should be left with the treaty-making power, to which it naturally belonged, and it was fair to suppose it would receive the most proper attention. Under any view of the subject, the House should know officially the extent to which the laws in force operated, to estimate justly the additional provisions required by the state of that trade.

Mr. BRADBURY expressed his assent to the resolution, but wished it modified so as to embrace all the British colonies.

It was replied by Mr. BURWELL, that the amendment would be verbal and not substantial, as the operation of the convention on the existing revenue laws upon the British West India possessions, would equally apply to all their colonies.

The resolution was then agreed to.

ORDNANCE, &c.

An engrossed bill, entitled "An act making appropriations for ordnance and ordnance stores, was read the third time, and passed—yeas 107, nays 46, as follows:

NAYS—Messrs. Atherton, Baer, Baylies, Boss, Bradbury, Breckenridge, Brigham, Champion, Cilley, Cooper, Culpeper, Davenport, Goldsborough, Hale, Jewett, Kent, King of Massachusetts, Langdon, Law, Lewis, Lovett, Lyon, Milnor, Moseley, Nelson of Massachusetts, Noyes, Pickering, Reed, Rice, Ruggles, Sheffey, Smith of Pennsylvania, Stanford, Stearns, Strong, Stuart, Sturges, Taggart, Tallmadge, Tate, Vose, Ward of Massachusetts, Webster, Wheaton, Wilcox, and Wright.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill to provide for the widows and orphans of the officers, non-commissioned officers, and privates of the volunteers and militia, who have been killed in battle, died in service, or of wounds received while in the service of the United States, during the late war.

The remainder of the day was occupied by the Committee in discussing various amendments to the details of the bill. Before the subject was finished, the usual hour of adjournment arrived—when the Committee rose, reported progress, and obtained leave to sit again.

THURSDAY, February 15.

Mr. LATTIMORE presented a petition of sundry members of the Legislative Council and House of Representatives of the Territory of Mississippi, praying that the members of the Convention proposed to be held in said Territory, to form a constitution, may be apportioned among the counties, according to the white population in each.—Referred to the Committee of the Whole, on the bill to enable the people of the Mississippi Territory to form a constitution and State government.

The SPEAKER presented a resolution of the Legislature of the Territory of Missouri, requesting that measures may be adopted, with respect to a certain tract of land in said Territory, claimed by the Shawanese and Delaware Indians.—Referred to the Secretary of State.

Mr. ROBERTSON, from the Committee on the Public Lands, made a report on the petition of the trustees of the Vincennes University, which was read, when, Mr. R. reported a bill confirming the titles of certain purchasers of land, who purchased from the Board of Trustees for the Vincennes University; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. ROBERTSON also reported a bill relating to settlers on the lands of the United States; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. CHAPPELL, from the Committee on Pensions and Revolutionary Claims, reported a bill for the relief of Young King, a Chief of the Seneca tribe of Indians; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. CHAPPELL, from the Committee on Pensions and Revolutionary Claims, reported with amendments the bill from the Senate for the relief of Robert White, Jacob Wright, and others, soldiers in the late army. The House consumed some time in settling the amount of pension to be allowed the persons named, whose cases excited no little interest from having been severely wounded and entirely disabled in the late war; after which the amendments were ordered to be engrossed, and, with the bill, to be read a third time.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Commissioner of the General Land Office, transmitting an estimate of the number of acres of land to which rights of pre-emption have been granted; also a statement of the difference in the amount of money received for lands sold at public and at private sale; which were referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, to which is annexed a statement of the valuation of lands, lots, and dwelling-houses, and slaves, made under the act laying a direct tax, in pursuance of the resolution of the 18th instant; which was read and ordered to lie on the table.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate insist on their disagreement to the amendments, proposed by this House, to the bill "concerning the convention to regulate the commerce between the territories of the United States and His Britannic Majesty," and agree to the conference asked by this House, and have appointed managers on their part.

MILITARY SERVICES.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill making further provision for military services during the late war.

A motion made yesterday by Mr. CANNON, to strike out the 3d section of the bill, which provides a bounty of land to the deranged officers of the late army, still under consideration.

This motion produced a discussion which occupied nearly the remainder of the day.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, said, he had expected some observations in favor of the bill from other members, and he had waited in that expectation until the question was about to be put to the Committee; but as objections had been made to some of the sections, he considered it his duty to submit some views for the consideration of those whose duty it was to decide upon the expediency of measures reported by the Military Committee for their sanction. Two leading objections have been made to the second section of the bill, which proposes a donation in land to the officers of the late army who were deranged by the consolidation of regiments during the war, and who were dismissed the service on the 15th of May, 1815, by the act reducing the army from sixty-two thousand to ten thousand men, after the termination of the war on the 17th of February, 1815. First, it is alleged that we have not embraced the soldiers as well as the officers. Every member in this House, and every citizen out of it, ought to know that we have already provided for the soldier of the regular army, both in land and in money; every soldier of the regular army, at his honorable discharge from the public service, was entitled to either one hundred and sixty, or three hundred and twenty acres of land, and the retained bounty of twenty-four dollars, according to the terms of enlistment. In addition to this, the soldier was clothed and fed, received his eight dollars per month, a bounty of one hundred dollars, besides the retained bounty of twenty-four dollars; and in all such cases where the soldier dies in the service, whether by wounds, or disease, or accident, his heirs are entitled to the benefit of the provision to which he was entitled, although he might have died the next day after entering the service; and as some of these regular soldiers, under eighteen years and over forty-five, had not the right to the bounty land, we have in this bill intended to give them and their heirs the same provisions in land and money bounty; thus it was the very first care of the Military Committee to see the faithful soldier provided for in consequence of his faithful services. The faithful soldier deserved all this for his toil and suffering; and in case of wounds, to this add the provision of a pension for life. The land and bounty alone, to which the soldiers of the late war are entitled, will amount to at least ten million of acres. Under this view, can we reasonably oppose the provision of land and bounty to the officers, which will not amount to one million of acres, because we make no farther provision for the soldier? If that objection be a good one, why not offer an amendment to embrace the soldier? No such proposition has been made, because we must be governed by our capacity and not our inclinations; our bounty should be equally dispensed to the officer and soldier, and not extend to one aid and comfort and refuse it to the other; and if gentlemen oppose a measure of bounty where no provision has been made; a much greater opposition and more rational would have been made to a measure proposing relief where a liberal relief had been granted. Liberality, as well as justice, has its equal scales, and in a national point of view impartiality in one is as important as in the other. We must therefore consider this objection as cutting both ways, operating equally against the officer, as to the proposed bounty, and as to the soldier against any additional provision. The second objection arises from its limitation to the officers of the regular army; in other words, that the provision does not embrace the sea fencibles, the rangers, the militia, the twelve months and eighteen months' volunteers, who were engaged in the late war, who would amount to at least three hundred thousand men, which would require at least fifty millions of acres of land, which at two dollars would amount to one hundred million of dollars—a sum almost equal to the national debt now due of the Revolutionary war and of the late war. The Military Committee had a difficult task to perform. If their feelings and affections could have had the sole influence in their decision, the present provisions would have fallen far short of their wishes. In the discharge of the important duties which devolved upon them, they were compelled to consult, first, their own reason, judgment, and conscience; sec-only, the feelings, the opinions, and wishes of Congress, as far as they could be ascertained; thirdly, the wishes, the feelings, the honorable sentiment of the nation, and the just expectations of the party concerned. It could not be forgotten, that at the last session of Congress a proposition like the present passed the House, after very warm opposition, and was finally rejected in the Senate; we had, therefore, to look at practicable results, which always fall short of what we would desire to do, and it was much to be regretted that it was not in the power of the committee to recommend more effectual measures of relief for the officer and soldier of every description. The capacity and condition of the country were also consulted and kept in mind—the various heavy demands against it, and the great amount of unliquidated claims which must be paid as soon as settled; thus limited in the discharge of gratitude to those who have served us so faithfully, it is to be lamented that we should be divided on the subject. We can easily ascertain the number of dismissed and deranged officers. Mr. JOHNSON said he had the official statement; about one hundred and seventy field and one thousand five hundred regimental officers had been dismissed. And because we could not extend to three hundred thousand men a bounty in land, was it a good argument against a bounty to these? Mr. J. said the people, or in other words, the militia, have never claimed such bounty; they have never expected such bounty; they would object to such a prodigal waste of public lands, which would be thrown into the market in such quantity as to lessen its market value to a cent, and millions of acres would fall into the hands of rich speculators.

Capital and fortune might be benefitted by such a course, but not the private soldier; and such serious encroachment upon the national domain would very much lessen the resources of revenue from the sale of public lands; the consequence of which would be additional taxation. The impracticability of the measure prevented a proposition of the kind, and the acquiescence of all in this sentiment is tested by a failure in any member to propose such amendments as will embrace these cases.

But, in the discussion of the subject, a comparison had been drawn between the militia and the regular army. Comparisons were often odious, and distinctions invidious. On this occasion there was no necessity for either, because the question of merit was not involved. If so, he would say that both had performed their duty faithfully, honorably, gallantly. The battles of Maguago, of Talapozie, of Chippewa, of Bridgewater, the defence of Fort Sandusky, the sortie from Fort Erie, and New Orleans, all proved thee qual and corresponding merit of the militia and regular army; several of which battles were as bloody and as well fought as the great battle of Zama, according to numbers, between two among the greatest Generals in the world—Hannibal and Scipio Africanus. The Roman legions were in part veterans; Hannibal had his mercenaries, although some were raw troops; Carthage being a commercial, rich nation, had no militia, but maintained a mercenary army; which army, at the close of the first Punic war, involved Carthage in a most bloody civil war for four years; in which Hamilcar, the father of Hannibal, at the head of the population of the country, totally defeated and destroyed it—a remarkable instance of the effect of union and zeal in a people who, without having been trained to arms, could subdue, conquer, and, indeed, annihilate the most powerful, disciplined, veteran army. And the cause of this war arose from the demands of the army after the termination of the first Punic war, and Carthage was not in a condition to comply with them. No such views have entered into the bosom of the American Army; no corps has ever given the least evidence of disaffection. A few individuals have clamored in the newspapers as to the reduction of the army, and particularly as to a failure in Congress to make some provision or donation which might discharge the debt of gratitude and justice. But this was the enjoyment of a right to express our sentiments, and in our country altogether harmless; and even this course was disapproved by a great majority of the army.

Mr. J. said, he did not, however, approve of such a course; it had a tendency to injure and create prejudice against a regular army, without a corresponding benefit. For he held as a fundamental principle in a free Government, that the reduction of an army should always be made without regard to the number of officers who wished to be retained; and, he said, he was for the reduction to ten thousand men; and he considered Congress entitled to more credit and merit in that act than would be given to them by the present generation. But, after having said this, he considered these principles as operating with double force on the Representatives of the people, to make some reasonable provision for those who have been dismissed the service of their country, and who have fought and bled for us. For, let it be recollected, that no regular army was ever actuated by the same pure motives of love of country, love of liberty, desire of honest fame, and also have contributed their just share in fixing upon a rock our independence, against which the wide billows of the tempestuous ocean may beat in vain. It has been truly said, that the militia did not expect bounty in land; of course, none has been offered; but there is a provision, for which the militia has called; they have demanded it of us, and we have complied with their wishes—have gratified their expectations—we have reported a provision to extend half-pay for five years to the widows and children of the rangers, sea-fencibles, twelve and eighteen months' volunteers, and the militia of the different States. This provision they expected, and this provision has been sanctioned; and at the end of five years, should that provision be considered inadequate, Congress has the power to extend it. This provision is not confined to the officers and soldiers who were killed in battle, died of wounds, but extended to all who may have died in service in any other way, and to those who may have died on their way home, after being dismissed the service. Without such a measure as this, the militia would not have been satisfied; with it, they cannot be dissatisfied. This very provision is doing more for the militia than the donation proposed to the dismissed officers; and this question might be left with safety to the people themselves—to the militia—and they would not hesitate to demonstrate their liberality, their honorable feelings. The people are generous, magnanimous, brave, and just. But, look to the extent of this provision in favor of the militia. It looks to every part of the nation, and embraces every part of our extended frontier. It contemplates every battle fought during the war, and it provides for sickness and disease.

The State of Ohio may look to Hull's surrender, the battle of Brownstown, &c.; Kentucky, to the Northwestern army, the river Raisin, the two sieges of Fort Meigs, Colonel Dudley's defeat, &c.; Virginia, to Hampton, Norfolk, &c.; Maryland, to Baltimore; New York, Pennsylvania, Vermont, to the Niagara, Plattsburg, &c.; Connecticut, to Stonington, &c.; Tennessee, to her various splendid victories over the Creeks, at New Orleans, &c.; and all other States, without going into detail, according to their sufferings and losses. Is this nothing? Is it nothing to Kentucky that you embrace the case of the widow of Colonel John Allen, whose worth was well known—as pure as a sun-beam—and who had left a name as imperishable as our liberties; the widow of the unfortunate Major Graves, whose memory was dear to his country; the widow of the gallant Hart, of the determined Hickman, and all those gallant sons of the West who died in their country's cause, leaving behind widows or children? As much as this is to Kentucky, so is it a just representation of the case of every other State, as to their losses.

The bill does not neglect the militia. Mr. J. said, no man could suppose he felt indifferent to the militia, whatever may be the merit of the militia. In time of war, it is important that the draughts should be as light as is consistent with the national security; and to make the draughts as light as possible, inducements must be held out to increase the regular army. The good of the people requires this imperiously. This also justified that bounty in land and money which was given to the regular soldier, and not to the militia. Of this we heard no complaint; and, although we made no promise to the officers of land bounty, the obligation is not lessened to do it, if we think they deserve it. It will have great influence in a future emergency. Nor is it any argument against it, that we could always get officers for our Army; but this presents an additional argument in its favor, provided patriotism be worth rewarding. Nor is it sufficient to say, that some do not deserve our bounty. It is enough that we know the fact that a great majority of the officers deserve more than we propose to give them by this bill.

As to the pay of the officers during the war, it is generally admitted that, with the most rigid economy, they had to call upon their own funds, or upon paternal kindness, for pecuniary aid; and, as soon as an officer entered the regular army, he had to give up every other prospect—his pursuits, his family connexions. It did not happen to the same extent with those who entered for the term of six months. In reducing our army to 10,000, it was well known that efficient men, both in body and in mind, were generally retained; of course, those who had ruined a constitution by hard service; those who had served ten, fifteen, and twenty years, and advanced in life; the wounded officer wanting an eye, a leg, or an arm, were dismissed; such men have some claims upon their country. The memorable Congress of '83, which closed the Revolution, gave half-pay for life to the officers, or five years whole pay. This bill proposes only a donation in land. Much has been said upon the subject of preparing for war in time of peace. In a Republic large standing armies cannot be maintained, nor other expensive establishments; the means of preparation must be cheap, but effectual. If so, the bill under debate would be a strong measure of preparation; preparation which would give moral power, physical power, and intellectual power. Moral power, by such illustrious examples of honor, virtue, gratitude, and justice—physical, by uniting all hearts and all hands in support of a Government inspiring such confidence—intellectual, by extending the means of support and cultivation to the indigent and distressed. The true maxim in a Republic will ever remain—that the militia is the palladium of our rights, the ultimate reliance in the storms of adversity. With this maxim there is another principle no less correct, that the militia are valuable in the first moments of war, until regular troops can relieve them from garrison duty, long and distant campaigns; this was the universal sentiment of the people during the late war, and such will their sentiments continue to be; it is their interest that it should be so.

Mr. J. said, he had omitted one important consideration, which should have great influence in inducing Congress to extend this land bounty to the deranged and dismissed officers. The Army of the United States was constituted upon principles, and composed of materials, differing from the regular armies of ancient or modern times.

In looking into history we should find that the armies of Alexander, in the invasion of Asia; of Hannibal, in the invasion of Italy; of Cæsar, in the invasion of Gaul and Britain, and of all others, the mercenary troops were devoted to their leaders, and these leaders repaid their devotion by rapine, plunder, and often with the lands of the conquered country. But the troops of the United States were devoted to their country; no chieftain could influence them to turn their arms against it; nor do they expect to be paid for their devotion to their country by plunder—by sacking villages and towns. They receive no such reward; they are actuated by no such inducement; they have no such expectations; they receive no other compensation than that which they receive as ordinary pay by the laws of the United States; nor do they expect anything, except from our gratitude and justice. The reasonable expectations of such men ought not to be disappointed; it is a pity that more cannot be done for them.

The duties of the Military Committee have been increasing in number and in importance since the attack on the Chesapeake; however arduous and important those duties may have been at any time, they were not of more difficulty than those which have devolved upon the committee at the present session; and such will always be the case at the termination of a war. So various were the expectations of different classes of individuals; so various the duties resulting from the claims of those different classes; so difficult to discharge those great duties which look with discernment to the interests of the Commonwealth, and to that portion of it which has claims upon us. In this situation, the committee endeavored to embrace the cases of all who were entitled to consideration, without injury to the Republic. In this view of the subject we did not confine ourselves to the late war, but extended aid and comfort to the surviving officers and soldiers of the Revolution, who are unable to gain a livelihood by labor, and those of the late war who are so disabled as to be unable to maintain themselves. The committee reported a bill, for the purpose of organizing a corps of invalids; for the wounded, a pension; for the widows and orphans, half-pay for five years; for the dismissed and deranged officers, a bounty in land. These provisions, if carried into effect, will relieve much distress, alleviate much sorrow, bind up the broken hearted, and administer to them the healing balm of affection. The regular soldier has his money and land bounty—his widow and children the same provision in case of his death. For the officer and soldier of the regular army and militia, who have lost their vouchers by captivity or unavoidable accident, a provision is here recommended, giving equitable powers of adjustment to the War Department; and, as measures of precaution and efficiency, we have recommended a general and division staff, that will make our forces efficient in the field; and a Military Academy, to diffuse military instruction throughout the United States.

Mr. J. said, the formation of a national character was of great importance; every nation has a character of some sort—mixed or positive in its kind. A character for all the virtues—of liberality, of generosity, of magnanimity, of gratitude, of justice, of wisdom; or it may be positive, of the opposite qualities and attributes—of parsimony, of ingratitude, of injustice, of ignorance; or mixed, combining a part of the virtues that exalt, and part of the virtues that degrade the human character. On the present occasion it would be discovered that the provisions of the bill were neither prodigal, on the one hand, nor parsimonious on the other. In measures of State we should avoid extremes.

In concluding, Mr. J. said, he would not inquire whether we had promised to provide for the widow and orphan, or make donations to the officer; a tender father never stops to inquire whether he is bound by contract to aid and relieve a worthy son; nor does a man of noble feelings inquire whether he is bound by contract to extend the hand of assistance to a friend in distress. The Government contracted no legal obligation; it acted wisely in not doing it. It was wise to be free to act, as circumstances would warrant. This is no argument, however, against the bill. It will reflect more honor upon Congress to give where it is merited, without legal obligation. In the beginning of the war we did not know how the army would act; we have their conduct now before us, and we approve it. If individual cases should be selected, as has been done, to depreciate the claims of the army, it should be recollected that the same might be done of all associations of men; and it is to be regretted that we should indulge prejudices against men who have generally acted so well, and that jealousy should be excited between the army and militia. The praise of the army should not be considered as censure of the militia, nor well-earned praise of the militia, as lessening the claims of the army. With these views, the hope is indulged that the bill will pass without material amendment.

Mr. COMSTOCK said, this was a subject upon which much might be said on each side, by gentlemen of learning and eloquence. It is one, said he, on which my mind has labored with considerable anxiety. Possessing only very limited claims, sir, to either of these valuable accomplishments, I must content myself with glancing at some of the reasons which will influence my conduct upon this occasion.

Mr. C. said, I early imbibed a respect for the patriot soldier. He possesses qualities of mind which challenge and receive my admiration and esteem. Forsaking the hallowed shades of domestic happiness, he courts the danger, toils, and privations, incident to his profession. His best days are devoted to the service of his country. His health, his blood, and his life, are nobly sacrificed upon the altar of the public weal.

This respect, so early imbibed, has strengthened with succeeding years. I feel all its force in contemplating the officers of the late army; I believe, in general, they deserve well of their country; I rejoice that they merit, and receive, the meed of her applause. They have exhibited a degree of fortitude and intelligence not surpassed in any age or nation; and they have essentially contributed, under the auspices of Heaven, to the speedy, honorable, and beneficial issue of the conflict, from which the nation has recently emerged.

Mr. C. said it can scarcely be imagined that I am actuated in the vote I am about to give, by an apprehension that the late war was unjust or unnecessary; for although I have not been in the habit of presenting my views upon this subject in elaborate speeches, nevertheless, the votes I have uniformly given upon questions calculated to promote the military service, abundantly evince my ideas of the justice and propriety of the late war. While I lamented the imperious necessity which demanded its declaration, I conceived it forced upon us by the injustice and rapacity of the enemy. Hence, sir, I have ever deemed it my duty, as a member of this honorable body, to invigorate the national arm, by furnishing to the Government the means of humbling and vanquishing our foes; of vindicating the honor and interest of the nation, and of placing them upon a firm and stable foundation.

Mr. C. said, what induced the officers to enter the service? What multiplied the number of candidates for military office, to an extent beyond that which it was proper to gratify and employ? I answer, sir, patriotism, the love of fame, and the laudable desire of rendering benefit to the country. It has been said, that military glory is the pay of a soldier. Does justice require those donations? No sir. Has the Government failed to perform its engagements with the officers? Has it subjected itself to the imputation of bad faith? Sir, no such thing exists, no such pretension has been suggested; the Government has strictly adhered to the requisition of those laws in virtue of which they solicited and received their commissions. They have had an opportunity to manifest their love of country, and to render her honorable service in the exercise of their military talents. They have received pretty ample pecuniary compensation, (especially the superior officers,) and enjoy all the advantages of victory, with the respect and gratitude of the nation.

Mr. C. said, does sound policy demand these donations? I think not, sir. I am aware that we may be exhorted by honorable members to transport ourselves in imagination to a period when we may be again engaged in a conflict of arms with an enemy; a conflict similar in character to that through which we have lately passed in defence of our dearest rights; in defence of the very attributes of sovereignty. We may be told that, at a period so eventful, we may solicit in vain the heroes of the country to wear our commission, and to fight our battles. They will be deterred from entering our service, from the illiberality which the history of our conduct, in relation to the deranged officers, will disclose, should this section be rejected.

Sir, I do not believe that such a state of things will ever occur. Real vision, in my judgment, will never behold this fanciful picture. History will record that we have complied with every legal and moral obligation imposed on us in reference to these deranged officers. Have they been wounded? we inscribe their names, as invalid officers, on the roll of pensioners of the United States. Have officers been slain in battle? we grant a gratuity, for a term of years, to their legal representatives. Sir, without advert- ing to all the provisions upon this subject, suffice it to say, that history will proclaim the justice and munificence of the conduct of the Government in regard to the Army. Thus, sir, the period, I apprehend, will never arrive when men of military talents and heroic cast of character, in sufficient numbers, cannot be found, proud to wear your uniform, courting your service, and ready to rally round the standard of the country in the hour of trial. An honorable sense of duty, and an ardent and long cherished attachment to those eternal principles of civil and religious liberty, guaranteed to us by our excellent political institutions, will be among the powerful motives which will secure forever to the Government their best services and affection.

Mr. Chairman, invidious distinctions are involved in this section, to which I am opposed. It excludes from its benefits the most meritorious class of the Army. Those officers of the Army who are retained in service are not embraced by this provision; and yet it is fair to conclude that many of them have rendered more service to the country, and have stronger claims on her bounty than those who have been deranged.

At the reduction of the Army, when a selection of officers was made for the Peace Establishment, we may naturally conclude that regard was had, in some measure, to the respective merits of the officers composing the late army. Hence, sir, the imperfection of this system is manifest.

Mr. Chairman, what reason have we to discriminate in this way, between the regular and militia officers of the late army. Have not the latter displayed military genius and devotion to their country? Have they not rendered her signal services, and performed many noble and gallant achievements? They certainly have, sir; in this exists no difference of opinion. With what justice or propriety, then, can we withhold from them this boon? Sir, the names of these brave and patriotic officers thicken on my recollection. I could mention a Shelby, a Porter, and many others, if it were proper to name them in this place, equally deserving the benefits of this section, as the deranged officers of the regular army. Sir, the honorable chairman of the Military Committee has reminded us, that we grant land to privates, and asks, why we withhold it from officers? Sir, there is a great difference between the pecuniary compensation afforded a private, and an officer. Besides, by the terms of your contract with the private soldier, when he entered the service you promised him land; no such contract exists, no such promise was made in relation to the officers. The same gentleman, when speaking of the advantages extended to the militia, with a view to do away the imputation that the deranged officers of the regular army are the favored objects of our partiality, remarked, that we place the militia, when wounded, on the pension list. Sir, this privilege is common to militia and regulars; and, therefore, cannot be adduced to justify the distinction to which I have adverted.

But my estimable friend from Kentucky complains of our turning the deranged officers upon the world without the means of support. Sir, when the people have no business for their public servants to perform, when the necessity which induced their official elevation ceases to exist, it is just and proper they should retire to private life; of this practice no one can, of right, complain. We maintain no sinecures in this Republic. Mr. Chairman, from the best reflection I have been able to bestow upon the subject of this section, I am induced to believe it ought not to be adopted. If, however, it shall obtain, I hope its benefits will be confined to captains and subalterns. Thus, sir, I am constrained, from a sense of duty, to oppose, upon this occasion, the wishes of my honorable friend, the chairman of the Military Committee, with whom I am generally happy and proud to act in concert.

Mr. TAUL said: Though I am decidedly of opinion that the section of the bill proposed to be stricken out is impolitic, and of course ought not to pass, I confess that I distrust my own judgment, when it is different from that of any of the standing committees of the House. The members composing those committees are selected for their capacity and particular knowledge of the business to be referred to them. Those selections have been judiciously made. The standing committees have a double responsibility on them. Hence it is to be presumed that every measure, before it is reported to the House, undergoes a very nice scrutiny. Those committees have deservedly great weight in the investigation and decision of such questions as may have come before and been decided on by them. In opposing, therefore, any measure recommended by them, you have to encounter "fearful odds" indeed.

In addition to the support given to this measure by the Military Committee, it has also received the support of an honorable, highly respectable, enlightened, and consequently influential member from Maryland, (Mr. SMITH.)

In opposing the proposed donation of lands to the disbanded officers, I wish it to be distinctly understood that I have no idea of detracting from their merits. They stand high in my estimation. They have the richest reward in the nation's treasury—its thanks, its gratitude.

But, sir, is it to the regular army exclusively, or the officers commanding it, that you are indebted for the splendid victories achieved during the late war?—for your present high standing amongst the nations of the earth? Much, very much, Mr. Chairman, was performed by the militia; yes, the militia, that was once considered the bulwark of the nation; but which some gentlemen seem to consider, at this time, worse than nothing. It is not my intention to make any invidious comparisons; I shall not say that this was done by the militia, that by the regular army.

But I must be pardoned in directing your attention back to the Fall of 1813. What was the situation of this country then, and the state of the public mind and feelings of the people? Disaster had succeeded disaster in such rapid succession, that this nation was literally clad in mourning, was covered with sackcloth and ashes; every face was pale; the highest-minded and most sanguine in this nation was bowed down; nothing but the brilliant achievements of your gallant tars on the water prevented you from sinking into the lowest depths of despair and despondency. From what quarter did the first ray of hope beam upon you? From the Northwest—Kentucky's venerable chief, at the head of her volunteer militia, in the capture of the British Army under Proctor, and the dispersion of the Indians with the slaughter of their favorite leader, brought you relief. Despair and despondency disappeared like an unwelcome guest. Confidence and hope succeeded. Bonfires and illuminations in all parts of the United States evidenced the change produced by the gallant deeds of your militia. The honorable gentleman at the head of your Military Committee (Mr. JOHNSON) knows well their merits. He has commanded them; he has fought and bled with them. As the commander of a militia corps, he has rendered signal services to his country; and should the occasion require it, will doubtless do so again. It is unnecessary to enumerate instances of the gallant achievements of your militia. The plains of New Orleans will be a lasting monument to their fame, their worth and usefulness.

But, says an honorable gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. CONNER,) for whom I have the highest personal respect, General Washington pronounced during the war of the Revolution, that the militia under his command had been prejudicial, instead of serviceable, to the country. General Washington spoke of the heterogeneous, discordant, unorganized, and undisciplined militia of that day. His various communications to Congress during the time he administered the Government, will demonstrate that he considered the militia the nation's best, surest, and, I may say, only defence. His anxiety to have the militia properly organized, armed, and disciplined, is manifested in all his communications to Congress on the subject. The same honorable gentleman (Mr. CONNER) has referred us to the military operations in India, as an evidence of the correctness of the position which he has assumed. In that country he has informed you that an army of fifty or an hundred thousand men has been put to flight by a few thousand British troops. I must be permitted to flatter myself that the American militia are something superior to the Hindoo; if they are not, it is high time we were looking out for some other dependence than the militia. Sir, if your militia are not capable of defending themselves, of fighting their own battles—if they are not fit materials for soldiers, they are not fit for citizens; it is time they were subjects. Gentlemen seem to have misunderstood the ground of opposition to the proposed donation to the disbanded officer. Sir, it is not because your militia officers are not included; I will not say that the militia officer would not accept anything of the kind, which the Government, in the plenitude of its liberality, might bestow; but this much I will say, that he ought not.

Sir, if suffering is to be rewarded, you should begin with the non-commissioned officers and privates of the militia. Comparatively speaking, the situation of the officer during the late war was enviable, the situation of the soldier wretched, deplorable. I would not make a donation of land to the officer, without making a similar donation to the soldier; and I do not think either entitled to it. I doubt the right of the Congress of the United States to make such a disposition of the public lands. It has been too common a practice under almost all governments to reward a few at the expense of the many. Let us not, if possible, fall into this error. If we are to exercise our charity, let us find fit objects; for ill-directed or misplaced charity, is worse than no charity at all.

Hitherto the Congress of the United States has provided only for the widows and children of such officers as may have been killed in battle. The humane and laudable object of this bill is to make provision for the widows and children of such non-commissioned officers and privates as may have died in your service. It is worthy a great and magnanimous people. The best feelings of the human heart must be enlisted in their favor; I therefore regret that the proposed bounty to the disbanded officers should be ushered into this House in company with the claim of the widow and orphan. They stand on very different ground. It is contended that the disbanded officers were taken from lucrative professions, from profitable agricultural and commercial pursuits, that their business has been deranged and cannot be resumed to advantage. Sir, one, two, or three years' service will not disqualify a man for the pursuits of civil life. The disbanded officer who cannot resume his civil pursuits was unfit to be honored with a commission; the country is under no obligation to support him. The meritorious disbanded officer, in resuming business, will have considerable advantages over others in the same line of business; his military services will have enlisted the sympathies of the people on his side, and consequently command their friendship and support. Pass the section of the bill now under consideration, and, my word for it, your militia is disgusted, great violence will be done to public sentiment. It is considered in the light of a charitable donation; all who held commissions during the late war are included; the great mass of the community will not be able to perceive that because a young gentleman (worthy as he may be) may have worn epaulets for a few months or a year, that he is, therefore, an object of charity. Sir, he stands on very different ground from that of the superannuated, war-worn officer or soldier. This Government is founded (as I remarked on a former occasion) on the affections of the people; their feelings, their wishes must be consulted. It is no reproach to them that they would be opposed to the proposed grant of land to the officers. Select meritorious objects, and you will find no limit to the bounty, to the gratitude of this people. The Legislature of the State which I have the honor, in part, of representing on this floor, has forwarded us a memorial in behalf of the widow and orphan. As well as I recollect, it is stated to have passed both branches of the Legislature unanimously.

It has been observed, in the course of this debate, that the disbanded officers have acquired a great deal of military information; that by making this provision for them, they will be enabled to perfect their military education, and, in the event of another war, would make valuable officers. Perhaps I have not the same confidence in making good and valuable officers by education that some gentlemen have. You cannot make a military commander as you can make a cobbler. He must be formed by the plastic hand of nature herself. An honorable, ingenious, and enlightened gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. HULBERT,) some time since, in debate, on the bill to establish an additional Military Academy, (which he advocated with great zeal and ability,) embellished his speech and undertook to illustrate the position which he assumed, by quoting the old maxim, "That an army of hares commanded by a lion was superior to an army of lions commanded by a hare." Be it so. I should doubt making a lion of a hare by any course of education that could be taken. It requires a combination of rare qualities to make an able commander. Those qualities actual service alone can develop.

Much as our hopes were rested upon our old experienced officers at the period when war was declared, and for some time thereafter, our egregious disappointment will never be forgotten. Without intending a reflection upon any particular officer, it is with pain that I say that many of them at the trying moment were found wanting.

The distinguished heroes who shone with such resplendent lustre at the closing scene, and who "have filled the measure of their country's honor," were unthought of at the commencement of hostilities.

The resources of your country could, in my opinion, be better applied, than in the way contemplated by the section of the bill under consideration. Amongst other things your militia want arms—though they are, in my opinion, superior to any troops in the world, it is not to be disguised that they are in a most wretched situation. They know nothing of the musket and bayonet until they are called into service. For the first time those arms are put into their hands. They are dissatisfied with the musket, because they are acquainted with the rifle and know its efficacy. They should be habituated to the use of those arms on which they have to depend in battle. It takes some time to reconcile a militiaman to arms with which he was unacquainted, and which he has not been used to handling.

* I shall vote for striking out the section; the rest of the bill I do most sincerely hope and trust will receive the unanimous support of the House.

Mr. EASTON said, he entertained the highest regard and respect for the honorable, the chairman and members of the Military Committee who reported the bill now under discussion, and if the honorable members of the committee had gone a little farther they would have been entitled to more of his respect.

I have heard, Mr. Chairman, said Mr. E., a great deal about national glory upon the floor of this House: I, too, love national glory—not only national glory, but also love national justice. He considered the present question, whether a donation of lands should be granted to the disbanded officers of the Army as altogether a question of policy. He had, at an early period in the session, offered a resolution instructing the committee on Military Affairs to inquire into the expediency of paying to the officers, non-commissioned officers, and privates, of the militia, army, and rangers, who served in the late war, interest on the sums due to them, from the time they ought to have been paid, until they should be paid. He understood it had been reported against; had the inquiry been as to its justice, instead of its expediency, he believed it could not have been reported against; he thought the nation should be just before it was bountiful. If the committee had reported in favor of the payment to the army and militia what was in truth due to them, and also in favor of granting a bounty in land to the officers and privates of the militia, we should then have had the question of justice, as well as policy, before us. He, for one, was not for giving donations to the disbanded officers, and withholding what was justly due to the militia. He thought such a measure was neither just nor politic. The officers of the army had sought, with great competition, to procure commissions in the service of the country, while many of the militia, some of whom were equally meritorious and would have made as good officers had they have been commissioned, have been forced into the service by a draught, others had volunteered, and greatly distinguished themselves in their country's cause.

Mr. E. said, he had heard, with great pleasure, glory in high-toned and very eloquent strains poured forth, and very properly bestowed upon Jackson, Brown, Scott, Ripley, Maccomb, Gaines, Porter, Miller, and the long list of heroes who had helped to fight the battles of the country; they justly merited all that could be said in their praise, and he was not disposed to detract in the least from the merit, the praise, or the honor, to which they were so justly entitled; he would not pluck one solitary feather from their cap of fame. He would however ask, how was this glory acquired? Who acquired it for them? While he was not disposed to eulogise mortal man, he could not forbear to bring into view before the committee the merits of the militia. He recollected, when quite a youth, a respectable old lady from the neighborhood where he lived had made a visit into Vermont; on her return, she was asked how she liked the settlements and the people? She observed, smilingly, that they lived in log cabins in the woods, and at every house she saw more children than panes of glass in their windows. It is to these hardy sons of America that a portion of this glory ought to be ascribed. Who defeated the British at Sackett's Harbor? Who helped to gain the successive battles of Chippewa, Niagara, and Erie? The militia. Who defeated General Proctor's army at the Moravian towns? The militia. Who terrified and beat a veteran army, greatly superior in number, at Plattsburg on the 18th of September, 1814, and gave military fame to Maccomb? The Vermont and New York militia. Who expelled the British veteran foe from before New Orleans on the 8th of January, 1815, immortalized the hero Jackson, and crowned their country with everlasting glory? It was the brave and hardy sons of the West—the militia and volunteers. And what were these glorified Generals at the commencement of the war; they, most of them, were of the militia?

Sir, this is, or ought to be, a Government of equal rights—equal protection should be extended to all, and equal and exact justice measured out to all alike. How had the war borne in its operation upon the people of this nation? It would be found that certain portions of the people had made money during the war—Pittsburg, Carlisle, and other places in Pennsylvania; also, in certain parts of the State of New York, and other States to the South, had made money by the war, while the frontiers had suffered incalculable losses, whether that frontier was on the Atlantic or in the interior. The war had raged upon the Niagara frontier, upon the seacoast, and in the Northwest. On the Niagara frontier, the people had been plundered, and their houses burned by the enemy; many had lost everything they possessed. Portions of the seaboard had also been ravaged, and the inhabitants plundered of their property, and their persons violated; while, on the Northwest frontier, the people had been shot dead in their fields, their houses burned, property robbed, and many left without a cent to give support or succor to the agonizing widow and helpless orphan. And was this nation to give to the rich, to disbanded officers, to the aristocratic branch of the community, who sought with eagerness the honor of holding your commissions, and the truly unfortunate to remain wholly unprovided for? He wished not to be understood as being opposed to this donation; as a matter of policy to the officers, he thought it should be granted, but not until relief should be extended to such as had been ruined by the war; the militia and army paid what was due to them, and the like bounty in lands extended to the militia. Equal rights do not exist where justice is not measured out to all alike; individuals who have loaned to the Government, always have been paid interest; and what is the withholding from the militia, rangers, and others employed in your service, sums really due to them, but a forced loan? If you provide for these disbanded officers, why not make provision for the militia, the great bulwark of our liberty, the ark of our political safety? Does not sound policy dictate this course? To whom will you look, and to whom will posterity look, for the defence of the country, in case of another war, if it be not to the militia?

Let any member of this honorable Committee figure to himself the situation of a frontier-man, a ranger, in the war upon the Western frontier. He enlists, because his family, his country, liberty, and property, everything held dear and sacred, is endangered; he scorns to fly, he expects pay, because it is right, and he cannot serve without it. He goes in debt, supplies his own provision, horse, and clothing; he marches not into the open field to meet in broad day-light a civilized enemy, but, in the wide wilderness, to combat with the rifle, the tomahawk, and scalping-knife, leaving his defenceless family behind, at home, expecting every night to be slaughtered by the ruthless and relentless savage foe, who creep from their hiding places, make their attack in the dark, by surprise, and, unless successful, are off through the thicket with all the rapidity of the deer. The savage hunts the ranger as he would hunt the doe. Wet and cold are the days, and dismal are the nights he has spent in his country's cause. Peace is proclaimed—it brings glad tidings to every honest heart. The ranger and the militiaman return, they expect payment, everybody supposed they long since would have been paid, without it they cannot discharge their debts. Their certificates for pay more worthless than Philadelphia bills in New York, or New York bills in Philadelphia were, during the war. They must dispose of them at a discount, or the bailiff sells their property or confines them in prison. Similar has been the fate of many an honest husbandman. The militia of that portion of the country which he had the honor to represent, had defended the country before and during the whole war. We were without regular troops; it is true there were ten companies of rangers for three Territories, but those were taken from the militia of that country, and the few regular troops did little more than perform garrison duty. The country was greatly harassed during the whole war, and he could here give a long catalogue of barbarous and bloody murders committed, which he forebore to detain the Committee to relate.

The militia, the independent farmers of the West, when the colonization of the Western country was threatened by the British veteran forces at New Orleans, and hordes of blood-thirsty savages, headed by British myrmidons and emissaries, were pressing upon the settlements in the North, they, the people of the West, the father and the son, the aged and the infirm, rallied around the standard of their country, and did march, and would again march, at the point of the bayonet, to spill the last drop of blood sooner than the tyrant of the ocean, the destroyer of mankind, the spoiler of free trade, and the deadly enemy of all free Governments, should have gained a foothold in this happy land of liberty and equal rights.

The honorable chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, (Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky,) says they have not neglected the militia, in his opinion, if I understood him right; and undertakes to prove this position, by stating that Congress have given a donation of land to the widows of the late John Allen, and Captains Hart and Hickman; that we have embraced the cases of widows and orphans. Certainly, providing for the widows and orphans of the deceased, is not providing for the militia themselves. Make liberal and generous provision for the militia; reward those whose interest it will be to rally around the standard of the country, and to meet the invasion of the enemy as they would trespassers upon their own personal concerns, and you will never be forced to resort to conscriptions.

On the contrary, if you grant extra bounties to such professional gentlemen as have given up the practice of the law, worth five thousand dollars a year; to commercial men who have quit their pursuits, worth ten thousand dollars a year, as stated by an honorable gentleman, and the exclusive advocates of disbanded officers, who, with such lucrative professions and employments, have a competency to return to; while you withhold relief to such as have been ruined by the war, and refuse to reward your militia, who have gained you most splendid victories, fought the battles of the country, preserved the honor of the nation—soldiers composed of farmers, American husbandmen, fresh from their fields, separated from their families, firesides, and homes, who, upon the sound of their country's alarm, have marched to its standard, and met the invasion of the mercenary enemies to the rights of man, to liberty, and a free Government; forced them to retire with great slaughter, and crowned this nation with immortal glory—withhold, I say, a reward to this meritorious class of the community—put them off with the honorable thanks of the nation—bestow bounties exclusively upon disbanded officers, and in all future contests, as in the late war, you will have officers by thousands, but few soldiers, to fight the battles of this beloved country.

Messrs. CANNON, ROSS, MCKEE, and WILLIAMS, supported the motion, and opposed the grant of land to the disbanded officers. Messrs. SMITH of Maryland, JACKSON of Virginia, and WILDE, were adverse to the motion, and in favor of awarding the bounty proposed in the bill.

The motion to strike out the section was finally agreed to—ayes 74, nays 60.

On motion, of Mr. DESHA, the 2d section of the bill was so amended as to confine the land bounty to those soldiers, above forty-five and under eighteen years of age, who enlisted "for five years or during the war."

On motion, of Mr. JACKSON of Virginia, a new section was added to the bill for the purpose of guarding, as far as possible, the bounty from falling into the hands of speculators, by prohibiting the transfer of right thereto, until after the patent has issued.

The Committee then rose, reported progress, and obtained leave to sit again.

FRIDAY, February 16.

Mr. SERGEANT presented a petition of sundry inhabitants of Montgomery county, and of the Northern Liberties of the city of Philadelphia, in the State of Pennsylvania, praying that the mails may not be transported or opened on Sundays.

Mr. EASTON presented a resolution of the Legislature of the Territory of Missouri, requesting that some provision may be adopted to afford relief to settlers on public lands in that Territory, who have been ordered to remove therefrom by the proclamation of the President of the United States, of the 12th December, 1815.—Referred to the Committee of the Whole on the bill relating to settlers on the public lands.

Mr. JEWETT submitted the following resolution; which was read and ordered to lie on the table:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to cause to be laid before this House, a statement of all expenses which have been incurred in the City of Washington, under the authority of the United States, for erecting edifices of any kind, and for repairing and ornamenting buildings of any kind, and for improving the streets and squares of the city, and for all other purposes of ornament and improvement, (excepting the navy yard and its buildings and improvements,) designating, as specifically as the nature of the case will admit, the years when the several expenditures were incurred, the purposes to which they were applied, and the funds out of which the same were paid or appropriated, distinguishing between such payments as were made out of the Treasury of the United States, and such as were made out of the proceeds of the sales of the public property within the District of Columbia, or out of other district funds, or donations received: and also a statement of the amount of the funds derived from the sale of lots, and other public property within the City of Washington, and of the probable value of the public property remaining on hand.

The bill from the Senate, entitled "An act to increase the pensions of Robert White, and Jacob Wrighter," was read the third time, as amended, and passed.

Ordered, That the title be "An act to increase the pensions of Robert White, Jacob Wrighter, John Young, and John Crampsey."

PETITION OF WILLIAM FLOOD.

Mr. YANCEY, from the Committee of Claims, made a report on the petition of William Flood, which was read; when Mr. Y. reported a bill for the relief of William Flood; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole. The report is as follows:

That the petitioner owned and occupied a valuable dwelling-house, together with a valuable mill and other out-houses, on the west side of the river Mississippi, previous to the month of December, 1814; on the 27th of that month, the plantation of the petitioner was taken possession of by Brigadier General David B. Morgan, under an order from General Andrew Jackson, then commanding the United States troops in New Orleans and its vicinity, and the houses occupied by the officers and troops under his command. On the morning of the 8th of January, 1815, General Morgan was attacked by the enemy, forced from his position, and the houses of the petitioner, together with his mill and timber, at the same time destroyed by the enemy. It appears to the committee, from documents accompanying the petition, that the property was destroyed on account of its being occupied by the troops of the United States, and for the purpose of preventing barracks being again erected for the defence of New Orleans. No other buildings at that place, or in the neighborhood, were destroyed; and it was known to the enemy that the mill of the petitioner had furnished the timber with which the batteries had been constructed.

The committee are of opinion that the petitioner is entitled to relief, and therefore report by bill.

PETITION OF EDMUND DANA.

Mr. YANCEY also made a report on the petition of Edmund Dana; which was read, and the resolution therein contained was concurred in by the House. The report is as follows:

That the petitioner states that, during the late war, he acted in the capacity of a clothing sutler to the different posts and regiments of the third military district; that he opened shop in the different garrisons for the sale of such articles of clothing as suited the convenience of the officers and soldiers; and that, having given credit to many of the soldiers for such articles as they purchased, he has lost many of his debts by the death and desertion of his debtors, and by some of the soldiers having been discharged on account of their being minors.

He asks of Congress to pass a law authorizing him to receive the wages which may be due from the Government to such deserters, deceased and discharged soldiers.

The committee are of opinion that he is entitled to no relief from Government. If he has made contracts with the officers or soldiers, he must look to them to comply with the same; the Government cannot interfere to settle such accounts. The committee recommend to the House the following resolution:

Resolved, That the prayer of the petitioner ought not to be granted.

MILITARY SERVICES.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the order of the day; and the Committee proceeded to consider the bill further to provide for military services during the late war.

Mr. BRADBURY offered the following amendment to the second section of the bill:

"That if any non-commissioned officer, musician, or private, of the regular Army, shall have died while in the service of the United States, leaving a widow, or, if no widow, a child or children under fourteen years of age, such widow, or, if no widow, such child or children shall be entitled to receive half the monthly pay to which the deceased was entitled at the time of his decease, for and during the term of five years, upon the same terms and conditions, and under the same rules, restrictions and conditions as are provided by law for the widows and children of non-commissioned officers, musicians, and privates, of the regular Army, who have been killed or died of wounds received in battle."

After a few remarks from Mr. BRADLEY, in support of his motion, and by Mr. DESHA and Mr. JOHNSON against it, the amendment was disagreed to; and Mr. JOHNSON moved to add the following to the second section of the bill:

And be it further enacted, That in case of the death of a soldier of the regular Army, the widow shall, in all cases, be considered as one of the heirs, with the child or children of said regular soldier; and in all such cases, the said widow shall have her election to take for herself and child or children the five years' half pay, in lieu of the land bounty and the three months' pay now allowed by law to the heirs and representatives of said decedent.

Before this proposition was decided on, a motion was made, and carried, to lay the bill on the table.

CANADIAN REFUGEES.

The Committee proceeded to the consideration of the bill for the relief of certain Canadian refugees who entered the American service during the late war. A motion was made by Mr. WEBSTER, when the bill was last under consideration, to strike out the first section, being the first question for decision.

On this motion a very animated, and, from the argument introduced, a very interesting debate took place. The bill was advocated with much zeal by Messrs. CUTHBERT, and ROBERTSON; and as warmly opposed by Mr. HULBERT.

The following is the substance of the remarks made by Mr. HULBERT, at different times, on this bill, while it was before a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HULBERT said: I can never consent, Mr. Chairman, to give my vote in favor of the bill which is now under consideration. My cool and deliberate judgment, and all the feelings of my heart, are utterly opposed to it.

Without meaning to question, in the slightest degree, the purity of intention of any gentleman who has had an agency in reporting this bill, or has in any way given it his support, I must say, that I think it is founded on principles which are wholly inconsistent with the doctrines of morality, and the dictates of justice and sound policy.

Sir, what does this bill propose; what are its objects? Let me examine, in the first place, its most exceptionable and odious provision—I mean that which relates to those inhabitants of Canada, who, in the late war, owing allegiance to Great Britain, deserted to your standard, and fought against their own Government.

If you adopt this part of the bill, you sanction one of the foulest and most detestable crimes that can be perpetrated by a human being; a crime that strikes deep at the foundation of all Governments, and of civilized society—you sanction treason. Nay, you go a frightful distance beyond this; you embrace the traitor, and give him a rich reward for his crime.

Sir, a nation is styled a moral person; and I do think that we, as the Representatives of this nation, ought never to adopt any measure which, in our private capacity, we would not cordially approve. Surely we are not sent here to legislate against the dictates of our own consciences, and the best feelings of our hearts. Let me ask, then, is there a single person in this honorable committee who would, upon any consideration whatsoever, in private life, encourage and reward a villain for the commission of a base and infamous crime? No, sir. Then let us instantly condemn and reject the proposition before us. In principle it is perverse, in example it would be dangerous.

What is it that makes us admire those instances of conduct recorded in history, where the proffered assistance of treacherous men has been indignantly refused? Let me take a single and familiar instance. What is it that makes us admire the conduct of the Romans, in spurning the proposition of the physician of Pyrrhus, who offered to poison his master, and thereby free the Romans from a most powerful and dreaded enemy? It is that noble and exalted principle in our nature which inspires us, nay, which constrains us, to love great and generous actions wherever we find them. It is that self-same principle which ought, at this moment, irresistibly to impel us to stamp with abhorrence the bill now before the Committee.

It is one of the noblest traits in the character of Lord Thurlow, that, when he was Chancellor of England, he refused to dishonor the great seal of that nation by placing it to the grant of a pension to the infamous Arnold. And shall the seal of this enlightened and virtuous Republic be stamped upon this foul iniquity, this palpable treason? Shall traitors carry with them this high testimony of your approbation? Sir, while you extend your bounty to these faithless foreigners, you corrupt the hearts of your own people. You teach them that fidelity is no virtue, and that treason is no crime. What must they think of the political morality of that Government, which, in one law, denounces against its own citizens the awful punishment of death, for desertion, and in another law, in force at the same time, gives a high reward to the subjects of a foreign nation for having been guilty of the same crime? It does appear to me that such proceedings have a manifest tendency to confound all notions of right and wrong, and to annihilate the very distinctions between vice and virtue.

Gentlemen say they can find precedents in the history of our own Government, to justify this measure. Sir, precedents avail nothing against principle; they can never justify anything radically wrong. If it can be shown that you have heretofore done anything like that which is now proposed, I pray you to repent of the sin you have done, and sin no more.

The honorable gentleman from New York, (Mr. THROOP,) has compared the case of these deserters to the glorious cause of the American Revolution. Need I vindicate your country against this unmerited charge? Shall I offer to show that the illustrious founders of your liberties were not deserters, were not traitors? No, I will not thus degrade them; I will leave their vindication to your own heart, to the hearts of the American people, and to impartial history.

Sir, the honorable Speaker, (Mr. CLAY,) in the fervor of his attachment to this bill, has pronounced a high eulogium on the character and conduct of the late Colonel Wilcox, commander of the corps of Canadian volunteers. He has praised in the highest strains of admiration the imputed virtues of this man, and has ranked him among the most exalted patriots of the earth. He has even censured, with no little severity, the opposers of this bill, who have dared in debate to name this deceased patriot—dared to disturb the ashes of the dead. Sir, let me remind the honorable Speaker, that Wilcox was first named by the friends of this bill, and that his alleged patriotism and devotedness to this country were stated in glowing terms, to influence the decision of this question. Could I believe that the history of this person is correctly understood, I would dwell no longer on the subject, for I war not with the dead. But I am confident that erroneous impressions have been made. I have reason to suspect that many members of this Committee do at this moment believe that he was a native citizen of this country, and that he returned to the United States to fight the battles of the land that gave him birth. It is my duty to put this matter right.

Colonel Wilcox was a native of Ireland—none the worse for that—I love an honest full-hearted Irishman. Having become discontented at home, he abandoned the land of his nativity, and, removing into Upper Canada, established his residence in Newark, where he became the editor of a newspaper, and was elected a member of the Parliament of that province. He was resident in Newark when the late war against Great Britain was declared. Did he then fly to your country, and espouse your cause? No, he took up arms against you. He fought for his King. He was a leader of Canadian militia at the battles of Queenstown and Fort George. His allegiance to his royal master held out until Fort George and Newark were subdued by your arms. Then, when the cause of your enemy was considered desperate, when it was confidently expected that all Canada would soon be in your possession, he deserted his friends, and joined your standard, his sword yet reeking with the blood of your citizens. Such was the man on whom this warm eulogium has been pronounced, and of whom the honorable Speaker was pleased to say, “if Wilcox was guilty of treason, then was your Washington a traitor.” Surely the history of this person was not rightly understood. Sir, I admire the ingenuity of the honorable Speaker—I admire the warmth of his heart—but I regret that his torrent of feeling, his tempest of thought, should have been poured out in praise of such a person, and in support of such claims.

But the plea of retaliation is urged in favor of this bill. It is said that, during the late war, Great Britain attempted to seduce your citizens from their allegiance to your Government. Sir, this is a dangerous plea, and may lead to most disastrous consequences. It ought to be kept constantly in mind, that there is a wide difference between what an enemy may have a right to demand of you, and what your own conscience and the laws of morality may require. If an enemy has been guilty of wanton cruelty toward you—if he has practised seductive arts upon your citizens, or has in any way violated any of those rights which he ought to hold sacred, surely he cannot complain if his own weapons be turned against him. But are you justified, because the guilt of your enemy will not allow him to reproach you? Sir, this doctrine of retaliation has heretofore proved not a little unfortunate for you. It was the plea which our late enemy used as an excuse for the most unfeeling and barbarous conduct. Had it not been for this abominable doctrine, the people of Lewiston and Buffalo might still have been enjoying, in their own houses, the comforts and blessings of domestic life. And had it not been for this wicked doctrine, your once proud and magnificent Capitol might still have been standing, the pride and ornament of your country. Let no one suspect me of wishing to offer the slightest apology for the enemy, for desolating the villages I have named, or for burning the public buildings of this city. No, they were vandal deeds, and my soul detests them. But still more do I detest the odious principle of this bill. He who destroys palaces, and demolishes cities, does an infinitely less injury to the cause of humanity, than he who poisons the fountain of morality, and corrupts the human heart.

But, Mr. Chairman, let it for a moment be granted that we have an unquestionable right to adopt this measure, and that there is no objection to it in point of principle. Still we are bound to inquire, whether it would be politic. I contend that it would be directly the reverse. Pass this bill, sir, and it may hereafter bring wretchedness upon many of the people of this country. The tears of thousands may flow in consequence of the rash and impolitic act. Should we again be involved in war with Great Britain, do you believe that the enemy would forget, or would patiently bear this insult? No, it would kindle in his mind an unquenchable flame of resentment. It would provoke him to the most desperate acts of retaliation. Do you not shudder at the thought that he might excite Ethiopia to stretch forth a desolating hand over some parts of your territory? Even in that case, you could not complain. No, this bill would stare you in the face, and your mouth would be hermetically sealed. You seduced, and armed against your enemy, his own subjects; he, in return excites your slaves to treason and rebellion. Sir, I need not enumerate the calamities that would be consequent upon such a system of retaliation. Your own imagination already calls them up in dreadful array before you.

But we are reminded, that there is another description of persons, whose claims are included in the provisions of this bill. It is stated, that these men were native citizens of the United States; that, with a view to improve their condition, they removed to Canada before the late war, where they became owners of real estate; that, at the commencement of hostilities, they were compelled either to join the standard of that Government, or to fly from the territory of your enemy, and abandon their estates to confiscation; that they preferred the latter course, returned to this country, and joined your armies, in consequence of which their property was confiscated. And they now ask of you indemnification for the losses they have thus sustained.

Sir, admit all these facts, and yet what claims have these refugees on your generosity, or your justice, beyond those of thousands who could be named? Why are they to be preferred to those good citizens, who have constantly remained within your territory, been undeviatingly faithful to your Government, and suffered, in consequence of the war, the severest losses? It is answered, that these refugees have rendered you peculiar and extraordinary services. In attempting to show this fact, the honorable gentleman from New York (Mr. TROUP) has made a statement, which, instead of inclining me to support this bill, excites my indignation against it. He tells you that these refugees, having lived in Canada, became intimately acquainted with the country, and afterwards served as guides to conduct your armies and your scouting parties into different parts of the territory of your enemy. Yes, they did know the country; and how came they to know it? The generous proclamation of the Canadian Government had led them there. They had received lands of the Crown, almost without price. They had formally declared themselves British subjects, and had taken an oath of allegiance to the King. They remained under the protection of their adopted royal master, until his cause in Canada appeared hopeless. Then, forgetting his bounty, spurning the declaration they had made, and the oath they had taken, they fled to your country, and soon appeared leading your armies, and pointing their bayonets against their late neighbors and friends. Sir, every good feeling of my heart rebels against a claim founded on such conduct.

But it is asserted that the faith of the Government is pledged to make good these losses; that your commanders on the Canadian frontier made the pledge, and that you are bound to redeem it. And to put this matter beyond a doubt, the celebrated proclamation of General Hull is introduced. Sir, history speaks of a famous Grecian, who never laughed but once, and that was when he saw an ass muzzling a thistle. But sure I am that grave gentlemen would have laughed at least once more, could he have read this proclamation, and seen it offered as high authority in the Grand Councils of this nation. Do not gentlemen know that the Government have constantly disowned this proclamation, and denied that they ever gave any authority or countenance to it? Have they not condemned to death its author? And does he not now live at the mercy of the President? But I care not whether this ludicrous thing was authorized or not. It does not contain a single word which favors the claims of these refugees. Let us look at that part, on which reliance has been placed. It is this: "In the name of my country, and by authority of my Government, I promise you protection to your persons, properties, and rights." This proclamation was addressed "to the peaceful and unoffending inhabitants of Canada;" they were assured that the General had "a force which would look down all opposition," and were told that they "should be treated as enemies, and should suffer all the calamities of war, if they took part with their Government." It is perfectly manifest, that the object of this address was to prevent the people of Canada from joining the British standard; and it impliedly condemns the course which these refugees pursued. For they were cautioned to remain peaceful, and were promised protection if they did so; but they were not invited to join your armies, or to give any aid or assistance to your cause. Sir, General Hull promised no more to the Canadians, than all great generals engage on entering the territories of their enemy. Bonaparte, when he entered Russia, promised the people protection to their persons and property, if they would remain quiet, and take no part in the contest; and the allied generals made a like engagement to the people of France, when they lately marched into that kingdom.

When it was stated that your commanders on the Canadian line had encouraged these claimants to desert, what said my honorable friend, (Mr. CONNER,) who had acted as the aid of General Dearborn? With the pride of a soldier, and the feelings of a high-minded man, he denied the assertion, and repelled the charge. He declared that such conduct would have been abhorrent to the mind of General Dearborn, and the officers under his command; that they disdained to practise anything but open and honorable warfare.* Where, then, is the proof that Govern-

* The remarks of Mr. Hulbert, of Massachusetts, on the Canadian Volunteer bill, have been published in the Federal Republican. From this statement it might be inferred, as indisposition prevented Mr. Conner from giving his vote on that question, that he was opposed to the passage of the bill; on the contrary, it would have received his cheerful support. The honorable Mr. Throop, of New York, had referred to Colonel Preston's proclamation at Fort Erie, as authority that Major General Dearborn, then commanding on the Niagara frontier, had invited the inhabitants of Canada to join the American standard, or at least to leave the country.

Mr. Conner explained. He said, that at the time alluded to proclamations had become a byword through the nation; they had become ridiculous. It was the intention of General Dearborn to effect what he attempted by the sword, and not by the pen; and had not a most severe illness entirely prevented his personal attention to the concerns of the army, at a time when it was most required, or had not a mere accident, which could not be so well expressed in any other terms, than "a strange fatality," prevented the enemy's destruction at Sandy Creek;—from a minute acquaintance with every particular of the transaction, he knew that General Chandler's arrangements at that point were judicious—his troops formed for battle at the time of attack, and his conduct gallant; as evidence of it, the enemy were completely routed, after having sustained three times the American loss;—had not these unfortunate circumstances intervened, he had no doubt that Upper Canada would have been conquered that campaign. Mr. C. said, that at the time General Dearborn took possession of Fort George, Colonel Preston had just arrived with his command at Fort Erie. The enemy at that post, having masked his retreat under a cannonade, abandoned and demol-ment is under any particular engagement to these refugees? None has been produced, and none exists. Why, then, are they to be preferred to thousands of good honest people, who are daily supplicating us in vain for assistance?

Sir, while you are considering these claims, do you forget the people of Lewiston and Buffalo? Have you forgotten that you brought upon them an enemy, who in the spirit of revenge reduced their villages to ashes? Faithful to your cause, many of these brave and patriotic citizens were fighting the battles of your country, while their houses were in flames, and their wives and children, driven from their homes, were shivering in the storms of winter. Have you extended relief to these good people? No, they have pleaded in vain. You have left them to moisten with their tears the ashes of their dwellings. You have told them that you pitied them, but that justice did not require, and that policy forbade, that you should give them assistance. In like manner have you treated the inhabitants of Havre de Grace, and of other places desolated by the enemy. Sir, you have allowed nothing to the owners of cannon foundries, mills, and ropewalks, which were destroyed by the enemy, because such establishments were peculiarly calculated to assist you in the prosecution of the war. Let me remind you of the case of Jabez Hull, who lately came from Sackett's Harbor to this city, and attended here for weeks, asking for what he considered his just and honest dues. Among other injuries which he sustained in the late war, his dwelling-house was wantonly demolished by your own soldiers, and a part of the bricks converted into ovens for the use of the camp. Yet the Commissioned his works. Colonel Preston took possession of them, and probably from the earnest solicitations of the inhabitants of Buffalo, who knew the wishes and feelings of the inhabitants of Canada, certainly not with the knowledge or by the authority of General Dearborn, he was induced to publish the proclamation alluded to. Mr. C. said, that Colonel Preston was undoubtedly actuated by the purest and most honorable motives. He knew that gentlemen personally: there was not a more gallant and amiable officer in the army; one more loved and respected. No one regretted more than himself the severe wound, which would in a great measure deprive the country of his usefulness. But it was his duty to state, that the proclamation was not authorized or sanctioned by the Commanding General. Mr. C. said, he should vote for the passage of that bill. He believed that with one or two exceptions, the petitioners were natives of the United States, who had moved into Canada, and who wished to remain neutral during the contest. But, he said, a conscription was put in force in that peninsula of the most arbitrary nature; and a non-compliance with which was followed by the most sanguinary consequences; the petitioners were driven to the necessity of plunging their bayonets in the bosoms of their native countrymen or join the American cause, and, under these circumstances, he hoped there never would be an American who would not adopt the same alternative. He hoped that Congress would make an adequate compensation for the severe losses they had sustained, which was called for by every principle of justice and liberality.

mittee of Claims reported against his petition, on the ground that the Government was not bound to afford indemnification for such losses; and the honorable chairman of that committee (Mr. YANCEY) maintained the report by such irresistible arguments, that it was adopted by a large majority of the House, and the applicant returned to his family, disappointed and distressed. Sir, let us not forget a decision which has this day been made. The honorable gentleman from Louisiana (Mr. ROBERTSON) moved an amendment to this same bill, providing relief for all your citizens, who during the late war, without any fault of their own, lost property by the ravages of the enemy. Did you adopt this amendment? No, you instantly rejected it. I beseech you, then, to reject this bill. Let it not be said that these traitors, these refugees, are faring sumptuously at the national table, while, your own citizens, who have constantly adhered to your Government, are left, like dogs, to pick up the crumbs that fall from the same table.

Sir, I do hope for the honor of the nation that this bill will not be passed into a law. I should consider it a foul stain, an indelible blot, on the annals of American legislation.

Mr. GROSVENOR denied the right of these men to compensation in any other character but as soldiers. He would not ask whether they were traitors or not; it was as soldiers they fought, and as soldiers ought to be rewarded; so ought our own citizens who fought also. As, however, they demanded more than as soldiers they could be entitled to, and grounded that demand on their particular merits, it became proper to inquire into the principles upon which they stood forward and made that claim; and those principles when examined would be found such as our nature was abhorrent of. Mr. G. then took a view of the case, not only in its political, but its moral aspect, in both of which the measure and the grounds taken for its defence were, he contended, entirely indefensible. How came it, he asked, that no proposition was made for compensation to our citizens whose property was ravaged, and who never left their country to become the subjects of a monarchy? He contrasted this intended benefaction; first, with the conduct of our Government to our native merchants who happened to be in England in pursuit of their business when the war broke out, and in hastening back again to their country, were pillaged by privateers let loose upon them by Government; and, secondly, with the total disregard exhibited by the Administration to the sufferings of the people of Havre de Grace. He animadverted upon the singularity of the fact, that a claim should be now set up and sustained upon the invitation held out by General Hull, in his proclamation to the people of Upper Canada, though that proclamation was formally disavowed by our Ministers at Ghent; and he put the question, why, if they rewarded those men as deserters, they did not reward all the other deserters that came over also?

GROSVENOR, as did Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. HOPKINSON followed, supporting the motion of Mr. WEBSTER, who supported his motion in a short but forcible speech.

Before the question was taken on the motion to strike out the section, the usual hour of adjournment had arrived; when the Committee rose, reported progress, and obtained leave to sit again.

REMAINS OF GENERAL WASHINGTON.

Mr. HUGER rose, as the House was about to adjourn, and observed: That what he deemed a solemn duty obliged him to claim the indulgence of the House for a few moments. He had been detained by severe indisposition from attending his duties in that body since Saturday last, and, though better, he should not have ventured out to-day but for a piece of information which had accidentally reached him that morning. In glancing his eyes over the papers just brought him, he was struck by certain resolutions published in the Richmond Enquirer, from which it appeared that the Legislature of Virginia had, by an unanimous vote, authorized the Governor of the State to apply to the Honorable Bushrod Washington, to permit the remains of her beloved son, the late General GEORGE WASHINGTON, to be removed and interred near the capital of Virginia. His heart sunk within him, he confessed, on reading those resolutions, and recalling to mind the scenes he had once witnessed, and in which he had personally acted a part on the floor of that Congress, which represented the American nation, on the death of this great man. He had often since thought with astonishment, and more than regret, of the apathy of the American people on this subject. But, although he remembered with the most poignant grief the failure of his exertions, and the far more powerful exertions of some of the best and greatest men who were at that time members of Congress, to get something done worthy of the Father of his Country, and not unworthy of the American nation; yet he had not forgotten that the Sixth Congress had gone so far as to authorize the President of that day to write in behalf of the nation to Mrs. Washington, and to make of her a like request in regard to the remains of our beloved WASHINGTON. Neither had he forgotten the admirable and pathetic letter written by that lady, in which she grants their request. The remains of WASHINGTON then were pledged to the whole nation, and he trusted the time was at length come, when the honors sacredly due to them would be paid, as they ought long ago to have been, by the Representatives of the whole American people. He had himself been a member of that Congress, and one of those who had approved of the application made to Mrs. Washington. He had, moreover, been one of the committee (the only one now honored with a seat on this floor) to whom the subject had been referred, when it had last been before Congress. He did not, therefore, he trusted, assume too much to himself, when he ventured to think, that it had in some degree devolved on him, as a sacred and solemn duty, to call the attention of Congress to this subject at the present time, and under the particular circumstances which he had noticed above. Accordingly, indisposed as he was, he had, without the loss of a single moment, hurried down to the House, and seized the first possible opportunity to offer the resolution he held in his hand. Before he read it to the Chair, he would be permitted to add, that he trusted no gentleman could possibly suppose he meant thereby to express any disapprobation in regard to the resolutions of the Legislature, or to evince the smallest disrespect to the State of Virginia. He was one of the last men in that House to do so. Virginia had been to him, in no small degree, a second alma mater. Though he first drew his breath in the capital of South Carolina, he had passed, during the Revolutionary war, several of his early years in the former State—being exiled from his native State, then in possession of the enemy. He had met everywhere, and from thousands in Virginia, hospitality, kindness, friendship, and he might with propriety add, parental affection and protection. It was impossible all this could ever be erased from his heart, and as he before observed, he had never ceased to regard Virginia as his second alma mater. But South Carolina was not less dear to him, nor could he forget her claims on the present occasion. She formed a portion, and he was bold to say an honorable portion of the great American nation. As such, she had her full interest in the pledge possessed, to the mortal remains of our Father and Chief. As a South Carolinian, therefore, and member of the American family, as well as from the peculiar circumstances connected with his personal situation, being an immediate Representative on the occasion before alluded to, and at the present time of the State of South Carolina, he felt himself imperiously bound to offer the following resolution to the House:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to examine into the proceedings of a former Congress, on the lamented death of the late GEORGE WASHINGTON, and to take into consideration what further measures it may be expedient to adopt at the present time in relation to that sacred and interesting subject.

Before the resolution was disposed of, a motion was made to adjourn, and carried.

SATURDAY, February 17.

On motion of Mr. CADY, the Committee on the Public Lands were instructed to inquire into the expediency of authorizing the officers who are authorized to sell the public lands, to accept from the soldiers to whom land warrants have been or shall be granted, for their services in the late war, such land warrants in part payment for any lands which such soldiers may purchase for the purpose of cultivating the same.

On motion of Mr. ROBERTSON, the Committee on Roads and Canals were instructed to inquire into the expediency of improving the roads between Duck River in the State of Tennessee, and Madisonville, in the Mississippi Territory, by the Cherokee agency; and also, that between Fort Hawkins in the State of Georgia and Fort Stodart.

After some remarks by Mr. PITKIN, explanatory of his views, he offered the following resolution, which was agreed to:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to cause to be laid before this House, information relative to the duties laid on articles imported from the United States into the British provinces of Canada, Nova Scotia, and New Brunswick, and the duties on articles exported to the United States from the said provinces; also relative to duties laid on goods, wares, and merchandise, imported into the British West India islands, or any of them, from the United States, or from colonies in America owned by other foreign European Powers; and information likewise as to the duties on imports and exports, to which vessels of the United States are subject in the ports of the British East Indies.

Mr. PITKIN and Mr. PARRIS were appointed a committee to present the said resolution to the President.

On motion of Mr. JEWETT, the House proceeded to consider the resolution submitted by him yesterday, and the same being again read, was agreed to by the House; and Mr. JEWETT and Mr. THOMAS were appointed a committee to present the said resolution to the President.

REMAINS OF GENERAL WASHINGTON.

On motion of Mr. HUGER, the House proceeded to consider the resolution submitted by him yesterday.

Mr. HUGER made a few remarks in support of the resolution; and called the attention of the House to the correspondence which took place long since between Congress and Mrs. Washington; and the pledge then given to the nation on this interesting subject.

Mr. ROOT, of New York, said he was unwilling for one to agree to the consideration of the resolution, but did not desire to make any remarks against it. He knew, he said, that it was considered political heresy to oppose anything plumed with the name of WASHINGTON, but on this occasion he should disregard that imputation. It had once been attempted to erect a mausoleum, an Egyptian pyramid to him, and he presumed such was the object of the resolution now offered. Such an enterprise he was unwilling to second; not because the fame and virtues of WASHINGTON had less effect on his mind than on others, but because he wished to protect that fame, which he revered. Mr. R. said this resolution declared the fame of WASHINGTON perishable, if a monument of marble be not erected to perpetuate it. Sir, his fame fills the four quarters of the globe, and will survive long after your marble has crumbled to dust. Ære perennis—his fame is more durable than brass or marble. Let his remains slumber on their native plantation; for my part, said Mr. R., I would rather his name should live in history than in marble. Erect a monument to him, and it may at some future day be exposed to the insults of an enemy. We have had one enemy who would not respect an edifice erected to him, nor could his name protect it from destruction; but they cannot reach his fame—can never touch it. By this resolution too, some may be deprived of the exercise of their political devotion. We know that professing devotees who now come here, must make a pilgrimage to Mount Vernon to show their devotion. The expense likewise, said Mr. R., forms a serious objection to such a scheme, and every good and great man hereafter will have a claim to a similar honor. Let us not establish the precedent.

Mr. HUGER said in reply, that in one respect the gentleman was in an error; no expense was now proposed. He had endeavored so to word the resolution as to escape objection. He could not, he said, reconcile it to his mind, as a citizen of this country, longer to neglect those sacred remains. Whether that neglect was right or wrong, he had not said, nor did he intend now to pronounce; but this he could with propriety assert, that the United States are bound to act on the subject in some shape or other, and the object of the resolution was simply to call on them to say what they are willing to do. He was a member of that Congress which gave to the nation a solemn pledge on this subject, and he wished them now to decide whether that pledge was to be redeemed or relinquished. He had not thought of a mausoleum, nor indeed had he contemplated any particular object of that kind. But, because there may be some expense attending it, are Congress to do nothing in a case where they are so sacredly pledged? Sir, said Mr. H., we are called on to act on this subject—a great State has most solemnly called on us. The majority may say, "our father is dead, we are satisfied, let his remains rest;" but if such be the case, let Virginia at once have the honor and glory of providing for them. Unwilling as I am, that any State should possess the venerated remains of WASHINGTON; yet, if we decline it, let his native State do them honor. Nothing has been said by me about a mausoleum or a monument. All I ask is a decision in one way or other; to redeem or reject the pledge given—in that I surely ask nothing wrong.

The resolution was then modified and agreed to by the House as follows, and a committee of seven appointed on the part of this House:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed, to join such committee as may be appointed by the Senate, to examine into the proceedings of a former Congress on the lamented death of the late GEORGE WASHINGTON, and to take into consideration what further measures it may be expedient to adopt at the present time in relation to that solemn and interesting subject.

Messrs. HUGER, SMITH, of Maryland, TALLMADGE, JACKSON, MOORE, CHAMPION, and CONNER, were appointed the committee on the part of this House.

CANADIAN VOLUNTEERS.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill for the relief of the Canadian volunteers; Mr. WEBSTER's motion to strike out the first section (to reject the bill) still under consideration.

Canadian Refugees.

FEBRUARY, 1816.

The debate on this question was resumed and continued with unabated warmth, until near sunset. In this debate the bill was advocated by Messrs. COMSTOCK, ROOF, and ROBERTSON, and opposed by Messrs. HARDIN, SERGEANT, and GROSVENOR. Messrs. JEWETT, and KING, of Massachusetts, also spoke; though hostile to the bill in its present shape, if amended so as to include American citizens only, they would vote for it.

Mr. Comstock spoke as follows:

Mr. Chairman, perhaps prudence dictates me to be silent upon this occasion; but really, sir, I cannot, without doing violence to my feelings, submit to its suggestions.

After the ample and lucid discussion which this subject has received, I cannot have the vanity to suppose it in my power to present it in a more just or correct point of view. And indeed, sir, were I ever so competent, I have too much respect for this honorable body to wish to detain them at this late hour of the day. Coming from that State which the gentleman, upon whose petition the bill before us is predicated, contributed nobly and bravely to defend; yes, sir, coming from that town in which one of these petitioners formerly had the happiness to reside; possessing a knowledge of the fair and honorable character of some of these Canadian refugees, I must be permitted to express my anxious wish that the motion under consideration may be negatived, and that the bill may pass.

Sir, from private citizens, the former neighbors of him whose name appears first on the petition to which I have alluded, as well as from intelligent and respectable officers of the late army; from these unquestionable sources of information, I have derived a knowledge of his conduct and character. As a citizen, he is represented to be gentlemanly and virtuous; as a soldier, honorable and brave. If I am not much mistaken, he is the man who, at the battle of Queenstown, sought and found one of my wounded townsmen, secured him from savage ferocity, poured into his wounds the oil and the wine, and did all that lay in his power to meliorate his condition, and alleviate his sufferings.

With the history of a number of these unfortunate men I am somewhat acquainted; that history is highly creditable to them as citizens and as soldiers. One of your petitioners is respectable in a learned profession. I do not believe, sir, they merit the reproaches which have been lavished upon them by gentlemen with such unmerciful profusion. Mr. Chairman, what is their crime? Antecedent to the late war, when relations of peace and amity subsisted between the Government of Great Britain and this country, these men became adventurers in Canada; there they pursued honest private avocations, to better their fortunes, and to acquire a livelihood for themselves and families. Sir, there was no crime in this; it was perfectly lawful and commendable. We do not learn that, at this time, they were guilty, or even accused of any incendiary proceedings. On the contrary, every part of their conduct, from the best information, indicated the industrious and peaceful citizen. Soon after the commencement of the late war, these petitioners were treated by the administration in Canada with suspicion and unkindness. Some of them, I understand, were arrested, restrained of their liberty, dragged from their families and business, and confined to the precincts of a prison. Deplorable, indeed, must have been their situation; their amiable and tender families deprived of earthly protection, left to mourn the absence of those whose cheering society and kind offices had conduced to supply the wants and alleviate the cares of life; society and kind offices rendered doubly dear and necessary in the stormy and distressing season of hostility. No specific charges, sir, were ever adduced to justify this violent procedure; it was obviously founded on a mere suspicion that these persons were attached to the eternal principles of virtuous liberty. After having endured this bondage and degradation for some time, the devoted objects of jealous and vindictive passion, they were liberated from confinement. Repeated solicitations were made by those oppressed persons for an explicit declaration of the charges against them, which were as often refused. They entertained the opinion that protection and allegiance are of reciprocal obligation. The Provincial Government having practised towards them a cruel and outrageous violation of law and justice, induced a conviction that they no longer owed it any allegiance. To remain in Canada promised nothing but wretchedness and destruction. Every prospect of enjoying happiness and prosperity in that province was annihilated. At this painful crisis, sir, their minds were naturally directed to their native country, whose inhabitants they recollected with fraternal affection; and whose political institutions, founded on the principles of reason and philosophy, invited their respect and admiration. A country, sir, where the human mind seems destined to receive the greatest development and expansion, morality its utmost refinement, and where I believe the undefiled religion of Jesus will be inculcated and embraced with divine power and constancy. Invited through the proclamations of your Generals, as well as from the spirit and tenor of the instructions of the Secretary of War, to Colonel Wilcox, the gallant and lamented leader of their corps, with promises of protection; they joined your standard from the noblest motives. They have fought by your side, assisted in sustaining your eagles on the shores of Canada, acquired laurels, but reduced themselves and families to poverty and distress.

Mr. Chairman, have they committed an unpardonable offence? Shall they find no asylum on this side the grave? Why are they the subjects of obloquy? Why treat them with "scoffs, and scorns, and contumelious taunts?"

Mr. Chairman, the principles of virtue are binding upon us at all times, and upon all occasions. They are of universal and eternal application; in private and public situations we are bound by their sanctions. It is not enough for us to deplore in mere expression the adversity of Proceedings.

a friend; it is not enough for us to say to naked and hungry brethren, be ye clothed and fed. No, sir, it behooves us to evince the nature and degree of our sympathy; to demonstrate the sincerity of our professions, by stretching forth the hand of benevolence to alleviate their sufferings. Let us be just, if not generous, upon this occasion; let us evidence the honest sincerity of our attachment to those who revere the immutable principles of propriety upon which our Republic is predicated.

Mr. Chairman, these petitioners have been likened to assassins. Sir, I deny the justice of the comparison; they are humane and honorable men; they have not invaded the private sanctuary of the citizen to perpetrate foul deeds of cruelty and murder. They have not approached the enemy obliquely; but have met him boldly in front, in open and manly warfare.

We are asked why we would remunerate the losses of these petitioners, and refuse equal justice and liberality to our own citizens. Sir, these petitioners, in entering our service, hazarded more, and have lost more, than even our own citizens. Confiscation of real estate and the halter might have been their fate. The former they have suffered; they have lost all their property; had they been made prisoners, the latter evil, to which they exposed themselves by espousing the cause of the States, would most certainly have been inflicted upon them. But, sir, I would remunerate our citizens for all the losses resulting from the conflagration and ravages of the enemy during the late war.

We went to war for national wrongs and indignities; the war was a common cause; and the burdens and privations consequent upon its prosecution, ought to be, as far as practicable, mutually borne, as the advantages of its issue are universally enjoyed. Because a fellow-citizen has the misfortune to reside on the frontier, where he is exposed to the first onset of the war, and to the predatory incursions of the enemy, I would not leave him to sustain alone the destruction of his property. This is an evil in which every individual of the nation, in my apprehension, ought to participate. I think the people of the interior, whose local situation comparatively exempted them from the dangers and devastations of the war, ought to alleviate the sufferings of the inhabitants of the borders, with pecuniary assistance, by sharing equally with them their losses.

Great and good men have admitted the justice of this principle, and we are abundantly able to carry it into execution.

Mr. Chairman, by granting these petitioners donations of land, you will promote the sale and enhance the value of those belonging to the United States. They will make roads, erect bridges, mills, &c., and form a society which must invite and encourage emigration into the western wilds. Besides, sir, should our pacific relations change and give place to war; should the savage warrior raise his tomahawk in the West, the men for whom this bill provides, possessing gratitude, attachment, and fidelity to the Government, with military talents and experience, will form a useful barrier against his sanguinary assaults.

When Mr. C. had concluded, several motions were made for the Committee to rise, to defer the question to another day, but without success.

The question to strike out the first section was at length put, about five o'clock, and decided in the negative; only twenty-five rising in favor of the motion.

The Committee then rose, reported progress, and the House adjourned.

MONDAY, February 19.

Mr. WARD, of Massachusetts, presented a petition of sundry merchants in the State of Massachusetts, stating, that in consequence of the occupation of Castine, in the district of Penobscot, by the British forces during the late war, they entered their goods at the port of Hamden, in said district, which was not established as a port of entry, in consequence of which the said goods have been seized and libelled by the revenue officers, and praying the interposition of Congress.—Referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. KING, of Massachusetts, presented a petition of Joseph Cutts, setting forth that he paid to the collector of the port of York, in the District of Maine, the amount due by him on several custom-house bonds, and that the said collector has since absconded, and, having neglected to cancel the said bonds, he has been sued, and judgment recovered against him by the United States, and praying relief in the premises.—Referred to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. ROBERTSON presented a petition of sundry inhabitants of the State of Louisiana, praying a confirmation of all Spanish grants, warrants, and orders of survey, of lands lying within that part of the late district of West Florida embraced within the State of Louisiana, and which were issued prior to the taking possession of that country by the United States.—Referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

Mr. EASTON presented a petition of the Legislature of the Territory of Missouri, stating that in the Winter of 1812 the frontier inhabitants, at the request of Governor Howard, erected forts along the extensive frontier of the Territory, furnished the same with arms and ammunition at their own expense, and defended the same, and praying a donation of lands as a compensation.—Referred to Mr. EASTON, Mr. McLEAN of Kentucky, Mr. ALEXANDER, Mr. JEWETT, and Mr. VOSE.

Mr. YANCEY, from the Committee of Claims, made a report on the petition of Peter Audrain, which was read; when Mr. Y. reported a bill for the relief of Peter Audrain; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. YANCEY also made a report on the bill from the Senate "for the relief of Edward Barry and George Hodge;" which was read, and, together with the bill, committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. PLEASANTS, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to which has been referred the petitions of sundry persons who were wounded at Dartmoor prison, in England, reported a bill placing certain persons on the list of navy pensioners; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the whole House to-morrow.

Mr. PLEASANTS also reported a bill authorizing the payment of a sum of money to John T. Courtney and Samuel Harrison, or their legal representatives; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole to-morrow.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, enclosing his report made in obedience to a resolution of the 14th instant, respecting the duties paid on the tonnage of British vessels entering the ports of the United States, with cargoes from the British West Indies; which were read, and ordered to lie on the table.

On motion of Mr. WEBSTER, a committee was appointed to inquire into the state of the incorporated banks within the District of Columbia, so far as such inquiry may be consistent with the privileges of their respective charters; and also to inquire into the number of unincorporated banking associations which exist within the said District, and the rules and principles of such associations, and to ascertain as near as may be the amount of bills by them issued, their ability to redeem the same, and to make a report to this House.

Mr. WEBSTER, Mr. CALHOUN, Mr. PLEASANTS, Mr. DESHA, and Mr. YATES, were appointed a committee pursuant to the said resolution.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill of this House, entitled "An act for the relief of John Redman Coxe," with an amendment, in which they desire the concurrence of this House.

PETITION OF TAYLOR AND McNEAL, &c.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a report from the Secretary of War, on the petition of Taylor and McNeal and others; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.—The report is as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT, Feb. 16, 1816.

SIR: In obedience to the order of the House of Representatives of the 6th instant, referring the petition of Taylor and McNeal and others to this Department, I have the honor to state:

That, in all cases where losses have been incurred by the application of private property to public purposes by military commanders, under circumstances which, in the opinion of the Executive, justified the act, indemnity is considered within the legitimate powers of the War Department.

Had the case of the petitioners been founded upon a proceeding purely military, under the principle here stated, satisfaction would have been made. It appears, however, that the application of private property to public purposes, in this case, has been made by a body of citizens, acting as a committee of vigilance, who, in that capacity, were not subject to the military orders of the Commanding General.

The claim for redress is not weakened by this circumstance; but the petitioners must obtain that redress from the Legislature, which is competent to afford it.

Under an act of Congress bearing date the 16th of July, 1813, the sum of $250,000 was appropriated for the purpose of hiring or purchasing hulks to be sunk in such ports or harbor as should be menaced by the enemy. This appropriation was considered as forming a part of that for fortifications, and has been applied partly to its legitimate object, and the remainder, together with other sums under that head of appropriation, has been transferred to the head of subsistence, and exhausted upon that object.

A liberal construction of this act, did the fund yet exist, might embrace the case of the petitioners. An appropriation for this object is, therefore, indispensable, if relief is intended to be given.

I have the honor to be your most obedient and very humble servant,

WM. H. CRAWFORD.

HON. HENRY CLAY,

Speaker of the House of Reps.

CONTESTED ELECTION.

Mr. TAYLOR, of New York, from the Committee of Elections, made a report on the petition of Robert Porterfield, contesting the seat of William McCoy, one of the members of this House for the State of Virginia; which was referred to a Committee of the whole House on Monday next.

The report is as follows:

That, at the last election in Virginia, the petitioner and sitting member were opposing candidates in the Congressional district composed of the counties of Augusta, Rockingham, Pendleton, and Bath. The whole number of votes given in the district were 2,378, of which 1,213 were returned for the sitting member, and 1,165 for the petitioner. One of the votes given for the sitting member was, by mistake, set down and returned for the petitioner; and three votes offered to be given for the sitting member were improperly rejected by the sheriff, and have been added to his poll by the committee. From these facts, it appears that the sitting member's majority amounts to fifty-three votes. But, of the votes given at the said election, 745 were objected against as illegal; of which 390 were given for the petitioner, and 355 for the sitting member. The committee have carefully investigated the titles upon which the said votes were given, and find that there are upon the polls of the petitioner 171, and of the sitting member 149 illegal votes. The difference between these numbers being added to the 53 votes above mentioned, gives to the sitting member a majority of 75 over the petitioner. The election in the said district commenced in the county of Pendleton on the 4th, and closed in the county of Augusta on the 24th day of April last. On the next day the petitioner caused a notice, in writing, to be served on the sitting member, communicating the intention of contesting his election. On the 22d day of May the petitioner served on the sitting member a list of votes, to the legality of which he objected; on the 9th of June the sitting member served a similar list on the petitioner, and invited him to a speedy commencement of the investigation. On the 22d of August the petitioner notified the sitting member of his intention to commence the investigation on the 4th of September then next, at the court-house in the county of Augusta, and to proceed with as little delay as circumstances would admit to the other counties in the district. the last mentioned day the sitting member caused to be delivered to the petitioner a protest, in writing, against the legality of his proceedings, and declined attending accordingly. The petitioner proceeded to take testimony in support of his votes, pursuant to the notice. Upon these facts the sitting member contended that the committee ought not to receive the testimony so taken; first, because it had not been taken within the period limited for that purpose in contested elections for members of the General Assembly of the Commonwealth of Virginia; and second, because the delay of the petitioner in commencing the investigation for more than four months, was unreasonable, and ought not to be allowed.

The committee overruled these objections, and admitted the evidence.

Upon proceeding to a scrutiny of the votes in the county of Rockingham, the petitioner contended that the whole poll ought to be rejected.

1st. Because the election commenced in his absence.

2d. Because the four clerks or writers appointed by the sheriff to keep the poll were not sworn previous to the commencement of the voting, "that they would take the poll fairly and impartially;" but, on the next day after the election, examined and subscribed the poll, and made affidavit thereon, "that the same did contain a just and true account of all the votes taken at the said election, to the best of their knowledge and belief."

3d. Because the names of the voters were not written under the names of the candidates in separate columns, but in the same column, and the votes carried forward and marked under the names of the candidates for whom they respectively voted; and,

4th. Because great noise and confusion prevailed at the election, without any effectual attempt by the sheriff to prevent it.

The first and fourth of these objections were not supported by evidence; the second and third were overruled by the committee. In regard to the second objection, it was proved by the affidavit of two of the clerks who kept the poll, "that although they were not sworn before the voting commenced, yet they conducted their poll-book under the impression that they would be sworn after the polls were closed, and that this had been the most usual custom in the county of Rockingham." In regard to the third objection, it not only was proved that it had been usual to keep the poll in that manner in the county of Rockingham, but the poll in the county of Pendleton, where the election commenced, and in which the petitioner had a majority of the votes, was kept in the same manner, and was not impeached by either party. The errors specified in these objections, in the judgment of the committee, relate more to form than substance. It was not alleged or pretended that the final result had been in anywise varied in consequence of a deviation in these particulars from the letter of the law regulating elections.

In the course of the investigation, the sitting member applied to the committee for permission to avail himself of an agreement entered into between him and the petitioner at the election in the county of Pendleton, to the following effect: That votes should be admitted on title bonds for a sufficient quantity of land, accompanied with a possession of six months; that persons having a right to vote in one county, but happening to be at an election in another county of the same district, might vote in such other county, and that votes of persons residing out of the district should not be admitted. The petitioner admitted such agreement to have been made, but contended that he was absolved from its obligation, because the sitting member had admitted the votes of two or more persons not residing within the limits of the Congressional district to be entered on his poll and counted among his votes. This allegation was denied by the sitting member.

The committee being of opinion that the agreement of the parties could not either diminish or enlarge the elective franchise as secured to the freeholders of the district, by the laws of the Commonwealth, decided,

1st. That the votes of the freeholders residing out of the district, but having competent estate and possessions within it, be held legal.

2d. That all votes not given in the county where the land upon which they were respectively given was situate, be rejected; and,

3d. That all votes given by virtue of title bonds, not conveying a legal freehold estate, be rejected.

The committee further decided,

1st. That all votes recorded on the poll lists should be presumed good, unless impeached by evidence.

2d. That certified copies of the commissioner's books or land lists should be read in evidence, and deemed satisfactory as to the qualification or disqualification of voters, unless corrected by other evidence;* and,

3d. That the affidavit of a voter taken before competent authority, in pursuance of regular and sufficient notice, should be read in evidence to prove his title to vote.

The committee deem it proper to report to the House these decisions, by which it has been regulated in conducting the investigation, and respectfully submit the following resolution:

"Resolved, That William McCoy is entitled to a seat in this House."

The Committee of Elections were discharged from the further consideration of the documents heretofore presented and referred to them in relation to the election of George Baer.—They were laid on the table.

COMMERCE WITH GREAT BRITAIN.

Mr. FORSYTH, from the managers on the part of this House, at the conference with the managers on the part of the Senate, upon the subject-matter of the disagreeing votes of the two Houses upon the bill, from the Senate, "concerning the convention to regulate the commerce between the territories of the United States and His Britannic Majesty," made a report, which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.—The report is as follows:

The committee appointed to confer with the committee of the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses, upon the bill concerning the convention to regulate the commerce between the Territories of the United States and His Britannic Majesty; submit to the House a report of the result of their conference.

For the consideration of the committee of the Senate, they presented, in pursuance of the duty assigned to them, and for the reasons therein mentioned, a statement in writing, to the following effect :

"The committee appointed on the part of the House of Representatives to confer with a committee of the Senate, on the subject of the disagreement of the latter to certain amendments proposed by the House, to a bill from the Senate, entitled "A bill concerning the convention to regulate the commerce between the Territories of the United States and His Britannic Majesty," with a view to guard against misapprehension, to give greater precision to discussions of the conference, and to reduce, into as narrow a compass as possible, the points of difference between the two branches of the legislative body, have deemed it advisable to submit to the committee of the Senate, the reasons which have governed the House in its determinations, in the shape of a written communication.

"It is not to be concealed that the disagreement between the two Houses has originated in a question in relation to their respective Constitutional powers; but the committee of the House of Representatives is not without a hope that the diversity of opinion on this interesting and important question is not so material (at least in its operation upon the specific subject before the legislative body) as at first view it might appear. Without entering upon an extensive inquiry in relation to the treaty-making power, the committee will venture to define, as accurately as they can, the real line which at present divides the contending parties. It is of less importance to ascertain how far they have heretofore disagreed, or may hereafter differ, than to discover what it is precisely that now divides them.

"In the performance of this duty the committee of the House of Representatives are inclined to hope that it will sufficiently appear, that there is no irreconcilable difference between the two branches of the Legislature.

"They are persuaded that the House of Representatives does not assert the pretension that no treaty can be made without their assent; nor do they contend that in all cases legislative aid is indispensably necessary, either to give validity to a treaty, or to carry it into execution. On the contrary, they are believed to admit, that to some, nay many treaties, no legislative sanction is required, no legislative aid is necessary.

"On the other hand, the committee are not less satisfied that it is by no means the intention of the Senate to assert the treaty-making power to be in all cases independent of the legislative authority. So far from it, that they are believed to acknowledge the necessity of legislative enactment to carry into execution all treaties which contain stipulations requiring appropriations, or which might bind the nation to lay taxes, to raise armies, to support navies, to grant subsidies, to create States, or to cede territory; if indeed this power exists in the Government at all. In some or all of these cases, and probably in many others, it is conceived to be admitted, that the legislative body must act, in order to give effect and operation to a treaty; and if in any case it be necessary, it may confidently be asserted that there is no difference in principle between the Houses; the difference is only in the application of the principle. For if, as has been stated, the House of Representatives contend that their aid is only in some cases necessary, and if the Senate admit that in some cases it is necessary, the inference is irresistible, that the only question in each case that presents itself is, whether it be one of the cases in which legislative provision is requisite for preserving the national faith, or not.

"This appears to the committee to be by no means an unimportant point gained. Its influence upon the feelings with which the two bodies will naturally approach questions of this description may be of no trivial consequence; for, as every case, according to this course of reasoning, would appear to rest upon its own foundation, there is less danger of its being drawn into precedent, and therefore less occasion for solicitude in regard to it. It is a view of the subject therefore calculated to harmonize, and to enable us to yield at all times to the application of another principle which the committee deem of the utmost consideration on all such occasions.

"The committee allude to the principle which inculcates the propriety of always taking care, if we do err, to err on the safe side. Should Congress fail to legislate where legislation is necessary, either the public faith must be broken, or, to avoid that evil, the executive branch of the Government must be tempted to overstep the boundaries prescribed by the Constitution. If, on the contrary, Congress should legislate where legislation is not necessary, the act could only be drawn into precedent in a case precisely similar; because, upon the principle assumed, "that each rests upon its own circumstances," it never could serve as a precedent, save where those circumstances are the same. Nor is it indeed unimportant to mention that there is little danger of much respect being paid to precedents upon great Constitutional questions. Conscience will always burst the trammels of precedent, unless restrained by reason.

"The committee therefore believe that it is safer, in every doubtful case, to legislate, and by the joint act of the whole Congress, to give authority to the execution of the stipulations of a treaty by the Executive, than to leave a doubtful case, without the sanction of the Legislature, to tempt the Executive to overleap its proper bounds, or to endanger the public faith by a failure to perform the provisions of a treaty which has received a Constitutional ratification. The very case under discussion may furnish us with an instance. The Senate believe legislation unnecessary. The House regard it as indispensable. What is the opinion of the President? Should he believe a law necessary, and should no law pass, he would be reduced to the alternative of breaking the Constitution or the treaty. He must either set at naught the supreme law of the land, or jeopardize the national faith and the national peace.

"It is of importance, too, to consider that if the legislative body, from the considerations above suggested, should legislate in every doubtful case, there would in all cases be less danger of a former proceeding being drawn into precedent; so that the committee are sanguine in the belief, that while such a course is calculated to avoid difficulties, on the one hand, it has no tendency to increase them on the other.

"The committee perceive, with satisfaction, that on the present occasion the two Houses appear to have approximated in their opinions, and that, as far as can be discerned, the Senate are disposed to act upon the liberal principles that have been suggested. They allude to the passage of the bill in question by that body, in its original form—an act which manifests unequivocally the conviction of the Senate, either that the late convention does require legislative aid to effectuate its provisions, or that the case is at least doubtful, and that in doubtful cases they ought to lean in favor of legislation.

“Both Houses having thus united in the opinion that a legislative act is necessary, the Senate having clearly assented to the propriety of passing a law, the committee waive any argument on the necessity of a legislative act. It only remains to consider whether the scheme of the House of Representatives, or the bill of the Senate, is best calculated to effect the object of legislation. The committee will succinctly offer the reasons which, as they believe, support the correctness of the amendments of the House of Representatives.

“The first amendment proposed, is to strike out the word ‘declared,’ the insertion of which, in the enacting clause of the law, has not appeared to the House to be justified by the usages of the legislative body. The committee are not at liberty to divine what may have been the reasons which prompted its insertion, and until those reasons shall be detailed by the committee of the Senate, if indeed the use of the term originated in any particular motive, they do not feel disposed to enter at random upon their examination. It forms, in their estimation, a sufficient objection to the phraseology alluded to, that it departs from the accustomed style of the acts of the Congress of the United States.

“The second amendment consists in a substitution of provisions, in some detail, for the general and indefinite terms of the bill from the Senate. The committee will suggest the following deficiencies in the bill, which are believed to be supplied by the amendments:

“1. The original bill from the Senate is defective, because it wants a commencing clause; for though it be true that a commencing clause is not always necessary, yet it is certainly requisite where an act is intended to have a retrospective operation. If this act, then, be necessary at all, it is as necessary that it should operate on cases that have happened heretofore as hereafter; but without a commencing clause (such as is introduced into the amendments) it cannot operate on cases which have happened since December 22d, and before the act passes. Here then is one deficiency that it has been attempted to supply.

“2. The original act has no clause of limitation. It amounts to an actual and permanent repeal forever of the acts in conflict with the treaty; instead of operating as a suspension or repeal of them during the term of four years, as stipulated by the convention. Here then is a second defect, which it has been attempted to supply by the amendment.

“3. The committee believe it most advisable, in legislating upon the subject of this convention, that the act should be less general in its phraseology than the bill, as it originally passed the Senate. Instead of a general declaration, that “all acts contrary to the convention should be deemed to be of no effect,” the House of Representatives have supposed it more advisable to adopt provisions more definite and specific. It has been supposed, indeed, to be peculiarly necessary in the present case; for, as one of the reasons which appeared to them to induce the necessity of a law was founded in the supposed legislative discretion to produce the stipulated equalization, either by raising American tonnage and duties, or taking off the additional tonnage and duties from British vessels, it appeared to the House, and does also appear to the committee, that the legislative provision should on this subject be less general than the bill passed by the Senate. An act merely repealing all laws in conflict with the convention might leave to construction what ought rather to be ascertained by law; and the House and its committee have not, therefore, hesitated to prefer what was most certain, to what is least so.

“Because, therefore, the bill from the Senate appears to the House, and to this committee, defective, in wanting a proper commencing clause; in the omission to limit it to a period of four years, in conformity with the convention; and in the want of a sufficient certainty and definite provision; and because a term has been inserted in the enacting clause unusual and unaccustomed in the acts of this Legislature;

“The House of Representatives and this committee prefer the bill, as amended, to the bill in its original form, as passed by the Senate.”

The committee of the Senate declined pursuing this mode of communication, as unusual, and calculated, in their belief, rather to defeat than to promote the object of the conference, an agreement between the two bodies on the subject of dispute. Willing, however, to consider the statement after it was read, as if made in the ordinary form, they proceeded to explain the opinions of the Senate on the points of difference.

Without attempting to follow the course of the observations pursued by the committee of the Senate, it will probably be deemed sufficient to state the general impression made by them.

Your committee understood the committee of the Senate to admit the principle, contended for by the House, that whilst some treaties might not require, others may require, legislative provision to carry them into effect.

That the decision of the question, how far such provision was necessary, must be founded upon the peculiar character of the treaty itself. As to the late convention, the immediate subject of controversy, the Senate doubted whether any act of legislation was necessary, but since it was deemed important by the House that an act should be passed, they had no objection to give it their sanction; provided a precedent was not established, binding them hereafter to assist in passing laws, in cases on which such doubts might not exist.

With these views, on the part of the Senate, their committee proposed such an alteration of the bill of the Senate, as would obviate the several objections urged by your committee, excepting that which was suggested to the introduction of the words “and declared,” in the enacting clause. The retention of these words was considered by the Senate expedient, with a view of giving to the bill a declaratory, as well as an enacting form. It was said also, that they were not unprecedented, they were to be found in the acts of Congress not declaratory in their nature, and might be considered as not affecting the character of the present bill.

Believing that these words are mere surplusage, not changing the character, or impairing the force, of the legislative act; that they have been introduced into previous acts of Congress; that no agreement could take place between the two Houses, without permitting them to remain, your committee consented to recommend to the House to recede from the first amendment to the Senate's bill, and to agree to the following modifications of it, in place of the amendments previously adopted:

Line 2d, after the word "act," strike out the words "or acts as is," and insert these words, "as imposes a higher duty of tonnage or of impost on vessels, and articles imported in vessels of Great Britain, than on vessels, and articles imported in vessels of the United States."

Line 4th, strike out the word "shall," and after the word "be," insert the words "from and after the date of the ratification of the said convention, and during the continuance thereof."

LOAN OFFICE CERTIFICATES.

Mr. TALLMADGE, from the committee appointed on the petition of John Delafield, made a report thereon, which was read; when Mr. T. reported a bill for the relief of John Delafield; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.—The report is as follows:

That the petitioner prays that the specie value of forty-three loan office certificates, of four hundred dollars each, amounting to twelve thousand one hundred and forty-eight and thirteen-ninths dollars, with the interest which has accrued upon the nominal amount of said certificates, be funded according to law, as in such case made and provided.

This claim having originated in 1777, and being attended with special circumstances, the committee have deemed it their duty to give it a particular investigation, the result of which they now submit to this House, together with their opinion thereon.

It appears that these certificates are a part of thirteen millions of dollars authorized to be raised, on loan office certificates, by a resolution of Congress of 22d February, 1777, and which were to be signed either by Michael Hillegas, Treasurer, or Samuel Hillegas, and to be countersigned, agreeably to the resolutions of Congress of 3d October, 1776, and 15th January, 1777. The resolution of October states, "that, for the convenience of lenders, a loan office shall be established in each of the United States, and a commissioner, to superintend such office, be appointed by the said States, respectively, who are to be responsible for the faithful discharge of their duty in the said offices." The same resolution made it necessary that the said loan office certificates should be countersigned by the said commissioner of loans.

In the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, dated the 28th day of March, 1792, much stress is laid on the circumstance that E. Davies was not the commissioner of loans for the State of Georgia, but that he countersigned those certificates by order of Governor Treutlen. Supposing this to be the fact, it does not appear conclusively to follow that the certificates in question ought to be rejected, inasmuch as they are admitted to be genuine, and regularly issued from the loan office of the United States, and, as will hereafter more fully appear, it being highly probable that no commissioner of loans was in office within the State of Georgia when these certificates were issued.

It appears, by the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, dated the 23d of December, 1795, that the certificates under consideration form a part of $200,000, sent from the Treasury on the 24th of September, 1777, to Georgia, under the care of a Captain Medici, and intended for the loan officers there, who were at that time, and long after, (as is stated in said report,) O'Bryan and Wade; that they were countersigned by E. Davies, by order of J. A. Treutlen, Governor of Georgia. The Secretary of the Treasury further states, that "E. Davies was not known as an officer of the United States, but was a temporary agent of Georgia, employed to purchase a quantity of Indian goods; and, to enable him to effect that object, a sum was placed in his hands, in certificates, which, by an order of council, he was authorized to issue; and that these probably were the certificates now under consideration."

From the most thorough investigation of this subject, your committee have not been able to ascertain the fact, that O'Bryan and Wade were loan officers for the State of Georgia in the year 1777; but, from other sources of information, it would seem most probable that no such officers were in commission and executing the duties of that office prior to the year 1779.

In answer to some queries stated by the chairman of your committee to Joseph Nourse, Register of the Treasury, he remarks, "that William Govett, his predecessor, opened an account in leger A, folio 214, entitled '____ Commissioners' loan office, State of Georgia, account current,' leaving a blank for the names of the commissioners;" that the same account obtained a credit, March 18, 1778, for $202,423; and that he filled up the blank left for their names, 4th September, 1710. He also states that, to the best of his recollection, O'Bryan and Wade were in office 10th May, 1779, when he entered the Treasury office as Assistant Auditor General. To the question stated by the committee, "Are O'Bryan and Wade charged with the two hundred thousand dollars alluded to in Mr. Wolcott's report?" (1795,) the Register answers, "They are charged with that sum on the 22d of November, 1781; but it appears, by the report of the Auditor of the Treasury, dated 19th January, 1795, that they were transmitted on the 24th of September, 1777, when the record might have been made, had Mr. Govett been possessed of the voucher upon which I afterwards made the record." It appears that, at the time these certificates were sent from the Treasury, Congress were removing from Philadelphia to Lancaster, where they sat one day, and adjourned to Yorktown.

It also appears that the Governor of Georgia drew drafts upon the delegates of that State in Congress for $19,000, for the purpose of recruiting Continental troops, which were paid by that body 1st September, 1777; and that Governor Treutlen drew another draft on the Continental Treasurer for $500, for expenses for recruiting a company of light-horse for the benefit of that State, which was paid 10th October, 1777, and was to be considered as a part of the $300,000 appropriated for supplying the military chest of Georgia.

It further appears to the committee that, in March, 1780, William Smith, of Baltimore, applied to Congress for the payment of interest on the loan office certificates held by him, and which were issued on the same day, and in the same manner, as those now under consideration. The committee to whom his application was referred report, as their opinion, "that the said interest cannot be regularly discharged, except by the person who is possessed of the books of the office, and by whom alone they can be checked; and as the Government is now again in operation, and it cannot be doubted that the business of the loan office is revived and regularly carried on, the certificates ought to be presented there." The sum of $6,300,000 was raised on bills of exchange on the Commissioners of the United States in Paris, 19th May, 1778, to pay the interest of that class of loan office certificates as were entitled to receive it in such bills.

FEBRUARY, 1816.

Loan Office Certificates.

H. OF R.

On the 3d of August, 1780, (the same year that Mr. Smith was referred to the loan office in Georgia,) $456,000, in bills on Paris, were prepared to pay interest on loan office certificates. On the same day Congress ordered the loan office of Georgia to be removed to some place of safety, as contiguous as possible to the State, until it could be re-established with convenience and safety; and that, until such office be so fixed, and public notice given thereof, the Treasurer of the United States be empowered to pay all interest due, &c., on certificates issued from that office, in the same manner that such interest is directed to be paid by the Commissioners of the Continental loan offices.

In obedience to this resolution of Congress, interest was paid by the Treasurer of the United States on these certificates, in bills of exchange, from 23d December, 1777, to the 23d December, 1781, who endorsed the same on the back of each certificate, in his own handwriting, and sanctioned the act by his official signature.

That these certificates belong to that class, the interest upon which was to be paid in bills of exchange, appears by a resolution of Congress of the 10th of September, 1777.

The committee further report, that these certificates were deposited in the office of the Auditor of the Treasury, pursuant to an act of Congress of the 12th of February, 1793, on the 18th day of April, 1794, and, consequently, are not barred by any law of limitation.

As far as the committee have been able to ascertain the fact, there appears to be but seventy-six of the description of certificates under consideration outstanding.

Whether the certificates of the residue of the $200,000, sent by Captain Medici, (amounting to $169,600,) were bought in by the loan officers of Georgia, or whether they have been returned and cancelled at the Treasury board, or funded, cannot be ascertained, as all the old papers relating to the settlement of accounts between the United States and Georgia were burnt in August, 1814, by the enemy.

By the report of 1795, it appears probable that the certificates were employed in the purchase of Indian goods for the State of Georgia. And from the certificate of Mr. Farrell, of the Auditor's office, it appears that that State, "in her accounts exhibited against the United States, got credit for various articles delivered out of a public store." It is, therefore, highly probable that these certificates were appropriated to furnish supplies for such public store.

It further appears to your committee, that repeated applications have been made by the holders of this description of public securities to Congress, and upon which no positive decision has been made. The subject, therefore, is fairly open for legislative interference.

In making up their opinion, the committee have considered the situation of the United States, and particularly that of the State of Georgia, at the time these certificates were issued. In 1776 South Carolina was invaded; in 1777 Georgia was subject to the predatory incursions of the enemy from East Florida, to prevent which they carried on an expedition against that country, under Major General Robert Howe, which proved unsuccessful; and in 1778 Georgia was invaded, and its capital taken. (Lee's Memoirs, 1 vol., pp. 68, 69, 70.)

When the committee reflect upon the general confusion and distress of that day; when they consider that the public safety required "that a great number of individuals be necessarily invested with the power of binding the public by their contracts;" and when it is not to be denied that "almost every officer of the army, whether in the Commissary's department or otherwise, in different stages of the war, had it in his power to contract debts legally or equitably binding upon the United States;" and when the committee give due weight to these facts, they do not hesitate to believe that the act of Governor Treutlen, in issuing these certificates, was known and sanctioned by Congress, which abundantly accounts for the conduct of the Treasurer (who issued them) in recognising their correctness and validity.

As the principal and a part of the interest due on these certificates have never been paid, and as no fraud whatever is imputed, the committee consider the faith of the United States as solemnly pledged for their redemption or payment, and that the prayer of the petitioner ought to be granted.

They have therefore directed their chairman to ask for leave to bring in a bill for that purpose.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,

March 28, 1792.

The Secretary of the Treasury, to whom was referred the petition of William Smith, of Baltimore town, in the State of Maryland, respectfully submits the following report:

The resolutions of the United States in Congress assembled, which respect the issuing of the certificates commonly called loan office certificates, make it necessary that they should be previously countersigned by certain officers denominated Commissioners of Loans, who were to be appointed under the authority of the particular States.

After diligent inquiry within the State of Georgia no evidence has been obtained, either of the appointment of E. Davies (the person by whom the certificates in question were countersigned) to the office of commissioner of loans for that State, or that he was ever known or reputed to have acted in that capacity. The reverse of this, indeed, appears from various communications to the Treasury; copies and extracts of which are contained in the schedule herewith transmitted. It is to be remarked, that E. Davies does not even style himself Commissioner of Loans; but, instead of this, adds to his signature the words, "by order of J. A. Treutlen, Governor of Georgia."

The certificates, however, are signed by the proper officer, and all such as have appeared are genuine; and interest, as alleged in the petition, has been paid upon them by the late Treasurer of the United States, as in other cases. A number of those certificates have been offered to the present commissioner of loans for the State of Georgia, to be subscribed pursuant to the act making provision for the debt of the United States, and, upon a reference to the Treasury by that officer, have been directed to be refused.

The reasons for this direction are substantially as follows:

The certificates in question having been irregularly issued, and without the requisites prescribed by the acts of Congress, were, of course, in the first instance, not obligatory upon the United States.

The subsequent payment of interest upon them by an Executive officer, without the sanction of any order or resolution of Congress, could not confer validity upon a claim originally destitute of it, though it might occasion hardship to individuals who, upon the credit of that payment, may have been induced to become possessors of those certificates for valuable consideration.

There are examples of the payment of interest, by the mistakes of public officers, upon counterfeit and forged certificates. It seems to be clear that such payments cannot render valid or obligatory certificates of that description; and yet a similar hardship to those which have been mentioned would attend those who may have afterwards become possessed of them for valuable consideration; nor does there occur any distinction between the effect of such payment in the one and in the other case.

Between individuals, the payment of interest by an agent, upon the presumed but not real obligation of his principal, either through mistake or otherwise, without special authority of the principal, could certainly give no new validity to such an obligation; and the same rules of right govern cases between the public and individuals.

These considerations were deemed conclusive against the admission of those certificates under the powers vested in the officers of the Treasury. It remains for the Legislature to decide how far these are considerations strong enough to induce a special interposition in their favor. In making this decision the following circumstances will, it is presumed, appear to deserve attention:

The present is not a case of mere informality; there is no evidence that the certificates were issued for any purpose of the United States. The contrary, indeed, is stated to be the fact.

Their amount is not positively ascertained; no account of the issues having ever been rendered, though there is no appearance of any considerable sums being afloat.

All which is respectfully submitted.

MAY 17, 1791.

I have the honor of enclosing you the affidavit of Mr. John Wereat, Auditor of this State, respecting the late Edward Davies, who issued sundry loan office certificates without, I believe, any authority, as I can receive no answer from our Governor, to whom I wrote long since, on this subject. I have requested Mr. William Houston, who is gone to Augusta, to endeavor to find out by the public records whether Mr. Davies had any appointment or not.

Mr. O'Bryan, Mr. Wade, and Mr. Davies are all dead.

GEORGIA, Chatham county:

Personally appeared John Wereat, Auditor for the said State, who, after being duly sworn, said: That he well knew Edward Davies, Esq., formerly of the city of Savannah, in the said State; and, further, this deponent verily believes that the said Edward Davies never was at any time loan officer for the State aforesaid, as your deponent constantly resided here, and was well acquainted with all the officers of Government, except when the British forces had possession of the country; and further saith not.

AUGUST, 31, 1791.

Herewith you will receive thirty-three loan office certificates, which I have examined, and believe them genuine; the five last in the abstract, which were issued by Edward Davies, I do not, however, think should be received, for the reasons assigned in my former letter to the Secretary of the Treasury, and the late Auditor. I applied to Mr. Steick (the gentleman I mentioned in my letter to Mr. Wolcott, dated the 20th ultimo,) for a copy of the Order of Council, which he said he had. I now enclose you his answer; which you will please to show to the Secretary of the Treasury.

SAVANNAH, August 31, 1791.

SIR: Agreeably to your request, I made search among my papers for the order of the Executive of the year 1777, authorizing Edward Davies and Thomas Stone to make a purchase of goods from a Captain Farquhar, but cannot find it. As well as my recollection serves me, it was to the following effect: that they, the said commissioners, were directed to purchase, and pledge the faith of the State for the payment, either in indigo at the Carolina price, or in loan office certificates, which were then expected from Congress. The contract was concluded, and the goods delivered by Farquhar to Davies. When the loan office certificates arrived, the Governor paid Mr. Davies ten thousand pounds, or something near that sum, which it was expected would be paid to Farquhar or his agent; this was not done. Davies kept the goods and certificates, and did not before his death account with the State for either. These certificates can very easily be ascertained, as they are countersigned by Edward Davies, by direction of John Adam Treutlen, as Governor.

I am, &c.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, Jan 9, 1816.

SIR: In answer to the inquiries contained in your letter of the 4th instant, relating to certain loan office certificates belonging to John Delafield, and referred to in his petition, a copy of which was enclosed in your letter, I have the honor to state:

1. That the certificates (if they are of the description supposed, as they are not sufficiently designated to render it certain) were not regularly issued from any loan office of the United States.

2. The interest for four years was paid on a part of them by Michael Hillagas, formerly Treasurer of the United States.

3. No certificates belonging, as far as appears from any papers accompanying them, to John Delafield, are in the Treasury. Forty-three certificates, corresponding in amount with those referred to in his petition, and which were presented at the Treasury on the 18th of April, 1794, by Uriah Tracy, in behalf of Benjamin Tallmadge, are now in the Auditor's Office, and are supposed to be the certificates in question.

4. There are four other certificates, of the nominal amount of $400 each, of the same description, and presented in behalf of other persons, also remaining in the Auditor's Office.

5. The objections against funding the certificates are stated in the report of the Secretary of the Treasury of the 28th of March, 1792, on the petition of William Smith, of which a copy is enclosed.

I will only add that this subject has been repeatedly before Congress, and that no provision has hitherto been made for the payment, in any way, of the certificates issued under the circumstances of those in question.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
Register's Office, Feb. 5, 1816.

SIR: In reply to the queries you have done me the honor to propose :

1st. When were O'Bryan and Wade appointed loan officers for the State of Georgia ?

Answer. To the best of my recollection, they were in office on the 10th May, 1779, when I first entered the Treasury Office as Assistant Auditor General, under an appointment by Congress. Before that period I have not any knowledge of them.

2d. What is the date of the first entry respecting those officers to be found in any books in your office ?

Answer. An account was opened by my predecessor, William Gevott, in leger A, folio 214, entitled " ——— Commissioners' loan office, State of Georgia, account current ;" which account obtained a credit, March 18, 1778, by Joseph Clay, of $202,423. The blank left for their names was inserted by myself on debiting them, 4th September, 1780, with $12,000 to Thomas Smith, his account current.

3d. Are O'Bryan and Wade charged with the $200,000 alluded to in Mr. Wolcott's report.

Answer. They are charged with that sum on the 22d November, 1781 ; but it appears by the report of the Auditor of the Treasury, dated 19th January, 1795, that they were transmitted on the 24th September, 1777, when the record might have been made had Mr. Gevott been possessed of the voucher on which I afterwards made the record.

4th. Have they any credit, and to what amount ?

Answer. They have credit for returned loan office certificates amounting to $402,000.

5th. In reply to the last query : Were the papers of the State of Georgia, on which a settlement was made by the United States with that State, burnt ? They were burnt on the ——— day of August, 1814, at the irruption of the late enemy.

I have the honor to be, &c.

CANADIAN REFUGEES.

The House then went into Committee of the Whole, on the orders of the day. The bill to relieve certain Canadian volunteers in the late war being under consideration—

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, moved to amend the bill, so as to include in its provisions those refugees only who had been citizens of the United States previously to the late war ; which motion was carried without a division.

Mr. ROBERTSON then moved a new section to the bill, embracing for relief or remuneration all our own citizens, whether on the maritime or territorial frontier, who suffered losses by the enemy during the late war.

Mr. HOPKINSON moved to amend the amendment, by incorporating the cases of those citizens who sustained loss by the British in the Revolutionary war.

Both the preceding motions, after a short discussion between the respective movers, were successively rejected ; after which—

Mr. BARBOUR proposed, by way of amendment, an entire substitute to the bill, the object of which was, to allow to the volunteers in question a bounty of land, in proportion to the rank they held in our service, instead of graduating the bounty by the amount of their losses in Canada.

A debate ensued on this proposition, which, by branching a good deal into the merits of the case, and the deserts of the refugees, occupied nearly the remainder of the day. The advocates of the amendment were, Messrs. BARBOUR, HULBERT, TUCKER, and CADY ; and its opponents, Messrs. JOHNSON, ALEXANDER, YATES, and CLAY.

The question was finally taken on the proposed amendment, and carried—ayes 77, noes 49.

Mr. FORSYTH moved to amend the bill, by expunging the discrimination, and extending its benefits to all the inhabitants of Canada who came over and took up arms for the United States.

This motion was opposed by Mr. GROSVENOR, and supported by Mr. FORSYTH ; and disagreed to—ayes 49, noes 79.

The Committee then proceeded to fill up the blanks in the bill—to apportion the bounty—after which the Committee rose, reported the bill to the House, and the House adjourned.

TUESDAY, February 20.

Mr. SERGEANT presented a petition of George Helmbold, praying that the land bounty to which he was entitled for services as a soldier in the late Army may be given to him, which is withheld, because of his having been appointed a commissioned officer.

Mr. BASSETT submitted the following resolution, which was read and ordered to lie on the table :

Resolved, That the rules of this House be so amended as to admit, within the Hall, the Governor, for the time being, of any State in the Union, who may attend at the Seat of the General Government during the sessions of Congress, and who may choose to avail himself of such privilege.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed bills of the following titles, to wit : " An act for the relief of Lieutenant Colonel William Lawrence of the Army of the United States, and the officers, non-commissioned officers and privates composing the garrison of Fort Bowyer, in the year 1814;" and "An act to extend certain privileges, as therein mentioned, to Bernard Edme Verjon;" in which bills they ask the concurrence of this House.

Mr. MILLS submitted a resolution, which was read, as follows, viz:

Resolved. That the Secretary of War be directed to lay before this House a statement of the expenses incurred for the service of the militia called forth by the authority of the United States during the late war, and also a statement of the accounts which have been exhibited, and claims which have been made by the respective States for services rendered by the militia of said States, when called forth with or without such authority, designating such items of claim as have been rejected, in cases where the calls were made by the authority of the United States, and the grounds of such rejection; together with the sums which have been paid, and the accounts and claims which have been allowed therefor; designating for what services and to what States, respectively, such sums have been paid or accounts allowed.

Mr. FORSYTH moved to amend the said resolution by adding the following words:

"And if the claim of any State or States, for the services of the militia thereof, have been rejected or admitted, to state the ground of such rejection or admission."

The said resolution and amendment were ordered to lie on the table.

NATIONAL UNIVERSITY.

Mr. WILDE, from the committee appointed on that part of the President's Message, at the commencement of the session, which relates to a national seminary of learning within the District of Columbia, reported a bill for the establishment of a National University; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

The bill is as follows:

A Bill for the establishment of a National University.

Be it enacted, by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized to cause to be erected, on such site within the District of Columbia as he shall select, the buildings necessary for a National University; and, for defraying the expense thereof, the sum of — thousand dollars is hereby appropriated, to be paid out of any money in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated by law.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized and required to cause to be surveyed and laid into building lots the whole, or such parts as he may think proper, of the ground reserved for the use of the United States, in the City of Washington; and to cause the same to be sold, at such times and places, and in such proportions, and under such regulations as he shall prescribe; and the proceeds thereof, after defraying the charges of survey and sale, to be invested in such stocks or public securities as shall by him be deemed most advisable; and the same, when so invested, and the dividends thereon arising, shall constitute a fund for the support of a National University.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, requested to cause to be prepared and laid before Congress, at its next session, a plan for the regulation and government of the said university.

CANADIAN REFUGEES.

The House then proceeded to the consideration of the report of the Committee of the Whole, being the amendments of the Committee to the bill to compensate certain Canadian volunteers.

The amendment reported by the Committee of the Whole changed the original principle of the bill from compensation in proportion to loss of property in Canada, to remuneration according to rank in our service, agreeably to the following scale; to a colonel, 960 acres; a major, 800; a captain, 640; a subaltern, 480; and non-commissioned officers and privates, 320 acres each.

Mr. JACKSON, of Virginia, moved an amendment to the second section, to authorize the immediate location of the several bounties on any surveyed public lands in the Indiana Territory.

After some opposition to the motion by Mr. PICKERING, and reply by Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, the amendment was agreed to without a division.

Some further amendment was made to the amendments of the Committee of the Whole; when

Mr. ALEXANDER said: I have to regret, Mr. Speaker, that I have taken any part in this discussion, as it necessarily invites, nay, impels me to support, and more explicitly to explain, the views which I had the honor to submit when in Committee of the Whole yesterday. My views of doing justice, sir, are guided and directed by the extent of the injury complained of, and submitted for my examination and decision.

The amendment which has been adopted in this bill, by the Committee of the Whole on yesterday, has wholly and entirely changed the original character and principle of this bill, by assuming (pro hac) a fact which is not true, and which cannot be justified by a true statement of the case of these Canadian refugees, as they are called. The assumed fact is this, sir; that these Canadian gentlemen are to be considered, by the principles of this amendment, as our own disbanded officers; for, the compensation in land proposed to them by this amendment is graduated by the very terms, and in the very language of the bill which had for its object a bounty in land to our own disbanded officers, as a reward to the soldier's merit, and which bill was, three days ago, rejected by a large majority, when in Committee of the Whole on that subject.

These Canadians have substantial merits, and ought to be relieved, on principle, for the losses sustained by them, and we ought to meet their case fairly, and decide it upon its own merits. They are either entitled to compensation for the losses sustained by them, or they are not entitled. If they are entitled, it is just, and honor compels you to relieve them to the extent of their loss, and that, too, on principle. Now, sir, for the principle of this amendment. By its provisions, some of these Canadians will get ten times more, perhaps, than ever they were worth in property, and some of them will get ten times less than the loss they have actually sustained. A private soldier may have been worth more than his colonel, major, or captain; yet his colonel will get nine hundred and sixty acres, his major eight hundred, his captain six hundred and forty acres, and himself but three hundred and twenty acres. Is this doing justice on principle? Away with such justice as this! it has no charms for me. I had like to have said it would be absurd—I will say it—and if it is not, that word ought not to have a place in the English language. It shall not; and I will insert in its place the word ridiculous. These Canadians are to be considered as our own disbanded officers, and to be rewarded as such for their gallant services—not indemnified for their losses—by the same scale, too, that our own officers have been proposed to be rewarded.

But, sir, I suppose our own officers are not equally meritorious, or that it would take a little more land to reward them. Sir, I fear this latter ground is the grand objection and secret which has rejected the bounty to your own disbanded officers. Sir, the Canadians ought to be indemnified, and our own officers rewarded; and although their cases are perfectly distinct in principle, yet they are both meritorious claims on your bounty. Humanity and every noble principle of our nature cry aloud in their favor. Sir, what do these Canadians ask of you? They do not ask a reward, they ask indemnity for losses sustained by them in consequence of having joined your standard in the late war.

Sir, the motion which I shall presently have the honor to submit, is intended to have the truth, and the real merits of the case of these Canadians laid before us, that we may meet their case fairly and manfully.

Sir, it is said that some of these Canadians have lost twenty thousand dollars? And pray, sir, is that the objection to our paying it. If it was an hundred thousand dollars, it is not the less just. Plead your poverty and your bankruptcy, but never deny your debt. I suspect that some of these Canadians have not lost twenty dollars in property. I am for paying each in proportion to his actual loss. I move, therefore, that this bill, as amended, be recommitted to the Committee on Military Affairs, with instructions to report to the House the facts which constitute the claims of these Canadian refugees.

Mr. BARBOUR opposed the commitment, and defended the principle substituted, on his motion, by the Committee of the whole House yesterday.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, stated his reasons against recommitment, and for wishing the subject to be acted on in its present shape.

The question was taken on the motion to recommit, and decided in the negative.

On motion of Mr. JACKSON, of Virginia, the bill was so amended, as to exclude from the provisions of the bill such refugees as were enlisted, and to extend them only to volunteers.

Mr. JACKSON then renewed a motion previously made by Mr. HAMMOND, without success, to grant to those of the refugees who served as privates in the service, an additional allowance of three months pay; which motion was now agreed to.

Mr. NELSON, of Virginia, then stated his objections to the report of the Committee of the Whole, and to the bill in its present shape. He protested with zeal against giving preference to the refugees over such of our own citizens as had served in the late war, and who, on being disbanded, have been denied a similar bounty. He was, however, warmly in favor of remunerating, to a reasonable extent, the refugees in question, for their losses, sufferings and services; and preferred the principle of relief originally proposed.

Mr. WRIGHT spoke as follows:

Mr. Speaker, I am sorry to discover such an indisposition to remunerate the petitioners, who, by proclamation, were invited to join the American standard, being then subjects of Great Britain, resident in Canada. The honorable gentleman from Massachusetts says, that "it is immoral to encourage crime;" and he, therefore, is opposed to giving these gentlemen the amount of their losses by confiscation, which they have sustained by their confidence in the faith of this nation, pledged by that proclamation. Sir, in the abstract I admire the purity of the gentleman's principles, and was that question fairly before us, I should view the subject as he does. But that is not the question; but whether we shall fulfil the promises of the Government, in indemnifying these gentlemen for their losses sustained in joining the American standard, by the invitation of the Government. However we may admire the gentleman's principles in the abstract, yet, sir, practically, as in application to the case before us, I cannot but support the conduct of the Administration in their proclamation, and of course the claim of the gentlemen claiming under that proclamation. Sir, the lex talionis imposed that policy on this Administration. The British arts of seduction of the Indians and negroes to join their standard, and imbrue their hands in the blood of their fellow-citizens and masters, admits of no doubt; nay, sir, in time of peace, their attempts to seduce whole States from allegiance, through the agency of the noted Henry, has been fully proved, although he failed to effect the object of his demoralizing mission, owing to the unshaken fidelity of the citizens of that region, so proudly called the cradle of the Revolution. I ask, with this evidence before the eyes of our Government, could they, in justice to the nation, forego this act of retaliation? I presume not. But, sir, if that act was in itself improper, it having been done by authority, and the United States having obtained the benefits, can it be possible that honorable men can deny to these gentlemen that remuneration which reason and justice entitled them to expect. A number of these gentlemen were natives of the United States, who, unwilling to imbrue their hands in the blood of their relatives and countrymen, under this proclamation joined the American standard; to these the objections do not so directly apply, but to me, that can make no distinction, because the measure of remuneration is not to be regulated by the limit of the proclamation, and as all were alike invited, so all are equally entitled to the same remuneration. In the war of the Revolution the native sons of America were all invited to join our standard; we considered all Americans as the American natale solum, and we considered these invitations to them to unite with us to defend America against foreign oppressions, as most justly growing out of the state of affairs in which we found ourselves at the commencement of the war—and I, therefore, shall most cordially vote for their relief, in the cases before us, which a just and wise policy induces the Government to adopt, and their devotion to this country, and their confidence in its pledged faith, induced them to embrace.

Mr. McLEAN, of Ohio, followed on the same side. He defended the character of the volunteers from the aspersions cast on them, and advocated the propriety of relieving them according to the principle first proposed, in preference to compensation according to rank.

Mr. KING, of Massachusetts, likewise opposed the report of the committee, and stated his reasons for discriminating between these persons and such of our private citizens as had suffered loss; and urged the superiority of the former plan of remuneration.

Mr. GROSVENOR replied to the argument of discrimination, advanced by Mr. KING, and disputed the existence of any difference in the cases of the suffering refugees and our own citizens; to whom—

Mr. INGHAM and Mr. NELSON successively replied.

Mr. SERGEANT spoke in reply to Mr. NELSON and others, and generally against any indemnification of the volunteers in question.

After an unsuccessful motion by Mr. HALL, to lay the bill on the table for the purpose of having it printed, and some explanatory remarks from Mr. INGHAM, the question on concurring in the report of the Committee of the Whole, (to apportion the bounty according to rank) was taken by yeas and nays, and decided in the affirmative—yeas 85, nays 48, as follows:

Ordered, That the said bill be engrossed and read a third time to-morrow.

The bill, as originally committed to the Committee of the Whole, is as follows:

Be it enacted, by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of State, as soon as may be after the passage of this act, to appoint two commissioners to examine into and ascertain, in a summary way, the actual losses of real estate sustained by such persons as were, at the commencement of the late war between the United States and Great Britain, inhabitants of the province of Upper Canada; and who, during the said war, joined the armies of the United States, were slain, died in service, or continued therein until honorably discharged, and whose losses shall have been occasioned by their thus abandoning the British and joining the American cause.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of the said commissioners to give notice for four weeks successively, in the newspapers printed in the villages of Buffalo and Batavia, in the State of New York, specifying the time when, and place where, they will meet, and requiring all persons interested to present their claims on the day specified in such notice; and the said commissioners shall meet, pursuant to their notice, on or before the — day of — next, at Williamsville, in the county of Niagara, and State of New York; and after having taken an oath, before some judicial officer of said State, faithfully and impartially to execute the duties enjoined on them by this act, shall proceed to inquire into the losses which the persons aforesaid have, for the cause aforesaid, respectively sustained. The said commissioners shall have power to administer oaths or affirmations to witnesses, and shall not take the evidence of any witness who shall not be sworn or affirmed by them; they shall adjourn from day to day, until they shall have completed the objects of their commission: Provided, however, That no claim for losses shall be received or examined by them, which shall not be presented to them within the space of — weeks after they shall have convened pursuant to the said notice. And it shall be the further duty of the said commissioners, after they shall have completed the examination aforesaid, to report their proceedings to the Commissioner of the Land Office, together with a list of the persons who shall have satisfactorily established losses, and the amount of such losses respectively.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of the said Commissioner of the Land Office to issue to each of the said persons a certificate of the amount of the losses established by him or her, under the provisions of this act; and in case of the death of any person, whose losses shall be established as aforesaid, then the said certificate shall be issued to his widow, or if no widow to the child or children of such deceased person; which certificate shall be received to the amount specified in it, but without interest, in any payment for the public lands which may hereafter be sold in the Territories of Indiana and Illinois: Provided, however, and it is hereby expressly declared, That the whole amount of certificates issued under this act shall not exceed the sum of — thousand dollars; and in case the aggregate amount of losses reported by the said commissioners shall exceed the said sum of — thousand dollars, then the certificate to be issued by the Commissioner of the Land Office to each claimant, shall not be for the whole amount of the loss sustained by him or her, but only for a sum proportioned to his or her actual loss, as the said sum of — thousand dollars is to the aggregate of all the losses so reported.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That each of the commissioners, to be appointed in pursuance of this act, shall receive, out of the Treasury of the United States, the sum of — for each and every day he shall be employed in discharging the duties required of him by this act.

And as amended, it will read—

And it shall be lawful for the said persons to locate their claims in quarter sections upon any of the unappropriated lands of the United States within the Indiana Territory, which shall have been surveyed prior to such location, with the exception of salt springs and lead mines therein, and of the quantities of land adjacent thereto, which may be reserved for the use of the same by the President of the United States, and the section number sixteen in every township to be granted to the inhabitants of such township for the use of public schools; which locations shall be subject to such regulations, as to priority of choice, and the manner of location, as the President of the United States shall prescribe.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the Treasurer of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized and required to pay to each of the persons aforesaid three months additional pay, according to the rank they respectively held in the Army of the United States during the late war.

MILITARY SERVICES.

The House then proceeded to the other part of the report of the Committee of the Whole, being their amendments to the bill making further provision for military services during the late war.

After agreeing to the other amendments of the committee, the question was stated on concurring with the Committee of the Whole, in striking out the third section of the bill (which provided a bounty in land to the disbanded officers of the late army.)

Mr. NELSON, of Virginia, expressed a hope that those who had just voted a similar bounty to the Canadian refugees, would not deny it to our own officers.

Mr. TELFAIR and Mr. SMITH of Maryland opposed the report of the committee and advocated the bounty.

Mr. LUMPKIN spoke as follows:

Mr. Speaker, it is with diffidence, upon any occasion, that I rise to submit my views and opinions to this honorable body. And upon the present occasion my embarrassment is increased; because I rise in opposition to a measure emanating from a source which I highly respect. This measure has also received the sanction of the Military Committee, and the support of many other honorable gentlemen on this floor, amongst whom are most of my worthy colleagues. But upon this, as well as all other questions presented to this House for consideration, I feel myself bound to examine and investigate for myself, and then pursue that course which my own best judgment may dictate to be right. And upon due examination of this subject, the result has been, that I am constrained to conclude that it will be partial and impolitic to give the proposed donation in lands to the disbanded officers of the late Army of the United States. First, let us examine how these offices were created, and how those gentlemen came into them. The necessity of having a large number of military officers, grew out of the war in which this country has recently been engaged with a formidable enemy.

The various laws passed by Congress for raising armies, pointed out the number of officers necessary to command those armies; also the pay and subsistence that they should be entitled to receive for their services. And I presume they have received the full amount held out to them at the time they engaged in the service; and therefore, as has been admitted by my friend and colleague, as well as every other gentleman who has spoken on that side of the question, they have no just claims on the Government. But the appeal is made to the magnanimity and liberality of Congress. Sir, I admire liberality in Governments, as well as individuals. But I differ with some gentlemen in the selection of objects to bestow liberality upon. I have no disposition to bestow my charity or liberality where no necessity exists; I am not disposed to make my selection from the elevated ranks of life. I will now make the inquiry, how those officers came into office? They were not pressed into the service of their country, but in most cases were personally, or by their friends, applicants for the commands which they have held; indeed there was a great many more applicants than there were offices to bestow, which proves that it was not a very objectionable or disagreeable service, to the patriotic and gallant young gentlemen of this country. And it is a subject of regret that the best in every instance could not have been selected from the numerous candidates. But I do not intend to insinuate but that it was intended in every case to select those who were best qualified, but from the nature of the case it could not be done. Much has been said in regard to the pay of the officer and the soldier. It has been stated that the pay and bounty of the soldier was raised extravagantly high, because it was with difficulty that they could be procured; and that the pay of the officers was pared down as low as possible, because there was a great number ready to take commands. I admit that it was difficult to procure soldiers, and there was always a plenty ready to take commands. But I claim the attention of the House, while I examine what was the pay of the officers and the soldier, that we may be able to judge correctly on this subject. I find the pay of a major general (including forage and rations) to be two hundred and forty-five dollars per month; two thousand nine hundred and forty dollars per year, and more than eight dollars per day. A brigadier general, one hundred and thirty-two dollars per month, and fifteen hundred and eighty-four dollars per year. A colonel, ninety-three dollars per month, and eleven hundred and sixteen dollars per year. A major, sixty-four dollars per month, and seven hundred and eighty-eight dollars per year. A captain forty-three dollars per month, and five hundred and sixteen dollars per year; and thus gradually decreasing, down to the third lieutenant. The high pay of the soldier that has been so much dwelt upon, was during the war raised to eight dollars per month, and ninety-six dollars per year, besides his bounty in money and land. Since the conclusion of peace, his pay is reduced to five dollars per month.

I admit the assertion, that no country has rewarded or paid their soldiers higher than this. But, in its principles and form, our Government differs from all others, and I rejoice that it does; here we have no distinctions but such as arise from merit, from intrinsic worth of character; therefore there should not be so much difference between the pay of the officers and soldiers in this, as in other countries. If we were to pursue the example of the European nations, I know that we should forget the soldier, and make liberal provision for the officers. In Great Britain, if once an officer you are always so, at least their officers receive half pay for life. But in this country, if we adhere to the principles of our own Government, we ought to reward merit, not rank. Let us follow the example of the immortal WASHINGTON, the political Father of his Country. Examine his letters to the Marquis Lafayette and other friends, on his returning from the command of the American Army, at the close of the Revolutionary war. He felt himself eased from a load of public care, and anticipated the pleasure of spending the remainder of his days as a private citizen, on the banks of the Potomac, in the practice of the domestic virtues. He asked of the Government no remuneration for his all-important services; and when his native State (Virginia) offered him donations, he declined accepting, and recommended that the fund proposed to be vested in him, should be applied to useful objects. Mr. Speaker let us follow the example of our WASHINGTON, and closely adhere to our own principles and form of Government. In ancient history I recollect reading of a nation, who received its laws immediately from, and was governed by the Supreme Ruler of the Universe; and while they were content with their good form of government they prospered, and were more blessed and happy than all the nations which surrounded them; but they became wicked and then dissatisfied, and asked for a king to rule over them; and the reason why they asked a king, was, that they might be like other nations. The request of this people was granted—a king was given to them—their pride was gratified; but in obtaining a king, they procured a curse, and not a blessing. I have no doubt but this nation has been equally blessed and protected by the guardian care of a kind and indulgent Providence; and I am confident that we do err, whenever we depart from the spirit and nature of our own republican institutions, and assimilate our laws or policy to those of other countries, whose forms of government essentially differ from ours in first principles.

I will now call the attention of the House to the provision proposed to be made to the officers, and the number proposed to be benefitted thereby. The chairman of the Military Committee informed the House the other day, that there was between fifteen hundred and two thousand disbanded officers to be provided for; and that the land proposed to be given to them was upwards of nine hundred thousand acres, nearly one million. And from the most accurate calculations which I have been able to make, I am inclined to the opinion that the number of officers and quantity of land are both estimated too low. But, in justice to the disorganized officers, permit me to say, that I entertain no doubt but many of them entered the service of their country from the most pure, upright, and patriotic motives, and that many of them have done honor to themselves and to the country for which they fought; they have gained an imperishable fame that is riveted in the hearts of the American people; a fame more durable than a marble monument. They are entitled to, and are daily receiving the honors and gratitude which their fellow-citizens have to bestow. Let us not tarnish their fame and merit by any act of ours, which will make those honorable men appear to posterity in the light of mercenaries.

But, sir, I am compelled to say, that many of those officers have no claim on their Government. There were many, who during the war were living in luxury and dissipation, spending their time in idleness and pleasure, at their recruiting stations, and frequently their conduct was such, that they were so little respected by the community where they were stationed, that they scarcely enlisted a man, and I have no doubt they injured the cause they were in honor bound to support. They were living upon the Government, without rendering the smallest benefit to it.

Delicacy and decorum forbid the mention of names, but is it not known to every gentleman on this floor, that there were officers of the regular army not worthy to be compared with many of our militia officers? And yet, nothing is said about donations of land for those brave, patriotic, volunteer militia officers, whose heroic deeds have immortalized and recorded their names in the hearts of the American people.

Sir, it is known to you, it is known to every member of this House, that many of the militia officers have achieved far more honor in defending their country's rights, than many of those officers that we are now called upon to make provision for. I call upon gentlemen to say, if this is sound policy? If this is administering justice with an impartial hand? Sir, I cannot forget, and delicacy shall not prevent me from mentioning, the toils and services of the militia of that State which I have the honor in part to represent. But first, permit me to say, that from anything which I have seen, emanating from any department of the Government, it would appear, that the useful services of the Georgia militia, and the merit of the officers who commanded them, had not reached the War Department.

But, be this as it may, the intrepidity and bravery of the militia of the South will long be remembered by the people in that section of the country. Can I feel justified with myself to vote donations, indiscriminately, to the regular officers, some of whom have been worse than useless to the Government, while the arduous and important military services of Floyd, Newnan, Thomas, and many others who acted with them, are fresh in my recollection, and are passed over, entirely neglected? Sir, these men, not half supplied by the agents of the Government, at the head of a brave and patriotic militia, sought and found the savage foe in the wilderness, and carried terror into the heart of their country. And when attacked, and surrounded by a numerous host of yelling savages—and that in the awful solemnity of the night, without fortifications, breastworks, or shelter—every officer, every soldier, was immovably firm to their duty, and the enemy put to flight with severe loss.

But such men as these are forgotten here. It is the officers of the regular army that must be provided for. It has been said, that the militia does not complain; and if the question now under consideration was submitted to the officers of the militia, they would be in favor of granting the proposed donations. Admit these statements to be true, and the answer is, to the praise of the militia be it spoken, that they have made no complaints; and to the officers who possess so much disinterested generosity as to grant to others that which is due to themselves. The donations proposed to be given are spoken of by gentlemen as a mere trifle. It has also been said, money is not asked for, it is lands, and that we have plenty of land, and it would be to the interest of the country to have it settled.

I will ask, if all the citizens of the United States are not interested in what is called Government land? And does not this land average to the Government, when sold, a revenue of at least two dollars per acre? Under existing laws which have been passed by Congress, for the disposition of public lands, it is obliged to bring two dollars per acre at least. If my statement be correct, we are in our liberality about to bestow donations in lands, equal in value to two millions of dollars, upon the disbanded officers of the late army. To a mind that estimates the necessity of economy in Governments as I do, this is no inconsiderable donation or gratuity. For my part I cannot reconcile it to my feelings, to vote a direct tax of three millions of dollars indiscriminately on the people, and then, in the next vote, give away two millions of their property, or money; for in reality I view it as the same thing. It is clear to my mind, that the pay and subsistence of the officer has been better than that of the soldier. And the part which the officer is required to act in performing his duty, is certainly the most pleasant and agreeable service. The situation of our soldiers during the late war, in many instances, has been a scene calculated to excite the compassion of the hardest heart. When we consider the hardships and dangers through which they have passed, upon a bare allowance of bread and beef, and their eight dollars per month, and contrast it with the pay of the officers, I trust the conclusion will be, that the liberality of the Government is not more pledged to the officers than to the soldiers, and that the obligation is as strong to many of the militia officers as to the regulars.

Mr. McKee made some remarks which could not be heard by the Reporter; and Mr. PICKERING, explained his reasons for voting in favor of the bounty to the Canadians, and yet against allowing the same to our officers.

Mr. CANNON said, he had not intended to say a single word on this subject, nor should he at this time have troubled the House with a single remark in addition to what he had submitted to the Committee of the whole House, a few days ago, when this subject was under consideration, had it not been for the arguments which had just fallen from the honorable gentleman from Maryland, (Mr. SMITH.) Sir, there is no member of this House, who has a higher regard, or feels more respect for that class of individuals who are to be benefitted by the passage of the section of the bill, which is now the subject of debate, than I have. I have not forgotten the important services many of them have rendered in defence of our country. They are entitled to, and will receive the gratitude and esteem of every virtuous citizen of this nation. They have covered themselves with glory that will last for ages to come—that could not, in the smallest degree, be increased or diminished by anything it is possible for me to say. But, sir, this question presents itself to me, in a different shape from that in which it seems to be viewed by the honorable gentleman from Maryland. I ask you, sir, if these officers, who have been discharged from the service of the United States, are the only persons in our country who are entitled to our respect, and the liberality of this nation? Does justice or policy require that we should select this particular class of men, as the only objects of our gratitude and our favor, while at the same time we turn our backs on a much larger number, composed of the citizen soldiers of our country, equally meritorious, who have served us with equal patriotism and equal firmness—the gallant heroes, who have defended our nation, our rights and our liberties, and have nobly supported, and borne our Government through all the most trying scenes of this war? I think it does not. In passing on this subject, Mr. Speaker, I consider that an unjust and improper distinction has been made between the disbanded officers of the regular army, and the citizens of our country, who have served us as soldiers; and to grant the donations of land contemplated by this section of the bill, to the disbanded officers of the regular army, and withhold an equal provision from others equally deserving the bounty of the Government, would, in my opinion, not only be making an unjust discrimination between the officers and soldiers of the regular army but also between the officers of the regular army and the officers of the volunteers and militia, who have rendered us equal service, as well as the soldier who has entered our service as a volunteer or militiaman, all of whom have served us, and that too in the most trying times of difficulty, danger and alarm; they have rendered important services to this nation—they have taken on themselves the humble though arduous duties of the soldier—they have calmly encountered the toils of the camp, and the dangers of the field of battle—they have been our noble and gallant defenders, and have driven from our soil and our shores those boasted hordes of British slaves, who have vainly attempted to lay prostrate our liberties—they have done their duty, their deeds are without a parallel in the pages of history—they have suffered, they have bled, and many of them have sacrificed their lives on the altar of our country's honor. And, sir, can it be possible that the members of this House have forgotten all these great sacrifices and important services? Is not the citizen, who has served us as a soldier, as much entitled to our consideration as the man who has served us as an officer; or are we to pass by them as unworthy of our notice, and make this partial provision for the disbanded officers? While I admit, Mr. Speaker, that many of the disbanded officers of the regular army have rendered important services to our country, I cannot forget that the citizens of our country have also rendered important services to us, during the late war; and though in a more humble and less conspicuous capacity, let us not forget them. Sir, it must be known to every person, that the place of an officer in any army, whether regular, militia, or volunteers, is by far better than that of a soldier. I am, therefore, opposed to rewarding the officers, and neglecting the soldiers. The difference between the pay and emoluments of your officers, and the pay and bounty of your soldiers is, in my opinion, already fully sufficient. Your officers received, perhaps, from two hundred and fifty, down to twenty-five or thirty dollars per month, while your soldier received but eight dollars per month, who encounters the most danger, and often performs the most arduous duty. I cannot agree with the honorable gentleman, that the officer's duty is so much harder than that of the soldier, although I feel the highest respect for the opinions of that gentleman. I yet believe the performance of the duties of the soldier equally as hard as that of the officer. Commissions in the regular service have been much sought after during the war, and the very persons for whom you are now about to provide donations of land, have already once been made the favorites of the nation. In getting those appointments, they have had the best places in your Army, and I might say, the best places in our country, during the war. Gentlemen may say what they please about it, but I know that, generally, the place of an officer in any army, whether regular, militia, or volunteer, is better, is enviable to that of a soldier, and why make this unjust and partial discrimination in favor of your disbanded officers?

The Government of the United States has held out to her citizens certain conditions and inducements to enter into the service; certain pay and emoluments to officers, and certain pay and bounties to soldiers; and it is known to every member of this House, that, on those conditions, you could have got more officers than you wanted, but not near so many soldiers as you wanted. This circumstance alone I would think sufficient to show clearly that the inducements given to your officers were by far greater than those given to your soldiers. But gentlemen, in the course of this debate, have contended that this land ought to be given to them, as an inducement to enter the service of our country again, in the event of another war. But, sir, I have no fears that there ever will be any difficulty found in this country to get officers for a regular army; the great difficulty is in getting soldiers. What, sir, has been the situation of our army during the late war? It has been a skeleton, an army of officers without soldiers, and, if additional inducements are given, I contend they should be given to the soldier. For my part, I cannot see on what ground it can be shown, that the disbanded officers of the regular army are more entitled to this additional bounty or favor of the Government, than the citizens of our country are, who have served us in the humble capacity of soldiers; I cannot believe that the officer has any stronger claim on this Government than the soldier. Indeed, sir, I believe his claim is less strong than that of your citizen, who has served you in the humble place of a soldier. I have said before, sir, that I was opposed to the principle of rewarding officers, and neglecting our soldiers. Sir, can it be possible that the Congress of the United States will show by her acts such partiality in favor of any class of her citizens, while, at the same time, she neglects others equally meritorious? I hope they will not. The honorable gentleman from Kentucky, who is chairman of the committee who reported this bill, has, in the course of the debate on striking out this section, said something about national character. Sir, I am as anxious to preserve national character as that gentleman is, or any other member of this House. But, sir, I cannot agree that the adoption of this measure would add anything to our national character. I have a different view of this course; I believe the best way to preserve national character, is to act impartially on this subject, as well as all others that come before us, and to show by our acts that we have an equal regard for all who have rendered to us equal services. It has been contended by some gentlemen, in the course of the debate on this subject, that we ought to grant this land to the disbanded officers, on account of the sacrifices they have made in entering into our service. Sir, I admit many of them have made sacrifices in this way, but have the gentlemen forgotten that the citizens of our country generally have made sacrifices during this war, and many of them, perhaps, have made as great sacrifices, if not greater, than those who obtained commissions in the regular army? I should suppose our militia officers had made sacrifices in defending our country, and I know the volunteers have sacrificed much for the defence of our country; and, sir, the common citizens generally have made sacrifices in defending our country; many of them have sacrificed their all, and, however little it may have been, it was as dear to them as if they had much. What has been the situation of a poor man with a helpless family, entirely dependent on his labor and attention for comfort and support? I say, what has been his situation, when called to march eight hundred or a thousand miles from his home to defend his country? He has no alternative, he must go; and if retained in your service but six months, he loses his crop and he is ruined, and everything he has is sacrificed in defence of our country; and are we now to forget all these sacrifices, except those alone which have been made by the gentlemen who were fortunate enough to obtain appointments in the regular service, and those alone we are now called on to provide for? No, sir; I hope we will pursue a different and more impartial course. But, Mr. Speaker, the honorable gentleman from Maryland has said something about the great responsibility of officers, and contrasted their duties and services with that of our soldiers. Sir, I know that every officer has a share of responsibility attached to him in proportion to his grade; but is there no responsibility attached to the duties of a soldier? I ask you, sir who watches and guards the borders of your country against the sudden or midnight attack of the enemy—is it not your soldiers? and do you not require the soldier, when sentinel, to remain firm and watchful at his post, amidst the pelting storms of rains and snow?

And, sir, should he chance to grow weary with fatigue and slumber, what do you require of him? Why, sir, by the laws of your country, you require his life! And, yet, will gentlemen say he has no responsibility? I contend, the duty of a soldier has much responsibility attached to it; he performs the drudgery of the camp, and makes the greatest sacrifice of his feelings and his liberty, while he is in your service; and the sufferings and danger to which he is exposed are not less even in the field of battle. Ask the gallant officer who has received the thanks of this House, and the applause of this nation, to whom he is indebted for his fame and his military glory, and he will tell you it is to the firmness and bravery of his soldiers as well as his officers. And to whom is this nation indebted for its defence, to the North, the South, the East, and the West? It is to the patriotism of our citizens, and their firmness in the different fields of battle. Sir, I feel the highest respect for every individual who has aided in the defence of our country; whether officer, soldier, or citizen, I feel grateful for their services; but I cannot agree to make what I believe to be an unjust discrimination, not only between one class of officers and others equally meritorious, but also between officers and soldiers generally. I think the gentlemen who have advocated this measure have begun at the wrong end of the row. If I was called on to make the decision, which I would give donations of lands to first, the officers or soldiers, I should not hesitate to give it first to the soldier. And if the gentlemen will begin at the other end of the row, and provide for the soldiers first, I will go with them as far as any member of this House, but not until then. Therefore, I hope the amendment made to the bill, while, in Committee of the whole House, by striking out the third section, will be agreed to.

When Mr. C. had concluded, the House adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, February 21.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to inquire whether any, and, if any, what alterations are necessary to be made in the laws imposing duties on the tonnage of foreign vessels entering the ports of the United States.

After some remarks from Mr. SMITH, illustrative of his views, and the necessity of the resolution, it was adopted without opposition.

The following resolution, submitted yesterday by Mr. BASSETT, and modified at the suggestion of Mr. TAYLOR, of New York, so as to include the Governors of Territories, was considered and agreed to:

Resolved, That the rules of this House be so amended as to admit within the Hall the Governor, for the time being, of any State in the Union, or of any of the Territories thereof, who may attend at the Seat of the General Government during the sessions of Congress, and who may choose to avail himself of such privilege.

On motion of Mr. MILLS, the House took up the resolution submitted by him yesterday, and the same being again read, was agreed to, modified so as to read as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to lay before this House a statement of the expenses incurred for the services of the militia called forth by the authority of the United States during the late war; and also a statement of the accounts which have been exhibited, and claims which have been made by the respective States, for services rendered by the militia of said States when called forth, with or without such authority, together with the sums which have been paid, and the accounts and claims which have been allowed therefor; and in case the claim of any State or States has been rejected or allowed, to state the grounds of such rejection or allowance, designating for what services, and to what States respectively, such sums have been paid or accounts allowed; and designating also such items of claim as have been rejected in cases where the calls were made by authority of the United States, and the grounds of such rejection.

On motion of Mr. McLEAN, of Kentucky, the Committee on Roads and Canals were instructed to inquire into the expediency of improving the navigation of the Saline creek, from its junction with the Ohio to the Saline Lick, in the Illinois Territory.

On motion of Mr. WILDE, the Committee on the Judiciary were instructed to inquire whether any, and what, more convenient arrangements can be made relative to the times and places of holding the Circuit Courts of the United States for the districts of Georgia and South Carolina.

On motion of Mr. EASTON, the Committee on the Judiciary were instructed to inquire if any, and what, alterations are necessary to be made in the act entitled "An act providing for the government of the Territory of Missouri," approved June 4, 1812.

On motion of Mr. CREIGHTON, the Committee on the Public Lands were instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing by law for the sale of the reservation of twelve miles square, at the foot of the rapids of the Miami of Lake Erie, and the reservation of two miles square at the lower rapids of Sandusky river, in the State of Ohio.

On motion of Mr. NELSON, of Virginia, the Committee on the Judiciary were instructed to inquire into the expediency of lending some aid or encouragement to the publication of Mr. Cranch's reports of cases decided in the Supreme Court of the United States during the last four or five years.

On motion of Mr. SERGEANT, the Committee on the Judiciary were instructed to inquire and report whether any and what alterations and amendments are necessary to be made in the judicial system of the United States.

The amendment proposed by the Senate to the bill "for the relief of John Rodman Cox," was read and concurred in by the House.

The bill from the Senate for the relief of Lieutenant Colonel William Lawrence, of the Army of the United States, and of the officers, non-commissioned officers and privates, composing the garrison of Fort Bowyer in the year 1814, was read twice, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The bill from the Senate "to extend certain privileges, as therein mentioned, to Bernard Edme Verjon," was read twice, and referred to Messrs. JACKSON, PITKIN, and SMITH, of Maryland.

CANADIAN REFUGEES.

The engrossed bill to compensate certain Canadian volunteers was read the third time, and put on its passage.

Mr. WILLIAMS stated succinctly why he had voted against an indiscriminate bounty to our own disbanded officers, and why he should likewise oppose the present bill.

Mr. ALEXANDER stated why he should give a reluctant vote against a bill whose object he so heartily approved; but his objections were insuperable to the shape it had now assumed.

Mr. GASTON made a few remarks on the impropriety of opposing a measure because it did not exactly coincide with all our views; after which the question was taken on passing the bill, and decided in the affirmative—yeas 89, nays 54, as follows:

COMMERCE WITH GREAT BRITAIN.

On motion of Mr. FORSYTH, the House then proceeded to take up the report of the Managers on the part of this House, on the subject of the disagreeing votes of the two Houses, on the bill to carry into effect the Convention of Commerce with Great Britain. [This report embraces the whole ground taken by the conferees of this House, and those of the Senate. The form given to the bill by this House was substantially agreed to by the conferees, except the declaratory words in the enacting clause, which were insisted on by the conferees of the Senate, admitted by those of this House, and their acceptance recommended.]

Mr. KING, of Massachusetts rose, and expressed a wish, that the chairman of that committee would, on the part of that committee, favor the House with their views on the subject, particularly with the reasons which induced them to recommend the adoption of the amendments proposed, which, according to his impressions, tended to strengthen the pretensions set up by the other House, to weaken the force of the bill, and to add new strength to the convention; as the suspension of the acts of Congress was to be commensurate in point of duration with that convention, and to commence with it; that as to the declaratory part, of which the Senate were so tenacious, he deemed it of no further importance than as it showed the disposition of the Senate on this occasion, and as giving name and body to the power contended for. Did this question concern this House alone; were it merely a question of power or jurisdiction between the two Houses, though important in that view, he should not consider it in that serious point of light, of that high importance, which he now did. When the House is called upon to surrender a part of that power and those privileges confided them by the people, and guarantied by the Constitution, what, said he, is the claim of the Senate in this case? He would forbear to dwell upon the manner in which this bill, from the Senate, was forced upon the attention of this House. It was reported in Senate about a week after that which originated in this House; they well knew that there was a bill on the same subject pending in the House. The printed bill from the House, as usual, was upon their tables; the debate in the House had commenced; honorable gentlemen from the other branch had attended. Notwithstanding all this, and that it was a subject which particularly concerned their own powers, they thrust their bill in upon the House, while a gentleman was actually upon the floor debating the bill of the House upon the same subject. [The honorable SPEAKER here intimated to Mr. K. that he feared his language did not fully comport with that decorum, which ought to be observed in speaking of the acts of the other branch.] Mr. K. inquired if he alluded to the word thrust? The honorable SPEAKER answered in the affirmative. Mr. K. said, he certainly should not have used that word if he could have found another which suited the occasion better. Such, he said, was the impression made on him at the time; and if he could be persuaded that no improper interference was intended on the part of the Senate, he would certainly take it back. But, said Mr. K., what is the claim of the Senate upon this occasion?—to bind the United States in all cases upon which the treaty-making power may be exercised, contending that there is no limitation in the Constitution upon that power. In other words they claim the high, the dangerous power, to bind this country in all cases whatever; and this, in his opinion, they asserted by the present declaratory law. Such dangerous pretensions were resisted by our ancestors, and, as one of their descendants, he was disposed, in a Constitutional manner, to follow their example; and that it made no difference to him whether such pretensions were asserted by Kings, Lords, and Commons, or by a President and his Senate.

Mr. FORSYTH recapitulated the reasons which induced the committee to recommend the proposition to the House. He had viewed the declaratory words as mere surplusage, and not at all changing the character or impairing the force of the act.

Mr. CALHOUN moved that the report be laid on the table. His impression was, that the report was entirely negative, and recommended nothing decisive on the subject. At any rate, the House was just put in possession of the printed report, and being of a dubious character, some further time was necessary to a due consideration of the subject.

Mr. YANCEY supported the motion. He thought the report did yield the ground taken by this House; and, in his opinion, the House ought to stick or go through. He hoped, therefore, more time for reflection would be allowed.

Mr. TUCKER was willing the report should lie, for the present, on the table. He was confident, however, the House would find that nothing had been yielded by the committee; but, on the contrary, that the substantial rights of this House had been maintained.

The report was then laid on the table.

PROVISION FOR MILITARY SERVICES.

The House resumed the consideration of the report of the Committee of the Whole, on the bill making further provision for military services during the late war, and for other purposes.

The question recurred on concurring with the Committee of the Whole, in striking out the following section of the bill:

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That donations of land be granted to all the officers of the regular army who have been disbanded as supernumeraries, either in consolidating regiments or corps during the late war, or in reducing the army conformably to the act of March the third, one thousand eight hundred and fifteen, as follows, to wit: to each Major General one thousand two hundred and eighty acres; to each Brigadier General, one thousand one hundred and twenty acres; to each Colonel and Lieutenant Colonel, nine hundred and sixty acres; to each Major, eight hundred acres; to each Captain, six hundred and forty acres; to each subaltern, four hundred and eighty acres; and to officers of the medical and other staff, who have no rank, in proportion to their pay according to the scale aforesaid.

And the said question being taken, it passed in the affirmative—Yeas 77, nays 59, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adgate, Archer, Atherton, Baer, Baylies, Betts, Boss, Bradbury, Breckenridge, Brown, Burwell, Cady, Cannon, Champion, Cilley, Clayton, Comstock, Cooper, Crawford, Culpeper, Davenport, Edwards, Gaston, Gold, Goldsborough, Hahn, Hale, Hall, Hammond, Heister, Henderson, Herbert, Jewett, Kent, King of Massachusetts, Langdon, Law, Lewis, Lovett, Lumpkin, Lyon, Mason, McKee, McLean of Kentucky, Mills, Milnor, Nelson of Massachusetts, Noyes, Pickering, Pitkin, Powell, Reed, Rice, Roane, Ruggles, Savage, Sheffey, Smith of Pennsylvania, Smith of Virginia, Southard, Stanford, Stearns, Strong, Sturges, Taggart, Tallmadge, Tate, Taylor of New York, Thomas, Townsend, Vose, Ward of Massachusetts, Ward of New York, Webster, Wheaton, Wilcox, and Williams.

NAYS—Messrs. Alexander, Baker, Barbour, Bassett, Bennett, Birdsell, Brooks, Burnside, Calhoun, Chappell, Clark of Kentucky, Clendennin, Condict, Creighton, Cuthbert, Darlington, Forsyth, Goodwyn, Griffin, Grosvenor, Hawes, Huger, Hulbert, Hungerford, Ingham, Jackson, Johnson of Kentucky, Kerr of Virginia, King of North Carolina, Maclay, Mayrant, McCoy, McLean, of Ohio, Moore, Nelson of Virginia, Ormsby, Parris, Pickens, Piper, Pleasants, Robertson, Root, Schenck, Sharpe, Smith of Maryland, Taylor of South Carolina, Telfair, Tucker, Wallace, Ward of New Jersey, Wendover, Whiteside, Wilde, Wilkin, Willoughby, Thomas Wilson, William Wilson, Woodward, and Yancey.

So the House concurred with the Committee of the Whole in striking out the third section, and successively adopted the remainder of the amendments reported by the Committee.

Various motions were subsequently made to amend the bill, the most important of which was, by Mr. WILDE, to add a section, authorizing a bounty in land, according to rank, to such disbanded officers as had served one year, and who had been wounded, brevetted, or distinguished by any approving vote of Congress, &c.

The words "one year," were afterwards struck out, and motions successively made to fill the blank with ten, five, four, three, and two years, and eighteen and six months, but all in vain. Mr. W. then withdrew his amendment, with the view, as he said, of bringing the subject before the House in a form unconnected with the present bill.

The House had not got through the bill, when, about four o'clock, a motion was made and carried to adjourn.

THURSDAY, February 22.

Mr. INGHAM, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, reported a bill in addition to an act to regulate the Post Office Establishment; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. NELSON, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported a bill for the more convenient arrangement of the times and places of holding the circuit courts of the United States for the districts of South Carolina and Georgia; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. ROBERTSON from the Committee on the Public Lands, made a report on the petition of Amos Spafford; which was read; when Mr. R. reported a bill granting to Amos Spafford the right of pre-emption; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HULBERT, from the committee appointed on the petition of Ann Gerry, by leave of the House, reported a bill authorizing payment to the widow of Elbridge Gerry, deceased, late Vice President of the United States, of half of such salary as would have been payable to him during the residue of the term for which he was elected, had he so long lived; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. KING, of Massachusetts, from the Committee appointed on the petition of Jabez Maury, and others, made a report thereon; which was read; when Mr. K. reported a joint resolution to indemnify Jabez Maury, John W. C. Baxter, Samuel Wheeler, Jonathan Bartlett, Josiah Dana, and Aaron Hayden, and their sureties, against certain prosecutions under the authority of the British court of vice-admiralty; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

On motion of Mr. MOORE, the Committee on the Judiciary were instructed to inquire into the propriety of providing by law to compel witnesses to attend, from one State to another State, to prosecute or give evidence in cases of felony or other high crimes.

Mr. EASTON submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That it is expedient to grant donations of land to the disbanded officers of the late army of the United States who have been wounded in battle, and to the officers, non-commissioned officers, musicians, and privates of the militia, including volunteers and rangers, who have been wounded in battle during the late war, as follows, to wit: to each officer above the rank of colonel, — acres; to each officer above the rank of captain and below the rank of brigadier general, — acres; to the other commissioned officers, — acres each; and to every non-commissioned officer, musician, and private 160 acres; and to the officers of the medical staff who have no rank, in proportion to their pay, according to the above scale, and that the Committee on Military Affairs are hereby directed to report a bill accordingly.

On the question to consider this resolution, it was determined in the negative.

Mr. HOPKINSON after suggesting that he regarded as one of the most inauspicious circumstances that appeared in the general aspect of public affairs, the voting of immense sums of money when a great portion of the members, frequently not fewer than sixty, were absent—submitted the following resolution, which was read and ordered to lie on the table:

Resolved, That the following rule be added to the standing rules of the House, to wit: "If any member shall be absent at the taking of the yeas and nays on any question, he shall be considered as absent from the service of the House for that day, unless he have leave or be sick, and therefore unable to attend."

Unsettled Balances.

H. OF R.

UNSETTLED BALANCES.

Mr. HUGER said he had been so long out of Congress, and so lately become a member again, as yet not to have obtained that Parliamentary tact or feeling, which would enable him to judge whether the vote given a day or two ago, against taking up the resolution he had offered, on the subject of unsettled balances, had originated in a wish to yield a precedence to other business, or to give the go-by altogether to his resolution. He flattered himself, however, he would not allow himself to doubt, but that his motion to take up the resolution had been rejected for the last reason. Every gentleman who had turned his attention to these unsettled balances, and had only glanced his eye over the voluminous volumes in which they were contained, and which, year after year, and session after session, uselessly encumbered their tables, must feel a conviction, not only that there was great room, but in truth an urgent and imperious necessity, for inquiry and investigation in regard to them. This point admitted, it must also be admitted, that the present time was peculiarly favorable to such investigation. He had never witnessed, perhaps there never was a session since the existence of the Federal Government in which such general and reciprocal harmony, and such almost universal good humor prevailed in both branches of the Legislature. Party spirit, and party animosities, seemed to have disappeared—to have been banished from within these walls. What moment could be more auspicious, or better calculated for the consideration of subjects of this kind? He did not know how members could better dispose of their time, or in what they could more essentially serve their constituents and the public than by this investigation, and others of a similar nature.

The act requiring the annual publication of balances unsettled in the different departments, for three years previous, together with the names of those charged with such unsettled balances, had been passed by a Congress of which he was not a member. He could not, therefore, pretend to say what had been the particular objects in view when this measure was adopted. No doubt, however, that it was supposed likely to contribute in some way towards the settlement of outstanding accounts of the different departments. Perhaps it was thought that persons who might be, or had been, in the public service, and in the habit of handling public money, would feel some little delicacy, and be possibly deterred from allowing their accounts to remain so long unsettled, by the certainty of having their names thus brought before Congress, and thereby held up to the world. If such was the expectation, he was sorry to say it had, in a great measure, if not altogether, failed; for the most respectable names were to be found in the same columns with those who were probably real defaulters, and who thereby escaped, in a great degree, the opprobrium so richly their due. This was one among the many motives which induced him to wish an investigation of the subject. Another, was the amount of these balances. It was not a question in regard to hundreds or thousands, or tens of thousands. He could put his finger on unsettled balances of hundreds of thousands—in some instances of more than half a million of dollars.

He begged leave, therefore, again to call up his resolution. And here he would resume his seat, but some gentleman near him suggested a call of the yeas and nays. For himself, he had no wish or intention to demand them. On the contrary, he did not want the yeas and nays called. His object was not to excite party feeling, nor to animadvert upon any Administration, nor upon any description of men. His real and bona fide object was to have the business fairly and fully investigated; to learn how it happened that such enormous balances remained so long unliquidated and unsettled, and to see whether measures could not be devised to remedy, or at least check the growth of what appeared to him, and he believed to every gentleman who heard him, a serious evil. The time, as before observed, was peculiarly favorable to such an investigation; so much so, that if the House thought with him, he would be disposed to have select committees appointed to examine into the expenditure, accounts, and mode of settlement in each and every department. He verily believed that Congress could not adopt a measure which would be more grateful to their constituents, and to the Chief Executive Magistrate himself, nor one more likely to have a beneficial operation, as well in correcting any possible abuses heretofore, as in promoting a correct administration of the public revenue in time to come.

Mr. H. observed, it had become the fashion of the day to quote Latin. He would ask leave to contribute his mite to the common stock, and offer a Latin sentence to their consideration. He said it was an old and trite maxim, familiar to everybody, and which he recollected to have heard often quoted, when a boy, by an old-fashioned master of arithmetic, under whom he had studied. It nevertheless appeared to him by no means unworthy of the attention of even that honorable body, nor altogether inapplicable to the matter under discussion. It was to the following effect:

"Nullus tantus quæstus, quam quod habes parcere."

[At the last word Mr. H. hesitated somewhat, not being able to recall it immediately to mind; which excited considerable laughter. On recollection, however, he proceeded.]

Parcere, to economise, is the word, and a very significant and important word it was. At the moment, it had escaped his recollection; but this was not surprising, for it was a word not unfrequently forgotten by other honorable members in the House. No wonder, therefore, that the air of that hall, and an esprit de corps, had unexpectedly, and somewhat untowardly to be sure, affected his memory. He joined, however, with pleasure in the laugh, though at his own immediate expense. He did so the more willingly and readily, as he augured favorably to the success of his resolution from the good humor the House was in.

But as he appeared to have failed in making his Latin quotation, he would, before he sat down, endeavor to present it in an English dress; his translation would be a free one, but he trusted he should be able to make himself perfectly intelligible to honorable gentlemen.

In vain do you continue a high duty on salt—increase that upon whiskey. In vain is your tax upon sugar—and your stamp-tax. In vain you lay a direct tax of three millions on the lands throughout the Union; equally in vain do you double your duties on foreign importations, and propose a new and exorbitant tariff. All—all is in vain, perfectly in vain; unless, after the resources of the nation are thus drawn into your coffers, you take special care that the treasure is not wasted, and provide proper and sufficient checks against the undue expenditure and disbursement of it.

Mr. TUCKER made some observations, not distinctly heard, but which ended with a resolution to appoint a standing committee to superintend the expenditures of every particular department of Government.

Mr. PICKERING moved that the resolution should be laid on the table. It was accordingly ordered.

DEATH OF MR. BRIGHAM.

Mr. PICKERING then announced the death of his colleague Mr. BRIGHAM, and moved that a committee should be appointed to superintend his funeral. A committee of seven was accordingly appointed for the purpose.

Mr. PICKERING then moved that the House should, as a testimony of their respect for the deceased, wear a black crape on the left arm for a month, which was ordered. He then moved that the members of the House should attend the funeral at twelve o'clock to-morrow; and that a message should be sent to the Senate with information to that effect; which was all ordered.

The House then adjourned to Saturday.

SATURDAY, February 24.

Mr. YANCEY reported a bill for the relief of Ephraim Shayler, which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. PLEASANTS, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported a bill for the gradual increase of the Navy of the United States, which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

On motion of Mr. TUCKER, the Committee on the Judiciary were instructed to inquire into the expediency of so amending the laws of the United States, as to allow an appeal from the decision of the several Territorial courts.

WILLIAM P. LAWRENCE.

Mr. YANCEY, from the Committee of Claims, made a report on the petition of William P. Lawrence, which was read, and the resolution therein contained was concurred in by the House.

The report is as follows:

That the petitioner was a surgeon in the detachment of militia from Tennessee, called to the defence of New Orleans, in December, 1814; that, upon the return of the militia to Tennessee, in the month of March, 1815, the petitioner was ordered to be stationed at Bogue Chitto, in the State of Louisiana, with a number of men taken sick, on their return. The petitioner states that the disease of the soldiery became contagious, and, from the scarcity of servants to attend the sick, his own servant and slave was obliged to be employed as such; and that, while thus engaged in waiting on the sick, he took the disease and died. He asks of Congress to be paid his value.

The committee are of opinion he is not entitled to relief. If an officer of the Government thinks proper to take into his own service his slave in the capacity of servant, and receives the pay allowed for servants, instead of employing a freeman for that purpose, the United States should not be considered liable for his value in case of death or other loss to the owner.

It was the obvious and correct policy of the act of Congress, and it is evidently its intention, not to make the Government liable for the value of the servant, but to provide a sufficient compensation for his services.

The committee recommend the following resolution:

Resolved, That the prayer of the petitioner ought not to be allowed.

ELIZABETH HAMILTON.

Mr. COMSTOCK, from the Committee on Pensions and Revolutionary Claims, made a report on the petition of Elizabeth Hamilton, which was read; when Mr. C. reported a bill for the relief of Elizabeth Hamilton, which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole. The report is as follows:

That it is stated by the petitioner that her late husband, Alexander Hamilton, was, as she is advised, justly entitled to five years' full pay (as commutation of half-pay during life) of a lieutenant colonel, in which capacity he served in the regular Army of the United States during the Revolutionary war.

That her husband never received the said pay to which he was so entitled; that if he ever relinquished his claim to said pay, of which an apprehension is expressed by the petitioner, it was from the delicate motive of divesting himself of all interest upon the subject of making provision for the dishanded officers of the Revolutionary army who served during the war, in which important business he was called on to act, as a member of Congress, in the year 1782; and that the present situation of the family of her lamented husband renders it desirable that they should receive that remuneration to which he was justly entitled from his country. This remuneration, therefore, the petitioner respectfully solicits.

The committee are not aware of any public record or document showing the time at which Colonel Hamilton resigned his commission in the Army. From the uniform tenor of various letters of distinguished officers of the Revolutionary army, addressed to the Honorable Richard M. Johnson, as chairman of the Committee of Claims, in the year 1810, as well as from a brevet commission dated the 28th of October, 1782, by which Lieutenant Colonel Alexander Hamilton was promoted to the rank of Colonel by brevet in the Army of the United States, the committee entertain the opinion that Colonel Hamilton served during the war, and that he never received either half-pay during life, or full pay for five years in lieu thereof as commutation, to which he was entitled by law.

Of any relinquishment of Colonel Hamilton to the claim now asked to be satisfied, the committee possess no knowledge, except that derived from the apprehension expressed in the petition to which they have already adverted, and from a written document signed A. H., importing to be a statement of the temporal concerns of Colonel Hamilton in which allusion is made to a note by him signed, addressed to the Secretary of War, relinquishing the claim in question. The committee would further remark that, should a probability exist that Colonel Hamilton may have relinquished his said claim, and notwithstanding it is barred by the statute of limitation, nevertheless, as the services have been rendered to the country, by which its happiness and prosperity have been promoted, they are of opinion that, to reject the claim under the peculiar circumstances by which it is characterized, would not comport with that honorable sense of justice and magnanimous policy which ought ever to distinguish the legislative proceedings of a virtuous and enlightened nation.

They have therefore prepared a bill granting the relief solicited in the premises.

COMMERCE WITH GREAT BRITAIN.

The House again took up the report of the conferees on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment proposed by this House to the bill from the Senate "concerning the convention to regulate the commerce between the territories of the United States and His Britannic Majesty," and the modifications proposed by the said conferees being stated in the words following to wit:

That the House of Representatives recede from their amendment to strike out the words "and declared," contained in the enacting clause, and their other amendments to the bill from the Senate, and agree to the following amendments:

Line 2, of the engrossed bill, after word "act," strike out the words "or acts as is," and insert these words "as imposes a higher duty of tonnage or of impost on vessels, and articles imported in vessels of the United States."

Line 4, strike out the word "shall," and, after the word "be," insert the words "from and after the date of the ratification of the said convention, and during the continuance thereof."

The question was taken, Will the House recede from their amendments, and agree to the modification recommended by the conferees? it passed in the affirmative—yeas 100, nays 35, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alexander, Archer, Atherton, Baker, Barbour, Bassett, Bateman, Baylies, Bennett, Birdsall, Birdseye, Blount, Boss, Bradbury, Breckenridge, Brown, Burnside, Cannon, Champion, Cilley, Clopton, Comstock, Conduct, Conner, Creighton, Cuthbert, Darlington, Davenport, Forsyth, Glasgow, Goldsborough, Goodwyn, Griffin, Hahn, Hawes, Henderson, Herbert, Hopkinson, Ingham, Irving of New York, Jackson, Jewett, Johnson of Kentucky, Kent, Kerr of Virginia, Langdon, Law, Lewis, Lovett, Lowndes, Lumpkin, Lyle, Maclay, Mayrant, McCoy, McKee, McLean of Kentucky, McLean of Ohio, Middleton, Milnor, Moseley, Nelson of Virginia, Newton, Parris, Pickens, Pit-kin, Pleasants, Powell, Reed, Reynolds, Roane, Sergeant, Schenck, Smith of Pennsylvania, Smith of Maryland, Smith of Virginia, Southard, Stanford, Stearns, Strong, Stuart, Sturges, Taggart, Tallmadge, Taylor of New York, Taylor of South Carolina, Telfair, Townsend, Tucker, Vose, Wallace, Ward of Massachusetts, Wendover, Wheaton, Wilcox, Wilde, Williams, Willoughby, Thomas Wilson, and Yates.

NAYS—Messrs. Baer, Cady, Calhoun, Chappell, Clark of Kentucky, Cooper, Crawford, Desha, Edwards, Forney, Gaston, Hammond, Hanson, Heister, Huger, King of Massachusetts, Lyon, Mills, Moore, Nelson of Massachusetts, Ormsby, Pickering, Randolph, Robertson, Root, Sheffey, Thomas, Ward of New York, Whiteside, Wilkin, William Wilson, Woodward, Wright, and Yancey.

MILITARY SERVICES.

The House again resumed the consideration of the bill making further provision for military services during the late war and for other purposes, which occupied the remainder of the sitting.

Several amendments were successively offered to the bill, most of them verbal, and involving no principle—some of which were agreed to, and others rejected. Among the former was an amendment adopted, on motion of Mr. CANNON, to include the cases of those persons who shall have died after their return home, of wounds, &c. received in service. Among the rejected amendments was one offered by Mr. BIRDSEYE, to grant the allowance provided in the bill, to the father or mother, where there be no widow or child left by the decedent.

After several unsuccessful motions to lay the bill on the table and have it printed as amended, and to adjourn—

The bill was finally ordered, with the amendments, to be engrossed and read a third time.

MONDAY, February 26.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, presented a petition of John M. Forbes, late Consul of the United States at Hamburg, praying that the Secretary of State may be authorized to admit and pay such part of his claim for loss of exchange, interest, and other incidental charges, as may be found equitably due to him, on account of his expenditures for the relief and protection of destitute and distressed American seamen in European ports.—Referred to Messrs. SMITH, IRVING, of New York, and PITKIN.

Mr. BARBOUR presented a petition of Thomas Mallory, praying compensation for the time he was sick, while on a tour of militia duty, and for remuneration of his expenses while sick and returning to his place of residence.—Referred to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. TUCKER presented a petition of the Mayor, Alderman, and Common Council of the City of Washington, praying that the said city may be established as a port of entry.—Referred to the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures.

Mr. FORSYTH, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, reported a bill supplementary to the act passed on the 30th of March, 1802, to regulate trade and intercourse with the Indian tribes, and to preserve peace on the frontiers; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

An engrossed bill, entitled "An act making further provision for military services during the late war, and for other purposes," was read the third time and passed.

BOUNTY FOR MILITARY SERVICES.

Mr. YANCEY from the Committee of Claims, made a report on the petition of Abigail O'Flyng, which was read; when Mr. Y. reported a bill for the relief of Patrick O'Flyng, Abigail O'Flyng, and Edmund O'Flyng; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the whole House to-morrow.

The report is as follows:

That Abigail O'Flyng is the wife of Patrick O'Flyng, of the town of Batavia, in the State of New York. During the late war Patrick O'Flyng, and three of his sons, Patrick, Temple E., and Edmund O'Flyng, enlisted as soldiers in the army of the United States. The father continued in the service until the 28th of June, 1815, and was then honorably discharged; Edmund O'Flyng, the youngest son, on account of distinguished good conduct and bravery, was discharged from the service, and obtained a cadet's appointment in the Military Academy at West Point; Patrick O'Flyng, on account of his brave and meritorious conduct, was promoted to the appointment of a lieutenant, and Temple E. O'Flyng to that of ensign. Patrick led the forlorn of the first brigade, under the command of General Miller, in the sortie at Fort Erie; and of the twenty-four men whom he commanded, twenty were killed or wounded. Since the termination of the war he has died, without wife or child. Temple E. O'Flyng, on that memorable occasion, equally distinguished himself; he received a wound, of which he died the next day, leaving no wife or child.

The petitioner states that her husband, being old and infirm, is unable to attend to his business, and that she has made application to the War Department for the bounty land of her husband and sons, and has received for answer that her husband, Patrick O'Flyng, being above forty-five, and her youngest son, Edmund, being under eighteen, at the time of their enlistment, the act of Congress does not authorize the department to issue warrants for the land; and that, in consequence of the promotion of her other two sons, Patrick and Temple, to appointments in the Army, they are not entitled to their bounty lands.

The committee entertain no doubt that the construction of the act of Congress, given to it by the department, is correct; but they, at the same time, entertain no doubt of the equitable and just claim of the petitioner and her husband. Notwithstanding the father was above forty-five, and the youngest son under eighteen, they performed services, as soldiers, important and valuable to their country, and highly honorable to themselves and their family.

The committee are also of opinion that the claim of the petitioner and her husband, for the bounty land of Lieutenant and Ensign O'Flyng, is equally meritorious and just. It cannot possibly be the policy of the Government to withhold the bounty land of a soldier because he has distinguished himself by his bravery and good conduct so as to merit and receive an appointment in the Army.

The committee are of opinion that the persons interested are entitled to relief, and therefore report by bill.

Mr. YANCEY also made a report on the petition of Thomas Ap Catesby Jones, a Lieutenant in the Navy; which was read; when Mr. Y. reported a bill for the relief of Thomas Ap Catesby Jones; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

NATIONAL BANK.

The House having resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, Mr. NELSON, of Virginia, in the Chair, on that subject, the bill having been read, establishing a National Bank, with a capital of thirty-five millions of dollars—

Mr. CALHOUN rose to explain his views of a subject so interesting to the Republic, and so necessary to be correctly understood, as that of the bill now before the Committee. He proposed at this time only to discuss general principles, without reference to details. He was aware, he said, that principle and detail might be united, but he should at present keep them distinct. He did not propose to comprehend in this discussion the power of Congress to grant bank charters, nor the question whether the general tendency of banks was favorable or unfavorable to the liberty and prosperity of the country; nor the question whether a National Bank would be favorable to the operations of the Government. To discuss these questions, he conceived, would be an useless consumption of time. The Constitutional question had been already so freely and frequently discussed, that all had made up their mind on it. The question whether banks were favorable to public liberty and prosperity, was one purely speculative. The fact of the existence of banks, and their incorporation with the commercial concerns and industry of the nation, proved that inquiry to come too late. The only question was, on this hand, under what modifications were banks most useful, and whether the United States ought or ought not to exercise the power to establish a bank. As to the question whether a National Bank would be favorable to the administration of the finances of the Government, it was one on which there was so little doubt, that gentlemen would excuse him if he did not enter into it. Leaving all these questions then, Mr. C. said, he proposed to examine the cause and state of the disorders of the national currency, and the question whether it was in the power of Congress, by establishing a National Bank, to remove those disorders. This, he observed, was a question of novelty and vital importance—a question which greatly affected the character and prosperity of the country.

As to the state of the currency of the nation, Mr. C. proceeded to remark that it was extremely depreciated, and in degrees varying according to the different sections of the country, all would assent. That this state of the currency was a stain on public and private credit, and injurious to the morals of the community, was so clear a position as to require no proof. There were, however, other considerations arising from the state of the currency not so distinctly felt, nor so generally assented to. The state of our circulating medium was, he said, opposed to the principles of the Federal Constitution. The power was given to Congress by that instrument in express terms to regulate the currency of the United States. In point of fact, he said, that power, though given to Congress, is not in their hands. The power is exercised by banking institutions, no longer responsible for the correctness with which they manage it. Gold and silver have disappeared entirely; there is no money but paper money, and that money is beyond the control of Congress. No one, he said, who referred to the Constitution, could doubt that the money of the United States was intended to be placed entirely under the control of Congress. The only object the framers of the Constitution could have in view in giving to Congress the power "to coin money, regulate the value thereof and of foreign coin," must have been to give a steadiness and fixed value to the currency of the United States. The state of things at the time of the adoption of the Constitution, afforded Mr. C. an argument in support of his construction. There then existed, he said, a depreciated paper currency, which could only be regulated and made uniform by giving a power for that purpose to the General Government. The States could not do it. He argued, therefore, taking into view the prohibition against the States issuing bills of credit, that there was a strong presumption this power was intended to be exclusively given to Congress. Mr. C. acknowledged there was no provision in the Constitution by which States were prohibited from creating the banks which now exercised this power; but, he said, banks were then but little known; there was but one, the Bank of North America, with a capital of only four hundred thousand dollars; and the universal opinion was, that bank notes represented gold and silver, and that there could be no necessity to prohibit banking institutions under this impression, because their notes always represented gold and silver, and they could not be multiplied beyond the demands of the country. Mr. C. drew the distinction between banks of deposit and banks of discount, the latter of which were then but little understood, and their abuse not conceived until demonstrated by recent experience. No man, he remarked, in the Convention, much talent and wisdom as it contained, could possibly have foreseen the course of these institutions; that they would have multiplied from one to two hundred and sixty; from a capital of four hundred thousand dollars to one of eighty millions; from being consistent with the provisions of the Constitution, and the exclusive right of Congress to regulate the currency, that they would be directly opposed to it; that so far from their credit depending on their punctuality in redeeming their bills with specie, they might go on, ad infinitum, in violation of their contract, without a dollar in their vaults. There had, indeed, Mr. C. said, been an extraordinary revolution in the currency of the country. By a sort of under-current, the power of Congress to regulate the money of the country had caved in, and upon its ruin had sprung up those institutions which now exercised the right of making money for and in the United States—for gold and silver are not the only money, but whatever is the medium of purchase and sale, in which bank paper alone was now employed, and had, therefore, become the money of the country. A change, great and wonderful, has taken place, said he, which divests you of your rights, and turns you back to the condition of the Revolutionary war, in which every State issued bills of credit, which were made a legal tender and were of various value.

This, then, Mr. C. said, was the evil. We have in lieu of gold and silver a paper medium, unequally but generally depreciated, which affects the trade and industry of the nation; which paralyzes the national arm; which sullies the faith, both public and private, of the United States; a paper no longer resting on gold and silver as its basis. We have indeed laws regulating the currency of foreign coin, but they are under present circumstances a mockery of legislation, because there is no coin in circulation. The right of making money—an attribute of sovereign power, a sacred and important right—was exercised by two hundred and sixty banks, scattered over every part of the United States, not responsible to any power whatever for their issues of paper. The next and great inquiry was, he said, how this evil was to be remedied. Restore, said he, these institutions to their original use; cause them to give up their usurped power; cause them to return to their legitimate office of places of discount and deposit; let them be no longer mere paper machines; restore the state of things which existed anterior to 1813, which was consistent with the just policy and interests of the country; cause them to fulfil their contracts, to respect their broken faith, resolve that everywhere there shall be an uniform value to the national currency, your Constitutional control will then prevail.

How, then, he proceeded to examine, was the desirable end to be attained? What difficulties stand in the way? The reason why the banks could not now comply with their contract was that conduct which in private life frequently produces the same effect. It was owing to the prodigality of their engagements without means to fulfil them; to their issuing more paper than they could possibly redeem with specie. In the United States, according to the best estimation, there was not in the vaults of all the banks more than fifteen millions of specie, with a capital amounting to about eighty-two millions of dollars; hence the cause of the depreciation of bank notes—the excess of paper in circulation beyond that of specie in their vaults. This excess was visible to the eye, and almost audible to the ear; so familiar was the fact that this paper was emphatically called trash or rags. According to estimation, also, he said there were in circulation at the same date, within the United States, two hundred millions of dollars of bank notes, credits, and bank paper, in one shape or other. Supposing thirty millions of these to be in possession of the banks themselves, there were perhaps one hundred and seventy millions actually in circulation, or on which the banks draw interest. The proportion between the demand and supply which regulates the price of everything, regulates also the value of this paper. In proportion as the issue is excessive, it depreciates in value; and no wonder, when, since 1810 or 1811, the amount of paper in circulation had increased from eighty or ninety to two hundred millions. Mr. C. here examined the opinion entertained by some gentlemen that bank paper had not depreciated, but that gold and silver had depreciated, a position he denied by arguments founded on the portability of gold and silver which would equalize their value in every part of the United States, and on the facts, that gold and silver coin had increased in quantity instead of diminishing, and that the exchange with Great Britain had been (at gold and silver value) for some time past in favor of the United States. Yet, he said, gold and silver were leaving our shores. In fact, we have degraded the metallic currency; we have treated it with indignity, it leaves us, and seeks an asylum on foreign shores. Let it become the basis of bank transactions, and it will revisit us. Having established, as he conceived, in the course of his remarks, that the excess of paper issues was the true and only cause of depreciation of our paper currency, Mr. C. turned his attention to the manner in which that excess had been produced. It was intimately connected with the suspension of specie payments; they stood as cause and effect; first, the excessive issues caused the suspension of specie payments, and advantage had been taken of that suspension to issue still greater floods of it. The banks had undertaken to do a new business, uncongenial with the nature of such institutions; they undertook to make long loans to Government, not as brokers, but as stockholders—a practice wholly inconsistent with the system of specie payments. After showing the difference between the ordinary business of a bank in discounts, and the making loans for twelve years, Mr. C. said, indisputably the latter practice was a great and leading cause of the suspension of specie payments. Of this species of property (public stock) the banks in the United States held on the 30th day of September last about eighteen and a half millions, and a nearly equal amount of Treasury notes, besides stock for long loans made to the State governments, amounting, altogether, to within a small amount of forty millions, being a large proportion of their actual capital. This, he said, was the great cause of the suspension of specie payments. Had the banks (he now discussed the question) the capacity to resume specie payment? If they have the disposition, he said, they may resume specie payments. The banks are not insolvent, he said; they never were more solvent. If so, the term itself implies that, if time be allowed them, they may before long be in a condition to resume payment of specie. If the banks would regularly and consentaneously begin to dispose of their stock, to call in their notes for the Treasury notes they have, and moderately curtail their private discounts; if they would act in concert in this manner, they might resume specie payments. If they were to withdraw by the sale of a part only of their stock and Treasury notes, twenty-five millions of their notes from circulation, the rest would be depreciated to par, or nearly, and they would still have fifteen millions of stock disposable to send to Europe for specie, &c. With thirty millions of dollars in their banks, and so much of their payer withdrawn from circulation, they would be in a condition to resume payments in specie. The only difficulty, that of producing concert, was one which it belonged to Congress to surmount. The indisposition of the banks, from motives of interest, obviously growing out of the vast profits most of them have lately realized, by which the stockholders have realized from 12 to 20 per cent. on their stock, would be, he showed, the greatest obstacle. What, he asked, was a bank? An institution, under present uses, to make money. What was the instinct of such an institution? Gain, gain; nothing but gain; and they would not willingly relinquish their gain from the present state of things, which was profitable to them, acting as they did without restraint, and without hazard. Those who believed that the present state of things would ever cure itself, Mr. C. said, must believe what is impossible; banks must change their nature, lay aside their instinct, before they will aid in doing what it is not their interest to do. By this process of reasoning, he came to the conclusion that it rested with Congress to make them return to specie payments by making it their interest to do so. This introduced the subject of the National Bank.

A National Bank, he said, paying specie itself, would have a tendency to make specie payments general, as well by its influence as by its example. It will be the interest of the National Bank to produce this state of things, because otherwise its operations will be greatly circumscribed, as it must pay out specie or National Bank notes; for he presumed one of the first rules of such a bank would be to take the notes of no bank which did not pay in gold and silver. A National Bank of thirty-five millions, with the aid of those banks which are at once ready to pay specie, would produce a powerful effect all over the Union. Further, a National Bank would enable the Government to resort to measures which would make it unprofitable to banks to continue the violation of their contracts, and advantageous to return to the observation of them. The leading measures of this character would be to strip the banks refusing to pay specie of all the profits arising from the business of the Government, to prohibit deposits with them, and to refuse to receive their notes in payment of dues to the Government. How far such measures would be efficacious in producing a return to specie payments, he was unable to say; but it was as far as he would be willing to go at the present session. If they persisted in refusing to resume payments in specie, Congress must resort to measures of a deeper tone, which they had in their power.

FEBRUARY, 1816.

National Bank.

H. OF R.

The restoration of specie payments, Mr. C. argued, would remove the embarrassments on the industry of the country, and the stains from its public and private faith. It remained to see whether this House, without whose aid it was in vain to expect success in this object, would have the fortitude to apply the remedy. If this was not the proper remedy, he hoped it would be shown by the proposition of a proper substitute, and not opposed by vague and general declamation against banks. The disease, he said, was deep; it affected public opinion, and whatever affects public opinion touches the vitals of the Government. Hereafter, he said, Congress would never stand in the same relation to this measure in which they now did. The disease arose in time of war; the war had subsided, but left the disease, which it was now in the power of Congress to eradicate; but, if they did not now exercise the power, they would become abettors of a state of things which was of vital consequence to public morality, as he showed by various illustrations. He called upon the House, as guardians of the public weal, of the health of the body politic which depended on the public morals, to interpose against a state of things which was inconsistent with either. He appealed to the House, too, as the guardians of public faith and private faith. In what manner, he asked, were the public contracts fulfilled? In gold and silver, in which the Government had stipulated to pay? No; in paper issued by these institutions; in paper greatly depreciated; in paper depreciated from five to twenty per cent. below the currency in which the Government had contracted to pay, &c. He added another argument: the inequality of taxation in consequence of the state of the circulating medium, which, notwithstanding the taxes were paid with strict regard to the Constitutional provision for their equality, made the people in one section of the Union pay perhaps one-fifth more of the same tax than those in another. The Constitution having given Congress the power to remedy these evils, they were, he contended, deeply responsible for their continuance.

The evil he desired to remedy, Mr. C. said, was a deep one; almost incurable, because connected with public opinion, over which banks have a great control; they have, in a great measure, a control over the press. For proof of which, he referred to the fact that the present wretched state of the circulating medium had scarcely been denounced by a single paper within the United States. The derangement of a circulating medium, he said, was a joint thrown out of its socket; let it remain for a short time in that state, and the sinews will be so knit that it cannot be replaced; apply the remedy soon, and it is an operation easy, though painful. The evil grows, whilst the resistance to it becomes weak; and, unless checked at once, will become irresistible. Mr. C. concluded by observing, that he could have said much more on this important subject, but he knew how difficult it was to gain the attention of the House to long addresses.

Mr. RANDOLPH, in explaining an allusion which Mr. CALHOUN had made to a remark of his on a former occasion, said that he had listened to the honorable gentleman with pleasure; he was glad to see a cause so important in hands so able. He promised the honorable gentleman, though he might not agree in his mode of remedying the evil, he would go with him in the application of any adequate remedy to an evil which he regarded as most enormous.

Mr. WARD, of Massachusetts, acknowledged the correctness of the representation of the existing evil, for which he appeared to think the remedy was near at hand and more simple in its application than the establishment of a National Bank, viz: by refusing to receive the notes of those banks, which do not pay specie, in dues to the Government. But for an alliance, which he considered disgraceful to the country and unjust to individuals, between the Secretary of the Treasury and the banks which refused to pay specie, the evil never would have existed. If Congress adopted the measure which he (Mr. W.) proposed, those banks must go down and public credit rise. Why not resort at first to the obvious expedient, and then proceed to the consideration of the less urgent question of establishing a National Bank? The banks, who it was now agreed had engaged in a business for which they were not calculated, having received a sufficient bonus for the loans they made to Government, and made handsome profits by it, had no claim on Government to protect them in their refusal to pay specie. Mr. W. rose not to propose any amendment to the bill, but to express his entire coincidence in the gentleman's opinion that a great evil exists, which Congress had the power to remedy; and, if the remedy were not immediately applied, on them would be the responsibility and the blame.

Mr. SERGEANT moved to amend the first section of the bill by striking out the words "thirty-five," and inserting "twenty," as the amount of the capital of the bank. He did not intend, he said, to go into a general consideration of the principle of the bill, or of the motion now submitted by him. He made the motion on the ground of the facts and arguments just delivered by the gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. CALHOUN.) From the quantity of paper stated to be in circulation, he thought the calculation fair that the amount proposed to be added to the existing bank capital was larger than necessary, and entered into some calculations to support the propriety of his motion.

Mr. CALHOUN hoped the motion would not prevail, and replied briefly to the calculations of Mr. SERGEANT. The necessity of a larger capital consisted, he said, in the important functions to be performed by the National Bank. The desirable point was to fix the capital so large as to prevent undue profit, and so as to prevent a loss to the stockholders. Perhaps a bank of twenty millions might afford a fair profit, but the great business it would have to perform made a larger capital necessary.

Mr. PITKIN supported the motion to reduce the capital. He thought the banking capital of the country already too great, and offered a few calculations to prove the position. In 1805, 1806, and 1807, said he, when the commerce of the country was very great, our banking capital did not exceed fifty or sixty millions; and yet, in those times, no complaint was heard of the deficiency of capital. If not more than that amount was wanted, then, is it possible that one hundred and thirty or one hundred and forty millions can be necessary at this time? Mr. P. declared himself in favor of a National Bank, if it could be established on good principles, such as would restore the old state of things when bank notes were paid with specie. If, however, the bill passed with its present capital, it would in his opinion increase the evil instead of proving a remedy. Such a capital was not necessary, either, for the purposes wanted. As to loans, no bank could make long loans without stopping the payment of specie and destroying the circulating medium; and to support the assertion, he quoted the fate of various banks in Europe. A large capital for that purpose, therefore, was unnecessary. Loans, he said, must be made by individuals; it cannot be done by banks, without ruin; and a large capital was not necessary, therefore, to enable the Government to obtain from the bank all the aid it could or ought properly to receive. Nor would a large capital, he said, restore the old state of things—that must be done by the co-operation of the large banks in the cities; the specie has got into those banks, and there it will remain until they resume the payment of it. Mr. P. said, likewise, he was unwilling to place fifty millions of money in the hands of any set of men in this country. They would use it oppressively; the old Bank of the United States had done so, and so would this. Such a power would enable them to wield the destinies of this nation. For this strong reason, Mr. P. said, as well as the others he had stated, he was in favor of reducing the capital; and, to allow more time to reflect on this important feature of the bill, he moved that the Committee rise.

After a few remarks by Mr. CALHOUN, on what had fallen from Mr. PITKIN, the Committee rose, reported progress, and obtained leave to sit again.

TUESDAY, February 27.

Mr. KING, of Massachusetts, presented petitions from the merchants in the towns of York and Castine, in the District of Maine, complaining of the monopolizing policy of the British Government, in securing to the vessels of that nation the exclusive right to trade between the United States and the British West Indies, and North American possessions, as well as to the fisheries; and praying that such measures may be adopted as will counteract the said policy, and tend to the admission of American vessels in the trade aforesaid.—Referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. SERGEANT presented a petition of the American Convention for promoting the abolition of Slavery, stating their belief that the act prohibiting the importation of slaves is evaded in the southern part of the Union, and praying that the provisions of the said act may be strengthened, and its penalties increased; and that measures may be adopted to prevent the frequent practices of kidnapping free negroes.—Referred to Messrs. SERGEANT, TAYLOR of South Carolina, WRIGHT, WILDE, and CADY.

Mr. NELSON, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported a bill to establish an uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. ROBERTSON, from the Committee on the Public Lands, reported on the expediency of selling forfeited lands in the Jeffersonville district, which was read; when Mr. R. reported a bill to authorize the sale of lands forfeited to the United States, in the district of Jeffersonville, at the land office in said district; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. ROBERTSON also reported a bill providing for the sale of the tract of land at the British fort at the Miami of the Lake, at the foot of the Rapids, and for other purposes; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. ROBERTSON also reported a bill providing for the sale of the tract of land at the lower rapids of Sandusky river; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

On motion of Mr. FORSYTH, the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures were instructed to inquire into the expediency of passing an act declaring the consent of Congress to an act of the Legislature of Georgia, passed on the 12th of December, 1804, establishing the fees of the harbor master and health officer of the ports of Savannah and St. Mary's.

On motion of Mr. CREIGHTON, the Committee on the Public Lands were instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing by law for the sale of the lands of the United States within that tract of country in the State of Ohio heretofore set apart and reserved for satisfying the claims of refugees from the British Provinces of Canada and Nova Scotia.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported on the following subjects of inquiry, &c., referred to that committee. 1st. That it is inexpedient at this time to make additional provision by law for military transportation. 2. That no provision is necessary to be made for paying certain corps of volunteers in Maine, the President being already fully empowered by existing laws to do so. 3d. That it is inexpedient to assume the payment of interest on unpaid sums which may have been due for military services. 4th. That no further provision is necessary at this time for printing and distributing the militia and military laws and articles of war. 5th. Unfavorable reports on the petitions of Isidore Remensin and Christopher Colles. The above reports were ordered to lie on the table.

UNSETTLED ACCOUNTS.

Mr. HUGER called up the resolution submitted a few days ago by him, to inquire into the manner of keeping certain public accounts, and into the amount and cause of the great balances now standing against individuals, on the books of the Comptroller, &c.

Mr. ROBERTSON made some remarks to enforce the propriety of the inquiry. He had no doubt there was great defalcation and abuse in the public accounts, and hoped the inquiry would be effectually followed up. He adverted to the remissness which he believed to exist in some of the salary officers in the Government, in relation to the settlement of the public accounts. In some instances, he said, the accounting officers had raised accounts against those who had none with the Government, with no other effect than to screen villains who depredate on the public treasure. That there were swindlers and defaulters among the public agents, that there were men who fattened on the spoils of Government, he had no doubt, and the best way to screen them was to foist into their company the names of those whom they know to be of a different character.

Mr. CONDUCT approved the principle embraced in the resolution, but asked the mover, Mr. HUGER, whether the inquiry did not belong to the Committee on Public Expenditure, and referred to the standing rule of the House, which requires them to superintend the expenditures of money in the different Departments, and report whether disbursements have been made agreeably to law, &c.

That committee, he said, most probably had already progressed in the inquiry, and if so, he thought it would not be prudent at so late a day in the session, to take it from them and place it in other hands. These balances, he said, had at a former session been referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, upon a resolution moved by himself, instructing that committee to inquire and report, what further legal provisions were necessary to enforce payment, and prevent future delinquencies. A gentleman from Virginia, in the last session of the 12th Congress, instituted an inquiry through a committee, in the hope, as he expressed it, "that if they could not destroy the mammoth, the great beast of the forest, they might at least be able to poison the rats." This rat-catching committee, as it had been facetiously termed, after spending much time and labor, in turning over the cart-loads of documents and papers thrown upon them to stifle the inquiry, made a report at the close of the session, and there it ended. Such an inquiry, said Mr. C., to be productive of any beneficial result to the nation, should be divided and subdivided among different committees, giving to each a distinct object, to be pursued minutely in all its intricate winding, and in that way only, in his opinion, could the errors be remedied. Such a course, he should be glad to see pursued at an early period of the session. For these reasons, he should prefer the method proposed by another gentleman, (Mr. TUCKER,) which by distributing the investigation, and dividing the labors, would best promote the public interest.

Mr. HUGER replied to Mr. CONDUCT, and offered some further remarks to obviate the objections urged against the inquiry. He believed the object he had in view was practicable, and that great good would grow out of it. For one, he would be willing, should he be selected, to devote his utmost exertions and labor to an end so important; not that he expected to expose or detect defaulters—for he knew not that there was a single one—but for the satisfaction and benefit to be derived from such a report. One of the objects also of the inquiry was to aid the public officers and facilitate their operation, &c.

After a few words more by Mr. CONDUCT, the resolution was agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That a select committee of five members be appointed to examine, generally, into the subject of unsettled balances due the United States, and especially into the annual statements, laid before Congress by the Comptroller of the Treasury, in conformity to an act of the 3d of March, 1809, requiring that annual statements should be laid before Congress, of the accounts in the Treasury, War, and Navy Departments, which may have remained more than three years unsettled, or on which balances appear to have been due more than three years, prior to the 30th September, then last past; to investigate the causes which have given rise to such unsettled balances; to recommend such measures as may, in their opinion, be most likely to bring defaulters to a speedy settlement of their accounts, and prevent, in time to come, the recurrence and continuance of unsettled balances to such an amount.

Mr. HUGER, Mr. BARBOUR, Mr. CONDUCT, Mr. LYON, and Mr. FORNEY, were appointed a committee pursuant to the said resolution.

NATIONAL BANK.

The House went into Committee of the Whole on the Bank bill. Mr. SERGEANT's motion to reduce the proposed capital from thirty-five to twenty millions being under consideration—

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, rose to express his views of the subject generally, as well as on the particular point under consideration. He appeared to coincide in opinion with Mr. CALHOUN, that the establishment of a Bank of the United States would contribute better than any other measure to the restoration of a general medium of circulation of uniform value. He was afraid that it was the only remedy. Perhaps he should not agree with the gentleman in some of his positions, particularly as respected the conduct and state of the banks. It might be prudent on the part of Congress, he remarked, to let down these institutions as gently as they could, and do everything to enable them to meet their engagements by specie payments on some future day. With some modification of the plan proposed by this bill, he thought the establishment of a National Bank would effectually contribute to that object. The banks pending the war were the pillars of the nation, on which and through whose instrumentality the Government was enabled to raise money and men to carry on the war, not only by their direct loans, but by enabling individuals to make loans to the Government. Now, that we could do without them, they had been called caterpillars. He would not call those caterpillars now, who, in war, had been the pillars of the Government. The information of the gentleman in relation to the state of the banks might be very good, but it did not coincide with the information or impressions of Mr. S., who took a different view of it. He thought that, as far as he had information, the banks had not issued more notes than, from the amount of their capitals, they had a fair right to do. Adverting to Mr. C.'s statement of the number of the banks, (he wished there were not so many,) and of their capital, he differed from the view which estimated the amount on which they draw interest, at an hundred and seventy millions. But deducting from this amount the loans, &c., estimated at forty millions, an hundred and thirty millions would remain, at the estimated amount on which the banks draw interest, with a capital of eighty-two millions. Was this too much? With much less could the banks pay bank expenses, and make a reasonable dividend? But, might not the gentleman have been mistaken, even in this estimate? Mr. S. thought he was, and supported this impression by a reference to such documents on the subject as were within his reach. He referred to the document on the table, showing the state of the chartered banks within the District of Columbia. He was rather inclined to believe that these banks had gone a little further than most of the banks of the United States in their issues, the cause of which might be traced to the large loans to the Government. The amount of the capital paid in by all these banks was $3,321,600; the bills and notes discounted $4,980,031. Was this too large a business on their capital? These banks, than which perhaps no banks in the Union had done larger business, had not discounted more than fifty per cent. beyond the amount of their capital paid in. As to the amount of paper which the gentleman estimated to be in circulation, Mr. S. differed widely from him. Instead of two hundred millions of dollars of paper being in circulation on a capital of eighty-two millions, he doubted whether the amount was half that of the capital of the banks, say forty-one millions of dollars. He had some acquaintance with the operations of banks from his practice in them. Some banks could put out more paper than others from their particular situation; but, in general, banks did not issue paper to more than half the amount of their capital. The notes of the banks of this District were more depreciated than any others, and if the depreciation was in fact owing to excessive issues, it might be presumed that they had issued more largely than banks generally. These banks had notes in circulation to the amount of $2,094,000; a greater proportion of notes to their capital than banks generally have in circulation; but only three-fifths of the amount of the capital paid in. There were not now in circulation, Mr. S. verily believed, as many bank notes, properly so called, as there were prior to the stoppage of specie payments. Banks everywhere were endeavoring to draw in their notes. Mr. S. concluded on this point, that, as the banks had demonstrably not been prodigal in the issue of their paper, its depreciation was not owing to the excess of issue. This brought Mr. S. to another point of Mr. CALHOUN's speech, in which they concurred in opinion. To the long loans, he agreed, in a great measure, might be attributed the depreciation of the paper of this city, of Baltimore, Philadelphia, and of New York. But he was not disposed to censure the banks for having made those loans. On the contrary, said he, they aided you in times of need. I give them credit for it. I would nurse them and bring them back to the same healthy state as before they reduced themselves to serve you. At the same time Mr. S. said he agreed that it was the duty of the banks to resume specie payments so soon as it was possible to do it without loss. If they did not do it, they ought to be compelled to do it; and through the instrumentality of a Bank of the United States, the Government might be able to coerce them. The loans made to the Government had been principally confined to the country between the Hudson and the Potomac; a small amount only had been obtained north and south of these limits. The notes obtained by the Treasury by way of loan, were disbursed in other quarters of the country than that in which they were obtained. They had been thrown back upon the banks, and specie demanded for them; with which demand, made in large quantities, the banks found themselves unable to comply. The gentleman had given his opinion how the evil might be remedied. This remedy, Mr. S. went on to observe, he was one of those who had pressed on the directors of the banks of the city he had the honor to represent. All the banks had to do, he said, was to send their millions of stock to the eastward and southward, sell their stock, and thus change the balance of exchange and trade in their favor. When they should do that, the cause of the depreciation of their paper being removed, Mr. S. said we should hear no more of it. In less than three months, those States which now had the advantage of the exchange would be the debtor States. The difference in exchange was little more than nominal, very little specie being paid in any part of the country. Where bank notes were nominally at par, the banks did very little or no business, and had comparatively no notes out. If merchants negotiated with those banks, they did not receive or pay them specie, but paper. Mr. S. coincided in Mr. C.'s view, that if all the banks agreed to resume specie payments, they might do it. But he would use no coercion now to hasten the period, but suffer them to do it peaceably and quietly, and therefore safely.

Adverting to the observation in debate yesterday respecting an alliance between the Secretary of the Treasury and the banks, which had prevented Treasury notes from becoming a circulating medium, &c., Mr. S. vindicated the conduct of the Treasury. Could the Secretary do otherwise, he asked, than receive the public dues in the currency of the country where they were collected? The Secretary had further undertaken (Mr. S. doubted whether that officer had not in this gone too far) to say that the paper of those banks which did not receive Treasury notes and issue them again, should not be received in payment of debts due to the Government.

Gentlemen were mistaken, Mr. S. said, if they supposed they could make Treasury notes a circulating medium—experience had proved it. Referring to the value of Treasury notes, depreciated gradually in their progress from this District to Boston, he remarked that, although they were six per cent. above par at Baltimore, they were not there as valuable as the note of a merchant at New York. It would, it was true, be a great convenience if Government could issue a paper of this sort, which would serve as a circulating medium, but it could not; whatever paper was put out of that sort, would become an article of merchandise, to be bought and sold. The community was now accustomed to bank notes, and partial to them; and their place could not be supplied by Government paper.

As to the motion now under consideration to reduce the capital, Mr. S. said, he had not expected it from a gentleman from Pennsylvania, and particularly not from the gentleman who made it. Reverting to the period of the establishment of the Bank of the United States, he said, ten millions bore a larger proportion to the uses and demands of that day, than thirty-five millions did to those of this. The price of everything was then very low—commerce in its infancy, the shipping of the United States extremely and almost incredibly limited, &c. It was impossible that any man could suppose that a bank of the same amount could now perform the functions which the Bank of the United States then performed, particularly, since the Government had spread taxes over the whole surface of the country, and made the aid of this institution more extensively necessary. With a reduced capital, Mr. S. said, the operations of the bank would be so circumscribed, that it would afford but little aid to merchants. He was not, indeed, very tenacious, he said, about four or five millions of capital, more or less, but he did not think thirty-five millions at all too much.

Mr. S. said he was not entirely satisfied with the plan of the bank, proposed by the committee; but might not the plan be so modified as to meet the views of a large majority of the House? He could find but few gentlemen, he said, who, in conversation, did not appear favorable to the establishment of a bank. Some preferred a plan less complex than the present; some were hostile to the control of the Government in it, in which, perhaps, they were right. Others were hostile to Treasury notes forming any part of the capital; in which, Mr. S. said, he concurred. Where was the difficulty in yielding those minor points, for the sake of obtaining a general concurrence in favor of the bill? Other features were objected to—the power to authorize suspension of payments in specie, &c.—these he would also give up, rather than they should defeat the bill altogether. As to the question, when the specie payments of the bank should commence, Mr. S. said, according to the proposed mode of payment, it would not be very soon. To remedy this objection, he proposed that, for the seven millions of Treasury notes to be paid in on account of the United States, there should be substituted a stock to be created for the purpose, bearing an interest of five per cent. per annum, which would leave a gain to the United States (the bank dividing eight per cent.) of three per cent. per annum on that amount; which would, by its accumulation and proper application, in the course of twenty years, absorb the whole of that stock, and operate as a bonus to the United States to that amount. He also showed, by calculation, that the United States, in this mode, by merely advancing their credit, might absorb twelve millions of the war debt; which he believed would be no unpalatable thing to the people, nor unwise in the Government. Further, Mr. S. said, he wished to see the bank go immediately into operation, that, while he lived, he might derive some advantage from it. He would therefore wish to see the whole of the specie part of the stock paid in within a given number of months. With seven millions of dollars in its vaults, the bank would have neither fear nor trembling in commencing specie operations; they would have time to send their stock to Europe for sale, or make such other arrangements as, in their opinion, might be proper. The specie thus paid in, would not drain the State banks, but would be imported, for the purpose, from Europe and elsewhere. In the meantime, he said, until all the specie payments were made to the bank, he did not think it would do any harm if the bank were to commence its operations without specie, but with an assurance in its charter, of payment of specie at a particular day. Such an assurance would make the bank notes equally good, in his eyes at least, as gold and silver. With these views of the subject, Mr. S. concluded his practical speech.

Mr. SERGEANT spoke as follows:

Mr. Chairman, the honorable member from Maryland (Mr. SMITH) has expressed his surprise that this motion should be made by a member from Pennsylvania, and still more that it should have been made by a member from Philadelphia, meaning, it would seem, to express his surprise that a member from Philadelphia should be willing to give up the great influence and advantage that city would derive from being the seat of such a bank. He (Mr. S.) should have supposed that gentleman had been long enough in public life to believe that a member of this House might sometimes lose sight of a personal or local advantage, when a measure of great national importance and concern is under consideration. So he considered the present bill.

He made this motion, he said, principally for two reasons. First, because it appeared to him, from the statements made by the chairman of the committee who reported the bill, that the capital proposed by the bill (thirty-five millions) is larger than is necessary; and, in the next place, to give gentlemen an opportunity fully to explain their views on this very interesting subject. He held it to be a sound rule in legislation to abstain from acting until you are satisfied that what you are about to do is right. If you have doubts—if the effect of the measure proposed is involved in uncertainty—if you do not clearly see your way—it is wise to hesitate, to pause, and to consider. This subject, particularly, deserved the most deliberate and careful consideration. It was not, he said, an ordinary act of legislation which Congress might at their pleasure repeal, if upon trial it should be found inconvenient or mischievous, which would be constantly under their control from session to session, to modify, to alter, to abrogate. The proposed act of legislation was to continue in force for twenty years; there would be no power within that period to repeal it. It was, besides, to create a vast machine of incalculable force, the direction of whose momentum was to be placed in the hands of they knew not whom. Within a very few years past, a similar but less extensive question arose upon the application to renew the charter of the late Bank of the United States. It agitated the nation from one extreme to the other. The agitation was strongly felt in this House—the memory of it was too recent to be forgotten. By some of those who opposed the renewal, it was asserted that Congress had no Constitutional power to grant a charter of incorporation to a bank; by others, that the powers of that corporation had been exercised in a manner that was unjust, oppressive, and dangerous to the people. Without at all yielding to either of these opinions, the impression of which could not be so soon worn out, he must be allowed to say that the mere fact of their having been very seriously and very generally inculcated, gave to the subject under consideration peculiar importance. If, as gentlemen then alleged, it was believed that great injury had been done by that bank, they, at least, ought to be very cautious in adopting the present plan, which had certainly, in every respect, a much more formidable aspect, and which was so little understood that the best informed and most intelligent of its advocates did not seem to agree even as to essential points. The two gentlemen who had discussed the matter, differed in some very important particulars; they did not even seem to agree whether it was to be, in effect, a specie bank or a paper bank. He protested, he said, most seriously against this sort of legislation, which proceeded without distinctly settling principles, and left everything to hazard. He protested against establishing a great National Bank upon the apparent basis of specie, without something approaching to a certainty that it would be able to pay in specie, against its professing to pay specie, with a considerable risk of its being obliged in a short time to break its faith, and in that way aggravate the malady it was intended to cure. The question, he said, ought first to be decided, whether we were to have a specie bank or paper bank. That being decided, then proceed upon a plain, simple, intelligible plan, in conformity with the decision. The plan proposed was complicated and unintelligible. The capital was to be composed of United States stock, of Treasury notes, and a small proportion of specie. The specie was to be paid in instalments, and there could be no doubt that the bank would never receive from its subscribers a greater quantity of specie than the first instalment. With a nominal capital, then, of thirty-five millions of dollars, and so small a proportion of specie, with what greater propriety could it be called a specie bank, than the Bank of Pennsylvania, for instance? That bank, having a capital of two million five hundred thousand dollars, possesses one million eight hundred thousand dollars of United States stock, and upwards of four hundred thousand dollars in specie. Yet that was a bank that did not pay specie. He admitted that the Bank of Pennsylvania had discounted to a large amount, that it had large deposits, and that it had paper in circulation; in one word, that it was in full operation as a bank. But was not the proposed bank, if the bill then under discussion should become a law, to go into operation, and to go into operation upon the common principles of banking? Would not the stockholders and the directors be governed by what was termed "commercial instinct?" Would they not be desirous of making profit and making dividends? Was there in this bill any peculiar restraint to prevent them from trading to excess? The obligation to pay in specie was no restriction, no effectual restriction, for the State banks were compellable by law to pay their notes with specie, and as far therefore as any legal restraints could guard them, they were safe.

If the suspension of specie payments, on the excessive issue of bank paper, he said, were the cause of the evils that were complained of, and the State banks deserved to be censured for producing them; if we were to adopt the theory in its full extent, that traces every existing mischief in the circulation to one or both these causes, what is the lesson we ought to derive from this consideration? The State banks—he meant the principal ones—up to the period of the capture of Washington, continued to pay specie. If that circumstance was to be regarded as a proper test of their conduct, they were till then without blame; they might be considered, at least with the exception of the loans to Government, as having conducted their business upon fair principles. Of those loans, he would say nothing further than that he did not think that they, a constituent part of the Government, could justly censure them; they were necessary to the Government, they were necessary for the purposes of defence, and, in some instances, the banks were compelled into them by the force of public sentiment. In truth, without the aid of the banks afforded to the Government, either by direct loans or through the medium of loans to States and individuals, the exertions of the country must have been arrested—the Government would have been at a stand for want of money. These banks, therefore, have a meritorious claim to the public consideration. But if specie payments, in other words, the capacity to meet all the probable demands for specie, be the just criterion, what was the state of the matter then? It has been thought a safe rule in banking, and it had been, he believed, adopted as a rule, that a bank might safely lend, and was prudent in lending, to the amount that in ordinary, in the usual course of its business, judging from experience, would not expose it to demands greater than it was able to meet. This rule, founded upon experience in ordinary times, was adapted to that state of things from which it was deduced—to ordinary times and ordinary circumstances—when an extraordinary emergency arose, producing extraordinary and urgent and unexpected demands for specie, the rule would fail, and any general rule would fail. That, he said, was the true state of the matter; immediately upon the capture of Washington, a general alarm was spread throughout the country, every possible danger was apprehended. Indeed, the fears and anxiety of that moment were not confined within the limits even of possibility. A run upon the banks for specie was the consequence. It is not material to inquire why that run was made; want of confidence was the immediate cause of it. Would the proposed bank, he asked, be more securely guarded, or less exposed to similar difficulties. Would it not, with a view to the interest of its stockholders, be governed by similar principles? Nay, was there not a chance, under existing circumstances, that it would, almost at its outset, be involved in the same difficulties that have thus, gradually, and by the occurrence of extraordinary circumstances fallen upon the State banks? Was it certain that it would be able to pay specie? And, if it should not, would it not deserve a much severer censure, would it not, with its immense capital and power, inflict upon the community much greater evils than the State banks were supposed to have occasioned? Would it not be infinitely disgraceful, that, professing to pay specie, it should be obliged at the very commencement of its operations to dishonor its bills, to violate its engagements at the moment of entering into them?

When the Bank of the United States was established in 1791, the difficulties experienced, and which it was intended to aid in removing, were of an opposite character; the bank started with entirely different views. In 1791, the object was to increase the active or productive capital of the country, which was then deficient; there was not a sufficient circulation. The evil now complained of is an excess of circulation, and the remedy is to be the same in the one disease as in the other. The same remedy that was employed to increase a deficient circulation is to be applied for reducing a circulation that is said to be excessive. There was a wide distinction between the evils that were then supposed to exist, and those now complained of. It is not very easy to see how the surcharged circulation is to be removed by throwing in the additional quantity of paper that is to be issued by this bank.

The late Bank of the United States went into operation with a capital of ten millions of dollars; it had but ten millions of capital through all the period of its existence. This capital, he presumed, was found to be sufficient. The present scheme proposed a capital of thirty-five millions, with a power to increase it to fifty millions. So great an enlargement of capital, at so short a distance of time as four years from the expiration of the former charter, imposed it as a duty upon those who advocated the bill to show, distinctly, why so large a capital was necessary. Let us, said he, examine the data for a moment, that have been furnished by gentlemen who maintain its necessity. Our commercial transactions, says one, have increased in the proportion of five to one since the establishment of the Bank of the United States. Money, says another, is but of half the value it then was. Supposing both these statements to be correct, gentlemen had entirely lost sight of a most material consideration, which ought to enter into the estimate, and without which their estimate could not possibly be correct. In the year 1791 there were but three banks in the United States; their capitals did not altogether exceed three millions of dollars, and probably did not amount to so much. Now, there were stated to be two hundred and sixty-two banks, and their aggregate capital was said to exceed eighty millions of dollars. If, therefore, our trade had increased in the proportion of five to one, and money is but half the value, the bank capital of the country had increased in a still greater proportion; it was probably at this time more than twenty times as great as it was in 1791. It was perfectly evident, upon the gentleman's own grounds, that, for commercial purposes, no additional bank capital was necessary, much less such an enormous capital as was proposed by the bill. The amount of capital, indeed, was upon these grounds sufficient of itself to supersede all the State banks.

That such an amount of capital was necessary for the purpose of supplying an uniform medium of circulation, or how it was to restore the depreciated paper of the country to its value, gentlemen had equally failed to establish. They ought to have shown us, first, what amount of that kind of circulation was necessary, and how it was to operate, then we might endeavor to ascertain what amount a given capital was capable of supplying. If he understood correctly the statement made by the chairman of the committee who reported the bill, he had himself shown that his object did not require so large a capital, nor anything like it. That statement would show that not even twenty millions were requisite. The banks now in existence, he stated, now draw an interest upon about one hundred and seventy millions, of which about forty millions are in public stock. If, as he had stated, they would draw in ten per cent. upon that amount, say seventeen millions, or at the utmost twenty-five millions, which they might do by a sale of their stock, their paper would recover a par (specie) value. Without entering at all into an examination of the correctness of this statement, either as to the matter of fact or the hypothesis, it was sufficient to remark that in substance it amounted to this: The excess of circulation, which has caused the depreciation of bank paper, is some where between seventeen and twenty-five millions. Let us, said Mr. S., admit this to be true, can it then be necessary, in order to effect a reduction to that extent of between seventeen and twenty-five millions, can it be necessary to put in operation a bank of thirty-five millions? It would, of course, be governed by the same commercial instinct that had been ascribed to the other banks; it would extend its business for the purposes of profit, and would endeavor to create a circulation in the same proportion to its capital. How was the circulation, thus to be created, to operate? It must, he said, either displace the circulation of the existing banks, to a much greater extent than was supposed by the statement to be necessary, or it must be added to that circulation, and in either way it would be injurious. In the one case, its effect upon the State banks was too evident to require elucidation—in the other, it would only aggravate existing evils by increasing the supposed excess.

He repeated, there was nothing in the bill to save this bank from the same extremity of difficulty—from bankruptcy, if gentlemen choose so to term it, which the existing banks had endured. He did not mean, however, to join in unqualified censure of the State banks, much less did he mean to censure them for the loans which the Government, and the public sentiment had in some instances urged them to make, to a greater extent, perhaps, than they ought to have done, and which ought not to be indiscriminately attributed to interest and cupidity. Neither would he insist upon their adopting, at once, measures injurious to themselves, and to all who were in any way concerned with them. These institutions had become connected, very extensively, with the business and the interests of the community. There could be no pressure upon them, that would not press with still greater severity upon the people in a great variety of ways. Give them a reasonable time, he said, if they will not make a fair effort, then coerce them. But he was extremely unwilling to resort to a very doubtful experiment, which, if it did not succeed as you wished, would have a tendency to aggravate the evil.

If the State banks deserved to be charged with having violated their engagements, how did the Government stand in that respect? Let the Government set the example of redeeming its plighted faith. Was the public creditor in Philadelphia paid his interest during the war in gold and silver? No. In the notes even of the banks in Philadelphia? It was a notorious fact, that one quarter's interest, he believed, that which accrued the first of January, 1815, was paid, in part, in Baltimore paper, which at that very time was depreciated five or six per cent. below the paper of Philadelphia. Should it be said the Government could not procure gold and silver? Neither could the banks procure it. Should it be said, the Government could not procure Philadelphia paper? They might have obtained it by paying, as they ought to have done, the difference in value between the Baltimore paper and the Philadelphia paper. But they did not do so. They threw the loss arising from the difference upon the public creditor in Philadelphia, and a part of the loss fell upon the banks in Philadelphia, who were the holders of public debt. When we are considering the conduct of the banks, said he, we ought also to consider whether justice has been done to them. But, further, did not the Government in that transaction, assist in producing the excessive issue of paper now complained of, by forcing the depreciated Baltimore notes upon the creditors in Philadelphia? Could they be ignorant, that paper which required to be so forced, must be excessive? With such an example of the Government, countenancing and assisting excessive issues, it would not have been at all surprising if the banks had even gone much further than they did go.

With regard to the present times, he said, it appeared to him the Treasury had the complete command of payments. Let the Treasury begin the work, and the payment to the public creditor go hand in hand with the demand upon the public debtors. It cannot be done at once, but if the Government had the power, by the use of means so simple, to restore uniformity, how much better and safer would it be to employ that power, than to put in operation the great machine contemplated by this bill, which, once in motion, would be beyond their control, whatever might be its effects.

He did not, he said, feel inclined to grope in the dark upon a measure of so much magnitude, and so doubtful a nature. He could not consent to commit such important interests upon the issue of a mere experiment, especially when he saw, that for the avowed purpose of bringing about the payment of specie, it proposed to throw into circulation a large quantity of paper, which he perceived from the state of existing establishments, formed and conducted upon the same principles, and possessing the same materials, could not be redeemed with specie; and when, of course, he was warranted in believing that under similar circumstances, if they should again occur, it must be involved in precisely the same difficulties.

There was another point about which, he said, there ought to be an explicit understanding.

National Bank.

H. OF R.

Was this to be a commercial bank, or a Government bank? He did not intend at present to consider the propriety of the Government's interference in the management of the bank by appointing directors and president; but he could conceive no reason why the Government should become a partner in any such scheme.

If there was to be a bank at all, it was necessary first to decide, whether it is to be a specie bank, or a paper bank. If it is to be a specie bank, he could not consent to any bill for that purpose, unless it contained such provisions as would afford a reasonable certainty that it would at all times be able to pay specie; not a mere bank of deposit, for at this time of day we could not expect men to embark in anything so limited and unproductive; but if it is to commence its operations as a specie bank, and afterwards be obliged to suspend the payment of specie, when its notes shall have gone extensively into circulation, it will produce in a still greater degree all the consequences, so strongly described, which have followed the suspension by the State institutions. I should very much prefer a plan more simple and intelligible. The basis of it should be, that the bank should enter into no engagements which there was a doubt of its ability to fulfil. A bank note in its usual form, imports an engagement to pay specie, and if the bank cannot or will not pay specie for it when demanded, the contract is violated. The bank should, therefore, be prohibited from issuing such notes to a greater amount than it actually possessed specie to pay. There should be no risk of breaking its faith. If it had but five millions of specie, notes should not be issued to a greater amount. But if a larger quantity of paper were necessary, it should be of a different form and character, importing upon the face of it no engagement to pay in specie; certificates of credit, for instance, receivable in payments to the bank and the Government; their final redemption secured by stock, or whatever else might be deemed an adequate security. Such paper, if it went into circulation, would go into circulation fairly, and with a perfect understanding of its nature. There would be no mistake about it, nor any danger of its dishonor. Every engagement would be complied with. Prior to the month of August 1814, it was not supposed that the banks had not been conducted with prudence, according to the usual rules of banking; there was no depreciation of their paper; their notes were in the ordinary acceptance of the terms specie notes. The very instant, however, a state of things arose to create alarm, or when, from whatever cause, their notes came in upon them in unusual quantities, they were unable to proceed in specie payments. This bank being put in operation upon the same principles, must run the same course, unless its managers should practice a degree of self-denial without example, and which it would be vain to expect. In every point of view, it appears to me, that if this bill is to pass, the capital of twenty millions will be amply sufficient for every purpose which the supporters of it have in view.

Mr. RANDOLPH rose to ask two questions; one, of the gentleman from South Carolina, the other of the gentleman from Maryland. First, how the paper to be created by this bank will correct the vitiated state of our currency? and, secondly, how bank notes can answer the purposes of a circulating medium better than Treasury notes? Though no stickler for Treasury notes, Mr. R. intimated his opinion that they were, in time of peace, a better substitute for gold and silver than any paper he had heard yet submitted. Mr. R. added some incidental observations, amongst which was the remark, that he was sorry to see the apathy, the listlessness, on this subject; on a question which, if it passed, would perhaps be the most important decided since the establishment of the Constitution; and that, though he agreed fully as to the extent of the existing evil, the remedy had been totally mistaken, &c.

Mr. SMITH said, in reply, that the gentleman from Pennsylvania and himself only differed in premises, not in their conclusions; and then answered, at some length, the arguments of Mr. SERGEANT. Banks, to obtain a fair profit, he said, must discount to fifty per cent. more than the amount of their capital; but he would be willing they should not be allowed to issue paper to an amount beyond one-half their capital. He had stated that the banks of Columbia, at this time, had not more than two-fifths of their capital paid out in notes, and the old Bank of the United States, at no period, had out more than ten millions of notes; and this bank, unless it should sell its stock, could only do business to the extent of the cash in its vaults. Mr. S. protested against the attempt at dexterity which was imputed to him by Mr. RANDOLPH. He had distinctly stated his opinions, and argued fairly; he had asserted that the notes of this bank would be everywhere better than Treasury notes; but it was on the presumption that the bank would redeem its issues with specie; and he repeated, that if the bank be compelled to pay specie in a short time, as he was sure it would, then its notes would be greatly preferable to Treasury notes, whether at Boston or New Orleans.

Mr. WARD, of Massachusetts, hoped the amendment would prevail. He acknowledged that, in the progressive state of this country, it was not very important whether the capital was thirty-five or twenty millions; the latter amount could be used with nearly as much effect for any mischievous purpose as the former; that sum would be quite sufficient to influence the destinies of this nation. But he preferred the smaller sum, because he believed that amount large enough for every commercial purpose. During the existence of the old Bank of the United States, a period of very great commercial activity, that institution answered all the demands of the country; and he was confident that twenty millions now, in addition to the local capital, was enough. Mr. W. defended the Boston banks from the charge of deception, in promising to pay specie without doing so. They had not, he said, broken their faith to the public, and any man could there obtain specie whenever he presented one of their notes for payment. If this bank is to pay specie, said Mr. W., I admit that it will be very useful; but if it does not, its notes will be much below the value of Treasury notes, and will not answer any good purpose. He quoted the price of Treasury notes at different places, and detailed the reasons for their unequal value; and such, he said, would be the condition of the notes of a National Bank, unless bottomed and conducted on a specie capital. To expect a paper of unequal value to answer the purposes of a general medium, would be as bad, he said, as to expect pieces of cloth of different lengths to cover an equal space of ground in every part of the country. Mr. W. believed that nothing but mismanagement had caused the inequality in the value of Treasury notes. These notes were a common paper, emanating from the trustees of the people, to whom all the people were more or less indebted, and this paper could only have been depreciated by misconduct; which opinion he entered into some details to prove.

This bank, it was asserted, would remedy the great evil now existing in our depreciated currency. If the gentleman from Maryland (Mr. SMITH) were to lay down before him a machine, and tell him it would fly, the gentleman would pardon him for saying he could not credit it, until he showed some means which would enable it to do so. So it was, he said, with the bank now under consideration. He deprecated the present state of things as much as any one, and hoped an adequate remedy would be provided. The United States, he said, lost at present, by the depreciated currency, more per annum than the whole amount derived from the direct tax in the large State of Maryland. Such an evil called loudly for a remedy, and he hoped one would be applied; but a bank on the plan now proposed would disappoint its advocates, and fail to cure the evil. That this cure would be complete he did not, however, expect from any plan—some inconvenience would attend any remedy; it was to be expected, like the amputation of a limb to preserve life. In reply to an assertion made in the course of the debate, Mr. W. denied that the banks had loaned the Government from any other motives than those of gain. Their turn had been served, he said, and in devising the plan of a National Bank he should not be influenced by any strong regard for their interest. But the present question was on reducing the amount of capital; and he concluded by saying that, as the larger sum would increase the means of doing mischief, and the smaller would be sufficient for every useful purpose, he should vote to reduce it to twenty millions.

Mr. WRIGHT made a few remarks against the amendment. In former times a capital of ten millions was found necessary, and the increased demands of the country would certainly require now the amount proposed by the bill. He declined giving at present, he said, any opinion on the measure itself; but if a bank was to be created, it ought not to be less than thirty-five millions.

Mr. TUCKER said, that, before the question was taken, he would offer a few remarks on the propriety of rejecting the proposition of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, and of retaining the amount of capital which formed a constituent part of the plan of the committee that reported the bill. He would not enter into the general question at this time; he would waive all inquiries, for the present, into the constitutionality of the scheme, and into the policy of establishing an institution such as was in contemplation. By the amendment proposed, he considered it to be admitted that a bank was necessary, and that a considerable capital would be required to effect the important, the essential purposes which had induced the Committee of Finance to submit to the House a measure of so much magnitude for their adoption. The question immediately before the House, and to which he should therefore strictly confine himself, is not whether this institution shall be erected, but whether the capital proposed be too great to accomplish its object.

In this inquiry, said Mr. T., I shall not dwell upon the danger of the bank as a great political engine, because I am inclined to believe with an honorable gentleman from Virginia, that, in this point of view, there is very little difference between a bank with a capital of twenty millions, and one with a capital of thirty-five millions. If the bank can be used, and shall be used as an engine of oppression, the smaller sum would have little to recommend it in preference to the larger. We should scarcely discern the difference between the pressure of the two, distributed, as the capital must be, through all the States of the continent. If, then, gentlemen are averse to a bank with thirty-five millions of capital, because they conceive it dangerous to the liberties of the country, are they serious in declaring that they are in favor of such an institution with a capital of twenty millions? Have they shown any reason for the opinion that the latter will not be injurious, if the former will prove destructive; or are we to understand the proposition as indicative of a disposition hostile to the institution altogether, and not merely hostile to the bill before you, because of the exorbitant capital proposed? I hope not. Gentlemen assure us that they are favorable to the establishment of a bank with such a capital, and on such principles as are consistent with the general welfare, and I am willing to place all proper confidence in their sincerity. I must suppose, therefore, that they rest their objections to the amount of the capital on other grounds than that which has been suggested, since that would be equally fatal to every such institution, whose capital was at all calculated to effect the ends of the establishment.

The question as to the proper extent of the capital, must mainly depend on the result of an inquiry as to the probability of a bank of thirty-five millions carrying on its business profitably to the stockholders. If the proposed bank can readily find employment for the whole of the proposed capital, there can be no reason for diminishing it, with a view to the profits of those concerned.

National Bank.

H. OF R.

That such will be the case must readily be admitted, when we refer to acknowledged facts, and apply them to the situation in which this institution will be placed. Of the amount of thirty-five millions, twenty-eight millions will consist of United States' stock, carrying an interest of six per cent., and thus, of itself, affording employment for so much of the capital; the residue of seven millions, distributed throughout the Union, cannot fail to find employment. Facts within our knowledge furnish the best test on this subject. We have been told, in the course of the debate, that when the old Bank of the United States was established, there was only one other bank in existence whose capital did not exceed $400,000. Since that time the number of banks has increased to upwards of two hundred and fifty, and the bank capital to more than eighty-two millions. Does not this fact prove the readiness with which bank capital can find employment among us? Does it not prove that, in this new country, which is every day opening to the population new occupations for capital—in agriculture, commerce, and manufactures—there is no difficulty in disposing of real or fictitious capital, in stimulating the active industry of the nation? Is it not, indeed, in strict conformity with the doctrines of all political economists, and with the experience of every practical man, that, in all new and growing countries, the great difficulty is not to find employment for capital, but to supply the demand for it? Is not our comparatively high interest itself an evidence that, notwithstanding the immense increase of capital, the demand has kept pace with the increase? If, as has been justly contended, the rate of interest is governed by the proportion between the demand for capital and the supply, the rate of interest here proves that capital has not yet equalled that proportion to the demand which exists in other countries. The argument, then, which has been advanced in debate, that we cannot require so large a capital, because that of Great Britain is not as great, is not entitled to much consideration, for the reasons I have mentioned. New countries always require a greater capital, in proportion to their actual wealth and population, than old ones, because the field for its employment is always more extended in the former than in the latter. And if the question as to the expediency of establishing new banks, depended only on the probability of their finding employment for their capital, none could doubt the propriety of the measure. We have, indeed, on this subject, a test which rarely errs. Mercantile men are aware that additional capital can be employed in banking, with great advantage to the bankers. They form a class of our population which is proverbially said to understand its pecuniary interests, and to make accurate calculations of profit. These and others are everywhere engaged in the effort to establish new banks. In New York, as I have understood, it is contemplated to put into activity an additional bank capital of fourteen millions. In the State which I have the honor to represent, efforts have been lately made to establish fifteen new banks, with a capital, I presume, of about seven millions. Do not these things prove that there is a fair prospect of profit; and that, however we may differ as to the policy of increasing those establishments, there is no ground for supposing they will find difficulty in employing their capital? If so, I think we may reasonably suppose that the Bank of the United States (of whose capital twenty-eight millions will be at once actively employed) can readily find occupation for the residue.

Another important subject of inquiry, in relation to the extent of the capital of the proposed bank, is connected with a supposed probable increase of the circulating medium, or of the bank notes in circulation. It has been contended by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, (Mr. SEAGREANT,) that the establishment of this bank would increase, instead of diminishing, the evil which the Chairman of the Committee of Finance has so ably inveighed against. That evil is the surcharged state of the circulation; and the idea seems to have been entertained, that the issues of the United States Bank will further "surcharge it."

If this argument be correct, it would be fatal to a bank of twenty millions; nay, to every bank that can now be established. Will the gentleman then urge it, when he professes his friendly disposition to the establishment of a bank with a smaller capital? It is, however, I conceive, an argument at variance with acknowledged facts. It is not true, that a superabundant paper medium can be forced into circulation, so long as specie redemptions are preserved. Bank notes cannot go out, unless they are wanted, so long as the banks redeem them when demanded. It is an aphorism among political economists, that it is impossible to surcharge the circulation whilst specie is the basis of that circulation. The truth is self-evident, and has been happily illustrated by the celebrated author of the Wealth of Nations, who has remarked, that the channel of circulation can only contain a certain quantity, and if more be attempted to be poured into it, it will flow back upon its source. I am ready to admit, that unlimited and blind confidence in banking institutions may sometimes enable them to over-deal; but I need not stop to show that no such blind confidence now exists, or is likely to prevail.

The danger of a surcharged circulation, when specie redemption shall have been resumed, seems then to be visionary. The Bank of the United States will either be unable to send its notes into circulation, or it will drive in a part of the notes of the State banks. That the former will not be difficult, every day's experience demonstrates. Every bank that is established, soon finds means to push out as much paper as its business requires. Why, therefore, should we believe for a moment, that the Bank of the United States, whose paper will be desirable for so many reasons, will find that an insuperable barrier, which is so easily surmounted by others? If, as has been shown, it can lend its capital, its borrowers will circulate its paper, and the natural effect will be to diminish in proportion to the circulation of the paper of the State banks. But this effect will be produced without an injury to them. It is an error to suppose that the business of a bank is always measured by the quantity of its paper in circulation. It rarely happens that any bank has notes in circulation equal to the amount of its actual capital; and it is notorious, that they sometimes draw interest upon twice the amount of the paper which they have afloat. Having risen, without preparation, merely to reply to some of the arguments that have been used by gentlemen, I am unprovided with the estimate lately published of the state of the Philadelphia banks. If I am not mistaken, the amount of notes discounted, Government stock, &c., on which they drew interest, was nearly three times as great as their notes in circulation. I have before me a statement of the banks of this District, whose issues have been generally deemed more excessive than those of any other place. From this I find, that whilst their actual capital somewhat exceeds the sum of $3,000,000, their notes in circulation are only $2,094,000; and whilst the same institutions have lent out in discounted notes and Government stock $6,280,000, their notes in circulation have not exceeded $2,095,000; which is about one-third of the sum on which they are making a profit. Here, then, we have decisive evidence of what every man at all acquainted with banking transactions must know, that the profits of banks cannot fairly be measured by the amount of their notes in circulation. The same statement furnishes still more decisive evidence. While the Bank of Columbia has lent to Government and to individuals much more than twice the amount of their capital, to wit. about $1,900,000, it has in circulation only $336,800, or about one-sixth of the amount of its loans; whereas the Union Bank, for instance, has lent to Government and individuals much less than twice the amount of its capital, to wit, only $736,900, and has in circulation more than $427,000, largely upwards of one-half the amount of its loans; from which it is evident that the Bank of Columbia, whilst it has the smallest amount in circulation, has proportionably the largest capital at interest, and is, of course, making the largest profit.

These statements, are furnished, not as affording a test of the comparative merits of these institutions, but merely to establish what I think they unequivocally prove, that the profits of banks bear no direct ratio to the amount of their notes in circulation, and that it is not fair to conclude that the United States Bank will injure the State banks generally, by reducing the amount of their circulating paper.

I must not, however, be understood to contend that the establishment of the United States Bank, if its effects are to re-establish the specie basis for our circulation, will not reduce the profits of any of the banks. It doubtless will and ought to reduce the profits of those which have over dealt. Those profits have been too large just so far as the banks have been guilty of overdealing. They ought to be corrected, but it will be the resuming of the payment of specie through the operation of the United States Bank, which will correct them. If this bank were to go into operation on any other than a specie basis, the issue of its notes would not affect the profits of the State banks. It is not then the competition of their notes for the circulation, but the necessity of specie payments that will compel them to curtail their discounts and reduce their profits. This is as it should be; the effect upon the State banks will be wholesome and salutary. Whilst the profits of some are reduced, those of others will be increased by the operation of a National Bank upon the national currency. Whilst some must curtail their business, to meet the demands of specie, others, which are now restrained, because specie redemption is confined to themselves, will be once more enabled to enlarge their business to its accustomed extent. Gentlemen from the Eastern States, I should imagine, are therefore peculiarly interested in the measure, because it is so eminently calculated to reproduce that equalization of profits among the banks which has for some time been suspended, much to their disadvantage.

It will be observed that I have throughout proceeded upon the idea that this bank is always to redeem its paper with specie. A specie basis is the only true foundation of all banking. Any other will be found delusive and destructive. The committee therefore had taken a precaution which seemed to have escaped the observation of the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. SERGEANT.) That gentleman has asked what greater security we have for the payment of specie by this bank than by others? I answer, that it is a condition of their charter. It is expressly provided by that charter that they shall not at any time suspend specie payments without authority so to do. If they do, their charter is violated—it is void. For my own part, as a member of the committee who reported this bill, I was disposed "to make assurance doubly sure, and take a bond of fate," by an express provision that the charter should be void if they suspended specie payment. Professional gentlemen, however, on the committee, and among others, if I mistake not, the able gentleman from Pennsylvania, (Mr. HOPKINSON,) believed such a clause unimportant, because it was necessarily implied in the condition attached to the charter by the provisions of the bill. It is then an essential part of the system that the bank should redeem its notes in specie. I would never give my vote to any bank of another character. We have then in this bank an assurance of specie payment not afforded by others, except perhaps by those of the Eastern States. Of this much we are assured, that as soon as it ceases to be a specie bank, it ceases to exist, so that we are in no danger of encountering the evil which the gentleman appears to apprehend.

But the same gentleman appears to suppose that the contemplated bank will be enabled to pay specie because the Bank of Pennsylvania, having its capital in specie and United States stock, in equal proportions with those proposed by this bill, finds itself without the power of meeting its engagements. I cannot admit the analogy contended for. Though the proportion of specie to stock may be the same, yet the amount of specie capital in this bank will be so much greater as to add to its capacity to keep its notes in circulation. But this is not the only reason. The Bank of Pennsylvania has already in circulation a vast deal of paper, with only a small amount of specie in their vaults. Were they to commence specie payments, their notes would return upon them for payment, to the imminent danger of the bank, unless they should previously adopt the precautionary measures in their power. But the Bank of the United States, when it goes into operation, will have its $1,400,000 of specie, without a note in circulation. In issuing their paper they will be governed by circumstances, and should it return upon them too rapidly for specie they will at once lessen the quantity thrown into circulation. There is then all the difference between the situation of the two banks that may reasonably be expected between two concerns, one of which is just commencing business, while the other is deeply involved, and supposed to be unable to meet the just demands of its creditors. Thus we see, that whilst the Bank of Pennsylvania is neither bound to pay specie by the conditions of its charter, nor able at once to redeem its notes, the Bank of the United States will be able and obliged to make gold and silver the basis of its circulation.

FEBRUARY, 1816.

Public Expenditures.

H. OF R.

Mr. TUCKER concluded his remarks by shortly recapitulating the grounds which he had attempted to maintain. He had endeavored to show that a capital of thirty-five millions would readily find employment; that the proposed bank would not still farther surcharge the circulation, as had been contended; that the establishment of the Bank of the United States would not injure the State banks, though he admitted the resuming of specie payments would necessarily reduce the profits of some of them; and that this bank would be bound by its charter, and enabled by its funds, to rest its circulation upon the solid foundation of a specie basis. He hoped therefore the amendment proposed would be rejected.

WEDNESDAY, February 28.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a bill "concerning field officers of the militia;" also a bill "for the relief of Jacob Babbitt and John Dennis;" in which they ask the concurrence of this House.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported the bill from the Senate "for the relief of Lieutenant Colonel William Lawrence, of the Army of the United States, and of the officers, non-commissioned officers, and privates, composing the garrison of Fort Bowyer, in the year 1814," without amendment; and the bill was ordered to be read a third time to-morrow.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, from the committee to whom was referred the bill from the Senate, "relative to evidence in cases of naturalization," reported the same with amendments; which were read and concurred in by the House, and the bill was ordered to be read the third time to-morrow.

On motion of Mr. PARRIS, the President of the United States was requested to cause to be laid before this House a statement of the number of impressed American seamen confined in Dartmoor prison; the number surrendered, given up, or taken from on board of British vessels captured during the late war; together with their places of residence, respectively.

Mr. PARRIS and Mr. TATE were appointed a committee to present the said resolution to the President.

Mr. CONDUCT submitted the following resolution, which was read:

Resolved, That, for the residue of the session, after the first day of March next, the stated hour of meeting of this House shall be 10 o'clock in the morning.

Mr. NELSON, of Virginia, moved to amend the said resolution by adding thereto the following:

And the hour of adjournment, five in the afternoon of each day.

Whereupon, the said resolution and amendment were ordered to lie on the table.

PUBLIC EXPENDITURES.

Mr. TUCKER submitted the following proposition to amend the standing rules and orders of the House; which was read and ordered to lie on the table:

Resolved, That the following standing committees be appointed to serve during the present Congress, and that hereafter, at the commencement of the first session in each Congress, like committees shall be appointed, whose duties shall continue until the first session of the ensuing Congress:

A Committee on so much of the Public Accounts and Expenditures as relate to the Department of State.

A Committee on so much of the Public Accounts and Expenditures as relate to the Treasury Department.

A Committee on so much of the Public Accounts and Expenditures as relate to the Department of War.

A Committee on so much of the Public Accounts and Expenditures as relate to the Department of the Navy.

A Committee on so much of the Public Accounts and Expenditures as relate to the Post Office; and

A Committee on so much of the Public Accounts and Expenditures as relate to the Public Buildings.

The said committees shall consist of three members each, and shall at all times have leave to meet during the session of the House.

It shall be the duty of the committees to examine into the state of the accounts and expenditures, respectively submitted to them, and to inquire and report particularly—

Whether the expenditures of the respective Departments are justified by law;

Whether the claims from time to time satisfied and discharged by the respective Departments are supported by sufficient vouchers, establishing their justness both as to their character and amount;

Whether such claims have been discharged out of the funds appropriated therefor, and whether all moneys have been disbursed in conformity with appropriation laws; and

Whether any and what provisions are necessary to be adopted to provide more perfectly for the proper application of the public moneys, and to secure the Government from demands unjust in their character or extravagant in their amounts.

And it shall moreover be the duty of the said committees to report, from time to time, whether any and what retrenchments can be made in the expenditures of the several Departments, without detriment to the public service; whether any and what abuses at any time exist in the failure to enforce the payment of moneys which may be due to the United States from public defaulters or others, and to report, from time to time, such provisions and arrangements as may be necessary to add to the economy of the several Departments and the accountability of their officers.

NATIONAL BANK.

The House went into Committee of the Whole on the Bank bill. Mr. SERGEANT's motion to reduce the proposed capital to twenty-five millions being yet under consideration.

Mr. WEBSTER first addressed the House. He regretted the manner in which this debate had been commenced on a detached feature of the bill, and not a question affecting the principle; and expressed his fears that a week or two would be lost in the discussion of this question, to no purpose, inasmuch as it might ultimately end in the rejection of this bill. He proceeded to reply to the arguments of the advocates of the bill. It was a mistaken idea, he said, which he had heard uttered on this subject, that we were about to reform the national currency. No nation had a better currency, he said, than the United States; there was no nation which had guarded its currency with more care; for the framers of the Constitution, and those who enacted the early statutes on this subject, were hard-money men; they had felt, and therefore duly appreciated the evils of a paper medium; they therefore sedulously guarded the currency of the United States from debasement. The legal currency of the United States was gold and silver coin. This was a subject in regard to which Congress had run into no folly.

What, then, he asked, was the present evil? Having a perfectly sound national currency—and the Government have no power, in fact, to make anything else current but gold and silver—there had grown up in different States a currency of paper issued by banks, setting out with the promise to pay gold and silver, which they had been wholly unable to redeem. The consequence was, that there was a mass of paper afloat, of perhaps fifty millions, which sustained no immediate relation to the legal currency of the country—a paper which will not enable any man to pay money he owes to his neighbor, or his debts to the Government. The banks had issued more money than they could redeem, and the evil was severely felt. Mr. W. declined occupying the time of the House to prove that there was a depreciation of the paper in circulation; the legal standard of value was gold and silver; the relation of paper to it proved its state, and the rate of its depreciation. Gold and silver currency, he said, was the law of the land at home, and the law of the world abroad; there could, in the present state of the world, be no other currency. In consequence of the immense paper issues having banished specie from circulation, the Government had been obliged, in direct violation of existing statutes, to receive the amount of their taxes in something which was not recognised by law as the money of the country, and which was, in fact, greatly depreciated. This was the evil.

As to the conduct of the banks, Mr. W. said he would not examine whether the great advances they had made to the Government during the war were right or wrong in them, or whether it was right or wrong in the Government to accept them; but since the peace, he contended, their conduct had been wholly unjustifiable, as also had that of the Treasury in relation to them. It had been supposed the banks would have immediately sold out the stocks, with which they had no business, and have fulfilled their engagements; but public expectation had in this respect been disappointed. When this happened, Mr. W. continued, the Government ought, by the use of the means in its power, to have compelled the banks to return to their specie payments. In his opinion, Mr. W. said, any remedy now to be applied to this evil, must be applied to the depreciated mass of paper itself; it must be some measure which would give heat and life to this mortified mass of the body politic. The evil was not to be remedied by introducing a new paper circulation; there could be no such thing, he showed by a variety of illustrations, as two media in circulation, the one credited and the other discredited. All bank paper, he argued, derives its credit solely from its relation to gold and silver; and there was no remedy for the state of depreciation of the paper currency but the resumption of specie payments. If all the property of the United States was pledged for the redemption of these fifty millions of paper, it would not thereby be brought up to par; or, if it did, that would happen which had never yet happened in any other country. An issue of Treasury notes, he added, would have no better effect than the establishment of a new bank paper. He illustrated this general position by referring to a period anterior to the time of the reformation of the coin of England, when the existing coin had been much debased by clipping, &c., which had created much alarm. An attempt had been made to correct the currency thus vitiated, by throwing a quantity of sound coin into circulation with the debased; the result was, that the sound coin disappeared, was hoarded up, because more valuable than that of the same nominal value which was in general circulation.

The establishment of a National Bank not being in his opinion the proper remedy, he proceeded to examine what is. The solvency of the banks was not questioned. There could be no doubt, he said, if the banks would unite in the object, they might in three weeks resume the payment of specie, and render the adoption of any measure by this House wholly unnecessary. The banks, he said, were making extravagant profits out of the present state of things, which ought to be curtailed. He referred, for illustration of this point, to the state of the Bank of Pennsylvania, as exhibited in the return to the Legislature of that State, which with a capital of $2,500,000 had done a discount business of $4,138,000, at the same time that it held $1,811,000 of United States stock; so that, without taking into account a mass of Treasury notes, real estate, &c., that bank was receiving interest on six and a half millions—nearly three times the amount of its capital. This he considered an extraordinary fact. That bank had been pronounced by the Legislature to be in “a flourishing state.” It was so to the stockholders in the bank, he doubted not; but how was it to those who were affected by the depreciation of it—to the man who comes into an office for life, and relinquishes all his prospects and profits for a fixed salary, not to be diminished during his continuance in office; to the poor pensioner whose wounds received in his country’s service are yet bleeding?

These banks not emanating from Congress what engine were Congress to use for remedying the existing evil? Their only legitimate power, he said, was to interdict the paper of such banks as do not pay specie from being received at the custom-house. With a receipt of forty millions a year, Mr. W. said, if the Government was faithful to itself and to the interests of the people, they could control the evil; it was their duty to make the effort; they should have made it long ago, and they ought now to make it. The evil grows every day worse by indulgence. If Congress did not now make a stand, and stop the current whilst they might, would they, when the current grew stronger and stronger, hereafter do it? If this Congress should adjourn without attempting a remedy, he said, it would desert its duty.

If this bank were calculated to do good at all, Mr. W. contended, it was only as an agent of the revenue officers of the Government. As a bank establishment for ordinary banking purposes, what would be its operation? If this were to be a specie bank, it would go into operation at Philadelphia; would promise but little, but would perform all its promises; independent of its connexion with the Government, it would not be able to get its notes into circulation; nobody would borrow of it; it would operate merely as a bank of deposit. All its transactions would be confined to the negotiation of paper for merchants, to enable them to anticipate for a short time so much of their income as was necessary to pay their bonds for duties on importations; and so far, but no farther, it would have a positive good operation. But, as a measure to supply a remedy for the disorders of our currency, Mr. W. argued, this bank would be of no efficacy; because, if he were not mistaken in his views, its bills would have but a very limited circulation.

As to the evil of the present state of things, Mr. W. admitted it in its fullest extent. If he was not mistaken, there were some millions in the Treasury of paper, which were nearly worthless, and were now wholly useless to the Government, by which an actual loss of considerable amount must certainly be sustained by the Treasury. This was an evil which, he said, ought to be met at once, because it would grow greater by indulgence. In the end, the taxes must be paid in the legal money of the country, and the sooner that was brought about the better. Such was the operation of the present state of the circulating medium, he proceeded to show, that the duties laid by the United States were at a rate ten per cent. higher in Boston than in Baltimore, and in Baltimore higher than in Washington, &c. If Congress were to pass forty statutes on the subject, he said, they would not make the law more conclusive than it now was, that nothing should be received in payment of duties to the Government but specie; and yet, no regard was paid to the imperative injunctions of the law in this respect. The whole strength of the Government, he was of opinion, ought to be put forth to compel the payment of the duties and taxes to Government in the legal currency of the country.

In regard to the plan of this proposed bank, Mr. W. said he would consent to no bank which to all intents and purposes was not a specie bank; and in that view he was in favor of the proposed amendment. He expressed some alarm at the stock feature of the bank, which would enable and might induce the existing bank corporations to come forward and take up the whole stock of this National Bank. He should be glad to see a bank established, he observed, in the course of his remarks on this point, which would command the solid capital of the country. There were men, he said, of wealth and standing, who would embark their funds in a bank constituted on commercial specie principles, but who would not associate in such an institution with the stockholders in the country, any more than a good currency would associate with a bad one. A National Bank, he said, ought to be regarded, not as the power to rectify the present state of the currency, but as a means to aid the Government in the exercise of its power in this respect. He concluded his remarks, by saying that the power of the Government must be exercised in some way, and that speedily, or evils would result, the extent of which he would not attempt to describe.

Mr. CUTBERT followed in opposition to the proposed amendment, though, he remarked, there were few of the positions of the gentleman from New Hampshire in which he did not concur, without agreeing, with him, however, in his results. In reply to his objection to the stock feature of the bank, as forming an obstacle to its paying specie, Mr. C. argued that it would have a contrary effect. Thus: that to become and remain a specie bank, the institution must be slow in its operations, and the directors and stockholders be content with small gains on their capital; that the interest they would draw, of six per cent. on the stock part of their capital, would aid them in this course, and induce them to be satisfied with less gains in the way of discounts,

&c. In opposition to the proposal to reduce the capital of the bank, he took for his groundwork two facts which would not be questioned. First, that this is a growing nation in population, resources, wealth, and commerce. Secondly, that there is, from the nature of things, an absolute uncertainty as to the quantity of capital which may be required, and the extent of the business which may be done by a National Bank. He argued, from these positions, that the bank ought to have the power of contracting or expanding itself to the wants of the country; and if the business of the country required a larger amount of discount than would be made on the twenty millions, that the operations of the bank ought not to be cramped. In this nation, growing in population, enterprise, and wealth, where all those uses of society which require active capital and a general circulating medium were every day rapidly multiplying and extending, he would not place narrow limits on the useful agency of this bank. He compared such a course to placing a case of iron on the swelling muscles and growing energies of a vigorous youth. It was much better, he concluded, to have a capital larger than necessary, than one much too small. Mr. C. next proceeded to examine the utility of a National Bank as compared with the State banks, in promoting exchanges, remittances, and transfers by Government and individuals. He stated their various operations in a plain and intelligible manner, and, from his facts on this subject, drew the conclusion that a National Bank only could efficaciously promote the exchange of moneys and commodities—that internal commerce which serves to knit together and fertilize every section of the country. A National Bank he compared to the ocean of commerce, which bears on its bosom the freights of all regions, from one to the other; the State banks to the rivers, which are the channels of communication within their particular, limited sphere. In reply to the argument that the evil of the redundancy, and depreciation of the present paper circulation would not be corrected by throwing other paper into circulation, he said that the National Bank, instead of increasing the quantum of paper, would substitute other paper in lieu of a portion of that now in circulation, and by this operation, the remainder would be brought up to a specie value. A further argument he urged in favor of a large capital was this: that a bank of twenty millions would issue as much paper as a bank of thirty-five millions, as the issue would be limited by the demands of society; but with a large capital there would be greater security to individuals. The difference between the two capitals would be the difference between two merchants carrying on the same commercial speculations, the one with a large, and the other with a small capital; the creditors of the first having undoubtedly better security than those of the last, &c. On these, and other grounds, Mr. C. opposed the amendment.

Mr. HOPKINSON addressed the Chair as follows:

Mr. Chairman: I came to this Congress strongly impressed with the expediency of establishing a National Bank, and with the conviction that it would certainly be done. I presumed that this impression was so general throughout the United States, that but little discussion would be necessary to attain the object. My personal feelings and dispositions were strongly in favor of the measure; and I believe the general, nay, almost the universal, wishes of my immediate constituents, notwithstanding the insinuations about their interest in the State banks, were of the same kind. Not, sir, that I believe a National Bank absolutely indispensable to restore the distracted state of our currency, for I believe this may be effected by other means; but because I believe a bank, established on fair and proper principles, would be a powerful agent in producing this most desirable reformation; because it would afford many essential accommodations to the administration of our revenue, and be, at the same time, of general utility to the community. Under these impressions, I had trusted that some scheme would have been presented to us, plainly calculated to answer these desirable ends, entirely free from known and important objections, and framed on principles not likely to excite discontent and opposition in those, at least, who favor the general design. At the last session of Congress, the subject was examined and discussed with great minuteness; theories of various kinds were proposed, examined, and rejected; new projects were weighed, and found wanting. After all these fruitless attempts to find something new and better than the past, I hoped we should now have abandoned such endeavors, and turned our sober attention to the lessons of experience to be found in the construction and conduct of the late Bank of the United States. No public institution ever conducted its affairs with more general and deserved satisfaction, or closed them with more integrity and honor. Taking that for our guide, with such enlargements and alterations as the changes that have taken place in the condition of the country would point out and require, we might have erected a fabric unexceptionable to every man not hostile to every and any establishment of the kind. This course, however, has not been pursued. We have a system proposed to us abounding with new ingredients, many of which are known to be absolutely inadmissible in the judgment of many of the best friends of a National Bank. To me this is, truly, a serious disappointment, and I am sincerely sorry it is not in my power to give my feeble support to the plan offered. I do not propose, at this time, to take a general view of the whole system; and regret that it comes before us in detached parts. It would have been much more satisfactory to have examined the whole together, and seen how the various parts bear upon each other. The question now, however, is on the motion for reducing the capital from thirty-five to twenty millions. To this question, and such matters as have been connected with it by those who have opposed the motion, I shall confine my observations.

Before I proceed, may I be permitted to hold out a caution to the Committee—it is this: not to be too hasty in adopting any plan. We are suffering under great evils, and a state of suffering is not favorable to safe deliberation; impatient under the anguish of the disease, we are too apt to seize upon anything that is proposed as a remedy, without a due examination into its probable effects and consequences. This impatience under misfortune is a great source of increased evil, both in private and public affairs. We feel the suffering as existing and known, and adopt the remedy merely because it promises a change, without duly examining if it may not be for the worse. In struggling to shake off one difficulty, we plunge into a greater—to imagine that nothing but some great and single effort can extricate us, when perhaps we ought to have trusted to slow and gradual means of redress, and exercised our patience until they had time to operate. To sit quietly under suffering, to be doing nothing for a painful disease, requires great strength of understanding and discretion, and yet it is generally better to do nothing when we are uncertain what we should do. Thus, a trader meets with some unexpected loss. Instead of waiting to repair it by slow and certain means, he makes some great endeavor; he plunges in some speculation, he borrows to the extent of his credit; and in a short time finds himself in irretrievable ruin. The privations, the injuries, and the demands of the late war, necessarily deranged all the concerns of the country; and especially its pecuniary concerns—public and private institutions of every kind were shaken to their centre; public credit was almost demolished, and private credit greatly impaired. It is idle, sir, to expect that evils so broad and deep are to be rooted out in an hour; that on the name of peace, everything is to be restored to health and regularity, and we are no longer to remember that we have suffered. The shock was tremendous; its vibrations cannot instantly cease. Such evils must require gradual remedies. I have, sir, much faith in the vis medicatrix, in the political as well as the natural body; when the general health of both is sound. Our nation is young and vigorous; her resources vast and increasing; her powers of healing incalculable. Why then should we be driven to rash expedients, in mere despair, when we have such means of restoration if we will but give them time to operate. Impatience, rashness, error, and repentance, are the children of despair. I make these remarks, sir, not to prevent every fair and deliberate endeavor to remove existing and serious evils; nor to induce the members of this House to sit with folded arms in listless indifference, waiting for time and chance to relieve us. I would merely guard against too much despondency, or a belief that it is better for us to do anything, than to do nothing.

The question now for consideration is the amount of capital proper for a National Bank, supposing everything else in the bill to be as it should be. I regret that the examination of the scheme must be made in detached parts—a general view of the whole would have been much more satisfactory, even for the fair estimate and understanding of each particular provision. I shall, however, confine my remarks to the precise question. The honorable Chairman, by whom this bill was reported, has portrayed, in powerful and appropriate colors, the extent and pressure of the evils under which the country labors, in consequence of the distracted state of its currency. He has not been so full and explicit in showing how the remedy he proposes is to meet and remove the disease; reserving himself, probably, on this head, until the provisions of this bill shall come under examination—this however, is really the important inquiry now. In confining my remarks to the proposed amount of capital, I would not be understood to mean that there are not other provisions in the bill much more exceptionable in my opinion than this, and to which I shall offer my objections as they arise. One honorable gentleman has said, that he cannot discern any difference between having the capital at twenty or thirty-five millions. Does he see any difference between thirty-five and fifty; or between fifty and an hundred, and so on? If the amount of the capital of a bank is a mere nominal, unimportant feature in its character and operations, then, indeed, it is useless to dispute about it; but if the difference between any two sums is of importance, it must be found between the sums of twenty and thirty-five millions. Without adverting to the diminution of profits by the extent of the capital, which is a matter for the subscribers and stockholders to look to; is it not indisputable, that the power of a bank over similar institutions, and generally over the moneyed concerns of a country depends much on the strength of its capital? The extent of its business; the amount of its issues; its power to do good, and its power to do mischief; its means to monopolize, to oppress, to ruin, are all regulated, in a great degree, by the capital, and influence and interest which it commands. It is so in other affairs as well as banks; great capitalists, in commerce, in manufactures, in everything, overshadow and overpower smaller ones, and drive them out of the market; though with equal honesty and equal industry. Are not our manufacturers this moment complaining they cannot stand against the great manufacturing capitalists of Great Britain, and praying for assistance and support in the unequal contest? The capital of this bank, therefore, especially if the whole machine is to be wielded by the arm of the Government, is of great importance, and ought to be fixed with great caution and deliberation. Just so much should be afforded as is consistent with its fair, legitimate objects; and not inconsistent with other interests in the community entitled to our protection and regard. What are the circumstances and considerations to which we should appeal in deciding this question? We should look, sir, to the uses expected from this bank; the object to be attained by its establishment; and grant a capital sufficient for those uses and objects and no more. In the nature of the thing, no very exact rule or measure can be obtained;

but a very fair and reasonable estimate may be made. Let me ask, then, what are the objects we have in view in establishing a National Bank? To accommodate the Government in the business of its revenue, and to afford to the community the usual benefits of such institutions. It is also presumed that a National Bank will have the power of regulating and equalizing our currency in the different States. This, however, is a matter distinct from the question of capital. We come then directly to the real question: Is a capital of thirty-five millions necessary, either for the accommodation of the Government or the business of the community? I hold it, sir, to be clear that the Government can lawfully require of us a National Bank for no other purposes than as an instrument of finance; a necessary accommodation in collecting and disbursing revenue, receiving and paying debts, and facilitating loans. Beyond this the Constitution does not warrant it; nor have the friends of the old bank ever contended for anything beyond this. If a bank is to be raised as an instrument of power in the hands of our rulers, of whatever party denomination; if it is to be a source of speculation and profit; a field for the exercise of patronage and appointment, it is a direct and dangerous violation of the Constitution. With such objects the Government have nothing to do; nor should it have any connexion with a bank, or derive any advantage from it merely and solely as an instrument of finance. If, indeed, other benefits flow incidentally and necessarily from it, they may not be rejected; but they should form no part of the original design, nor should any measure or principle be introduced into the system for the direct purpose of obtaining such objects. It is true that the Government subscribed a fifth part of the stock of the late bank; but it should be remembered, that this was deemed necessary not only to create a necessary confidence in the institution with the public, which was then much more shy of banks than it has since been, but also to furnish the amount of capital required; which probably could not have been done without this aid from the Government, the wealth of the country being then inconsiderable in proportion to its present amount.

It is then incumbent on those gentlemen who insist on this immense capital to show how it is required for the business of the Government. I cannot conceive it. The Bank of the United States, with a capital of ten millions, was able to furnish all the financial assistance required, to the very hour of its destruction, without the least difficulty or embarrassment, either to itself or the Administration. It was able to do much more than this; to grant large loans to the Government, and no defect was ever discovered in the amount of capital for all these purposes; or, in other words, for all the purposes which could be lawfully required of it. If more than these are to be required, it shall never be with my sanction. I desire not to see the Government entering into partnerships with its citizens in commercial or stock speculations; entering into the market and trafficking on the exchange. Much less would I see it maintaining its power, encouraging and rewarding its friends, and overthrowing its adversaries by the patronage, the influence, and the vengeance of a vast and uncontrollable moneyed institution. Inasmuch, therefore, as no attempt has been made to show that the capital now demanded for this bank is necessary to the fiscal operations of the Government, nor that the substitute proposed is not amply sufficient for these purposes, I dismiss this part of the subject; and inquire whether the wants of the community call for this immense addition to its banking capital.

A bank is useful to the community by exciting and aiding the industry of the country with loans of money; by furnishing a circulating medium more convenient in many respects than gold and silver; by greatly enlarging the active capital of the country; and by providing commodious, cheap, and safe means of making payments and remittances to the most distant places. Do we want thirty-five millions more than we now have in banks, for these objects? I think not; and I will endeavor to prove it. Permit me again to take you back to the experience of the past for the premises from which I would reason for the present. When the Bank of the United States was established, in the year 1791, there were in the United States but three other banks; one in Philadelphia, one in New York, and one in Boston. I do not know what was the capital of each; but presume when I say that the whole did not exceed four millions, I give them enough. These then, with the Bank of the United States, gave a banking capital of fourteen millions; and were found, for a time, amply sufficient for all the wants both of the Government and the community. To obviate the consequences which flow from these facts, we are told of the vast additions to the business and wealth of this country; of the extension of our commerce; the improvements in our agriculture; the growth of our manufactures, the increase of our population. All this is true, and no man rejoices in this unparalleled prosperity more than I do. But before we suffer ourselves to be hurried away by this captivating picture of our own greatness and importance, we must take into the calculation some other facts and changes, and give them a fair consideration and influence before we pass upon the result. If at this time, as in 1791, there were in these United States, but the three banks then existing, and we were about to establish a national bank, the argument would be most fair and unanswerable. But how is this matter? If the business and population of the country have increased, has not your banking capital increased in a full proportion? In 1791 the capital of this description was $14,000,000; and in 1816 we are told by the Secretary of the Treasury it is eighty-five millions. Is there nothing in this to meet and destroy the whole force of the argument drawn from increase of our wants? To this enormous addition to the banking capital, must be added the equally enormous increase of the general wealth of the country; of the wealth of individuals, which is as useful and efficient in carrying on its business, and employing its industry, as the capitals of banks. If we look to Great Britain for information on this subject, how do we find it? The capital of the Bank of England is about fifteen millions of pounds sterling; there may have been some addition since that estimate was made. The notes issued by this bank prior to the stoppage of specie payments in 1797, did not exceed eleven millions; and the country banks are estimated to have issued about as much; it is true that these issues have increased since specie has ceased to circulate, but probably not beyond the amount of the specie withdrawn; the whole business then of that Kingdom, its commercial, agricultural, and manufacturing concerns, have been transacted with less bank capital than we are now told is requisite for us. To meet the force of this comparison, it is urged that this is a new and a growing country, and therefore calls for more accommodation of this sort than an old and settled one—making every just allowance for this difference, still it can scarcely be seriously contended that, whatever our prospects may be, and I rejoice in their brightness and extent, our business in the various walks of enterprise and industry now is, or for a long time can be, as vast and wide as that of Great Britain. It should be remembered, too, that the period of our prosperity and increase has been her's also—her commerce and manufactures, and I believe her agriculture also, have been in a rapid progress of increase and improvement for the last twenty years. It cannot be, then, that this country demands a banking capital of one hundred and twenty millions, while that is sufficiently accommodated with a much smaller amount.

But we are asked, where is the danger of this capital? We might ask, where is its necessity; its usefulness? But, sir, the dangers are obvious; as an engine, almost irresistible, of State power and corruption, it is appalling; its influence will pervade every corner of the Union; its power will be felt wherever it may choose to strike; every great moneyed power is an efficient power, and, of course, always attended with some danger. It overshadows and destroys the growth of humbler efforts, it may exact a submission to its will; it may punish a disobedience—in the hands of the Government these dangers increase an hundred fold. But, sir, the principal danger I would call your attention to is this, that which may fall upon and crush the State banks. These banks, whatever may have been thought and said to the contrary, are entitled, fully entitled, to our care and consideration; the interest of a great portion of the community is deeply embarked in them; its industry and enterprise mainly depend upon them, and it would be an outrage of injustice and impolicy to overthrow or injure them. Eighty-five millions of capital, with all its dependencies, is not a trifle to be sported with, or blown away by vague denunciations and unexamined charges. The great body of our fellow-citizens, whose property and prospects are embarked in these institutions; the numerous widows and orphans who have invested their all in their stock; the great mass of industry and labor which depends upon them for assistance, are matters of the most serious concern, and we are bound to look well to the consequences before we do anything that may injure and destroy them.*

Permit me, in this place, sir, to notice the charges which have been urged against these State banks with so much acrimony. I must first, however, distinctly state, that I mean not to include in my defence, that miserable litter of forty-two, which came forth from the Pennsylvania Legislature at one monstrous birth. They crawled into a sickly existence; and spread themselves over the land, like so many vipers; poisoning the atmosphere, and killing the soil. Speculation became an epidemic, which corrupted and destroyed the morals and the industry of the country. It followed the farmer into his field, and he sold it; the mechanic into his shop, and he pledged it. Even the daily laborer cast away his spade and his hoe in scorn, and determined no longer to rely on the labor of his hands for his bread. Every man, from the highest to the lowest, was to become rich by the magic of these wonderful banks—the lamp of Aladdin was placed in every county, and each man, woman, and child, expected to have the rubbing of it in their turn. The Governor of Pennsylvania endeavored to check this madness with the whole force of his Constitutional power—he put himself manfully against it, but all in vain; he was overwhelmed with the torrent of private speculation and legislative fraud. I say, sir, legislative fraud, because it is a fact indisputable, that when that Legislature passed a single act incorporating forty-two banks, no one of the whole batch could have obtained a majority for itself—what was it then but a system of bargaining and selling; of conspiracy and combination, to do a great mischief by common consent, when a small part of the same mischief would have received no countenance or support!

To return to the State banks, properly so called, what is the great reproach that has been so severely visited upon them? The stopping of specie payments. Before we decide upon the justice of their condemnation, on this account, we should, with a proper calmness and impartiality, inquire into the causes which led to it, and the necessity which demanded it. The cause of this unfortunate measure has been found by some in the loans made by these banks to the Government, which are declared to be unwarranted in their amount, and ruinous in the length of the credit. Others charge the misfortune to the excessive issues of notes, which, if true, is in a great degree the consequence of the former. I do not believe that these causes, either separately or together, have produced or could have produced the result attributed to them, without the pressure of other circumstances to which the evil ought truly to be traced, and which would have produced precisely the same results, had there been no loans, and no issues in consequence of them. Whatever, however, may have been the effects of these loans to the Government, they hardly afford a fair subject of reproach here; and we are bound at least to mitigate the crime, (if you will call it so,) by a consideration of the circumstances under which it was committed. The enemy was upon you to the North and to the South; the defence of the country languished for the means of support; the public Treasury was exhausted, and the citizen refused his further aid to replenish it. Everything looked to ruin for want of money. In this condition of the country, the banks were applied to for assistance. Every inducement that could be suggested was addressed to their interest, their fears, and their patriotism. The Secretary of the Treasury condescended to present himself in person at the board of the directors, imploring (I may say) their compassion. From without they were pressed and assailed by the public sentiment—always powerful, and sometimes irresistible;—and had they not yielded to solicitations and circumstances like these, they must have taken upon themselves the consequences, however disastrous, that may have followed a refusal. I do not, sir, exclude from the inducements a hope or prospect of profit from these Treasury bargains and negotiations. This may fairly and honorably have entered into the consideration. So much for these loans, which, after all, were not the cause of suspending specie payments; that must have been done just when it was done, had no loans been made.

* That the National Bank is expected and intended to hold a command over the State banks cannot be questioned, when we find the Secretary of the Treasury in his report on this subject, distinctly avowing it, and calculating on the combined force of the Treasury and the Bank to direct and control the operations and conduct of the State institutions.

As to the allegation of excessive issues, where is the proof of this charge? Who has shown what was the amount of notes in circulation at the time of the suspension, or that it was greater than usual? I understand the fact was not so; and if it were, the proof should be made by those who maintain the charge. We have lately obtained some important information on this point from the highest source of authority. An examination has been made, under the authority of the Legislature of Pennsylvania, into the condition of those banks in Philadelphia which have made the largest loans to the Government, and which, therefore, must show in the strongest manner, the consequences of these loans, or their issues. What has been the result? The notes of the whole do not average one-third of the capital of the whole. In some they are less, in others something more. Are these excessive issues? May not any bank, honestly and fairly, and discreetly too, issue notes to one-third of the amount of its capital. I know of no system of banking which proceeds on the calculation of a smaller issue. It is not here, then, that we shall find the true cause of a suspension of specie payments; nor will it be found in a real scarcity of coin. It is probably true that large quantities of specie were withdrawn from the country in the purchase of English bills; and, perhaps, in direct remittances, tempted by the extravagant price it bore in Great Britain. But enough was left, and now remains, to do all the banking business in ordinary times and circumstances. The honorable chairman of the committee has stated, and I doubt not he speaks from correct and official information, that, in June last, there was, in the different banks in the United States, the sum of fifteen millions of dollars in gold and silver. Now, this amount is assuredly sufficient for the specie business of their capital of eighty-five millions, in ordinary times, and in the full enjoyment of the public confidence. When to this sum you add the deposits of specie which have been withdrawn by the loss of that confidence, and which will be returned to the vaults of the bank on its restoration, I think it is demonstrated that it is not for the want of specie in the country that the banks cannot pay it. It is well known that when paper is in good credit, no large payments are made in specie. It is thought burdensome to pay or to receive them, and a bank is therefore required only to keep specie enough to answer trifling demands, and supply change for the small business of the community. The usual estimate has been about one-fifth the amount of the capital; and no bank would be thought delinquent, much less insolvent, because it could not pay all its notes on any sudden demand. No bank of discount and deposit ever did, or ever could do this. What then was the cause—what is the justification of the stoppage of these banks?

In my opinion it was the gloomy and calamitous condition of our public affairs, which destroyed the public confidence not only in the banks, but in every public institution in the country; a dark and desponding uncertainty hung over us, and every hour seemed big with our fate. The credit of the Government was demolished; it could pay neither paper nor silver. The ruin of the country, the breaking up of the Government would of course have broken up all the moneyed institutions, and indeed all our public institutions of every description. In such a state of things, it is obvious that every man would be eager to seize upon something that would hold its value in all times, under any circumstances, and in all places. What was the note of the best bank worth at such a period? Gold and silver could alone be called wealth—could alone be relied upon to procure the necessities of life; of course every man that had a deposit in a bank ran to withdraw it in gold and silver; every man who held a note demanded its payment in solid coin. It is an undoubted fact that such was the run upon the Philadelphia banks that had they kept their vaults open for twenty-four hours longer than they did, not a doit would have been left in them. It will be remembered that these things took place just before the burning of Washington, and when a just apprehension was universal that Philadelphia would be the next object of attack. But the Eastern banks did not resort to this desperate measure. Sir, the Eastern part of the United States had not connected itself, and in truth was not, from its situation and other circumstances, so closely and inseparably connected with the fate of the General Government as we were. They had not the same causes for alarm and precaution. In my judgment, then, sir, it was neither the excessive issues of paper, which at this time does not exceed from forty to fifty millions in the whole United States, nor any real scarcity of the precious metals, that has compelled our banks to adopt the measure so much complained of; but the loss of public confidence, arising not from the misconduct of the banks, but the uncertain and disastrous aspect of our national affairs.

But I am asked, if this is the case, why have not these banks, on the returning days of peace, prosperity, and confidence, resumed the payments of their debts; and why do they not sell their stock to enable them to do so? I will answer. They must do both these things, and they can do them, but they must have a reasonable time and indulgence. The derangement of systems so complicated and extensive cannot be removed in an instant. The ability of the banks to do their business as formerly, must wait for the restoration of their former confidence; the public alarm must have time to subside; the troubled waters to become smooth again—these things are all gradual and slow in their operations; and by attempting to force them, we shall but defeat their success. As to the stock held by the banks upon which they are drawing interest, while they neither pay the principal nor interest of their own debts, and by which they are enabled to make such enormous dividends, I say, without hesitation, they must sell, but not too suddenly. It is said that, in stocks, Treasury notes, and State loans, the banks are creditors of the public to the amount of forty millions. Now, what would be the effect of throwing all this suddenly in the market? Where would the purchasers be found, and where would these institutions get specie for it to enable them to pay their debts in specie? Still the banks must begin the work of reformation. I hope they have; if not, they must and may be made to do it. Could I suspect them of holding their stock for the mere object of profit, while they refuse payment of their debts, I would consign them to contempt and destruction.

Mr. SHARPE next addressed the Chair on this subject, expressing in the outset his regret that the attack on this bank had been on its details, instead of its principle. Mr. S. explained his views of the difference between the aspect of this question at this time, and that which it presented at the last winter, when it had been so long fruitlessly agitated. The principal object of the advocates of a National Bank at the last session, was to afford to the Government the facility of obtaining occasional loans to carry on the operations of the Government, &c., and to sustain the public credit; the object at present was of a different character—to remedy the evil of a vitiated currency, which had lately been much exaggerated, and which demanded a remedy. Mr. S. here examined the operation of this depreciation on the revenues of Government, which, he clearly showed, were most injuriously affected by it. The Government sustained a clear loss of large amount—a loss which must be made up by taxes levied on the industry and labor of the community; and who gained by it? Those whose duty it is to remedy the evil. It is the owners of bank stock who derive the benefit from the depreciation of their own paper. All acknowledged the extent of the evil, and the necessity of a remedy, though they differed as to the nature of the remedy.

In reply to the argument of Mr. WEBSTER, that the remedy for the evil was in the power of the Secretary of the Treasury, by requiring payment of the dues to Government in specie, Mr. S. said the gentleman had not demonstrated that there was specie enough in the country for the purposes of the payment of the revenue to the Treasury, nor that the banks have not the means ultimately to force the Treasury to take their paper in payments to the Government. The disposition was not wanting in the officer at the head of that Department to apply the remedy, if it were in his power; but, Mr. S. said, an act of Congress could apply an adequate remedy. If that now proposed was the proper measure, let it be adopted; if a better can be proposed, let it be shown. He was not, he added, so opinionated as to assert that this was the only remedy; but a National Bank was a measure tried and understood, and he therefore preferred it; if it should not succeed, he would support any other measure adequate to the object in view.

In reply to Mr. HOPKINSON'S reference to the old Bank of the United States, as an institution whose wisdom had been tested by experience, Mr. S. said he could not see the force of the wide distinction the gentleman had drawn between the plan of that bank and of this. He compared these features, and showed that their dissimilarity was not such as to change their principle. This, he said, was intended to be a specie bank, gradually put in operation, and by its business, connected with the measures of the Government, to introduce a general resumption of specie payments and circulation. In regard to the State banking institutions, Mr. S. avowed as strong an attachment to their interest and prosperity as the gentleman from Pennsylvania; but his attachment to them as individuals must be regulated by the correctness of their conduct. If they abandoned the path of probity and duty, he must renounce his attachment to them unless they showed a disposition to return to it. In regard to the means alleged to have been employed to obtain loans from these banks, when they yielded to the solicitations of the Treasury, Mr. S. said, they took care to get the best bargain they could out of its necessities; in addition to the just interest of six per cent. they got a premium of somewhere about twenty per cent. for their friendly loans to the Government. To prove that they had made a good business of it, he said that there was not one of those banks but could sell out its stock for specie, and make a handsome profit on the whole transaction, besides the advantages they have already derived; but, he said, they did not want to do it; they had rather keep their stock bearing interest, and issue paper on it, &c.

As to the idea of danger to the Government from a bank of thirty-five millions, he said it was fanciful. How far could a bank be dangerous to the Government? When banking was a monopoly in the hands of a Government, or of a few individuals; and then only. Competition, he said, destroyed monopoly, and destroyed the danger from such an institution; and it could not be argued that there was not now competition enough to deprive such an institution as this of the character of an engine dangerous to the liberties of the country. A bank, he said, might be more profitable to the stockholders with a capital of twenty millions; but it would be more useful to the community with a larger capital, &c. Having offered these and other views of the subject, he concluded by expressing his hope that this bill would pass with very little alteration of its present provisions.

Mr. CALHOUN then rose, and in an energetic manner vindicated the bill, and his views of it, from the attack which had been made on them. He said no man in the House would reprobate more than him the establishment of a bank which was not a specie bank. A bank not to pay specie, he said, would be an instrument of deception; it would have no character or feature of a bank; he should regard it with disgust and abhorrence. This bank, he asserted in reply to contrary assertions, if established, would be a specie bank. He professed himself ready to remedy any defects which should be pointed out; but he hoped the Committee would not be influenced to destroy its essential features by such vague arguments as had been urged against them. This was to be a specie bank, or he would have nothing to do with it. He called upon gentlemen not to give way to objections to the details of the bill, made by those who were altogether inimical to the establishment of any bank; their arguments, he intimated, ought to be received with suspicion, because their view of the subject might be supposed to be warped by their hostility to the project altogether. Mr. C. then spoke at length in explanation and reply to those gentlemen who had preceded him in the debate. In regard to the estimation of paper in circulation, &c., he took occasion to say, that he and Mr. SMITH had not widely differed in opinion on that head, when they came to understand terms. Mr. C. said he had not specified the particular items in his estimate of the amount of bank issues and transactions; his object had been merely to show, without descending to particulars, that the banks had over traded. He referred, for illustration, to the Bank of Washington, reputed a prudent bank, which on a capital of $350,000, what with stock and discounts to individuals, drew interest on $800,000. His object, he said, when up before, was to prove that the banks generally had done a business which would authorize them to divide at the enormous rate of fourteen and an half per cent. on their capital paid in, &c.

Mr. SERGEANT spoke at some length in explanation of his views.

Mr. PITKIN followed in support of the motion to reduce the capital of the bank, declaring himself decidedly friendly to the incorporation of a bank of something like moderate capital, on true commercial and practical principles, but on no other.

The question on reducing the capital to twenty millions was finally taken, and decided in the negative—yeas 49, nays 74. The Committee then rose, and the House adjourned.

TUESDAY, February 29.

Mr. HOPKINSON presented a petition of a committee on behalf of the surviving officers of the Pennsylvania line of the Revolutionary army, praying for further compensation for the services of said officers.

Mr. HOPKINSON also presented petitions of sundry inhabitants of Pennsylvania, praying that the claims of the officers and soldiers of the Revolutionary army may be again taken into consideration, and that additional allowances may be made to them.—Referred to the Committee on Pensions and Revolutionary Claims.

Mr. NELSON, from the Committee on the Judiciary, made a report on the petition of the Legislature of the Territory of Illinois, respecting the powers of their Governor; which was read, and the resolution therein contained was concurred in by the House, as follows:

Resolved, That it is inexpedient to grant the prayer of the petition.

On motion of Mr. HANSON,

Resolved, That the President of the United States be and he is hereby requested to cause to be laid before this House a statement of the cases in which he has employed or caused to be employed counsel to assist the Attorney General in prosecuting causes in the Supreme Court of the United States, in behalf of the United States; stating as nearly as may be the amount of property in dispute in each case, the names of the counsel so employed, the period of employing them, and the compensation granted to them in each case; also the manner of making such compensation, and the fund out of which the same was paid.

Mr. HANSON and Mr. DARLINGTON were appointed a committee to present the foregoing resolution to the President.

The bill from the Senate "concerning field officers of the militia," was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Monday next.

The bill from the Senate "for the relief of Jacob Babbitt and John Dennis," was read twice, and committed to the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures.

The bill from the Senate "relating to evidence in cases of naturalization," was read the third time as amended, and being on its passage, it was ordered to lie on the table.

NATIONAL CURRENCY.

Mr. WARD, of Massachusetts, moved that the House proceed to consider the resolutions submitted by him some days ago, in the following words:

Resolved, That all duties, imposts, and excises, laid by Congress, ought not only to be laid uniformly throughout the United States, agreeably to the provision in the Constitution, but ought to be collected in all parts of the United States in the same currency, or in currencies equivalent in value.

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be instructed to receive alone in payment of duties, imposts, excises, and debts, due to the United States, gold, silver, and copper coin, Treasury notes, and the notes of such banks as pay specie for their bills, excepting in cases in which it is otherwise provided by law.

And, on the question of consideration, he demanded the yeas and nays.

The House agreed to consider the resolutions—yeas 52, nays 49: and the question being stated on adopting the resolutions—

Mr. CALHOUN moved to refer the resolutions to the Committee on the National Currency, which, he said, already had the subject under consideration.

This motion was opposed by Mr. WARD at some length, who thought the resolution spoke for itself, and could be decided on by the House without the aid of a committee; that the reference would also be productive of delay, in regard to measures which he regarded as of great urgency, as well as of necessity.

Mr. WRIGHT supported the reference, and replied briefly to the remarks of Mr. WARD.

After some further discussion, the resolutions were referred as moved by Mr. CALHOUN—ayes 62, nays 49.

THE NATIONAL BANK.

The House then again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the National Bank.

On motion of Mr. CADY, with the assent of Mr. CALHOUN, the bill was amended by striking out so much thereof as gives to Congress the privilege, hereafter, of extending the capital of the bank from thirty-five to fifty millions.

Mr. CADY moved to amend the bill by striking out so much thereof as authorizes a subscription by the Government of seven millions to the capital stock of the bank, and supported his motion by a number of observations. He contended that no advantage would accrue to the United States from the possession of this interest in the Bank. The money to pay for this stock, he said, would cost the United States more than any profit they could derive from it—that is, by the expense attending its collection; all the funds of the Government accruing sooner or later from taxation on the people; and would, besides, render necessary the imposition of additional taxes to meet it. It would be like an individual's taking up money at 18 per cent. (which he estimated as the cost of collection, &c.) to put into this bank. The seven millions of money, he added, would contribute more to the wealth and improvement of the country—would produce in the end a better interest to the United States, by suffering it to remain in the hands of the people—than it could possibly do by being invested in the stock of this bank. But it had been intimated that a stock might be created, bearing 5 or 6 per cent. interest, for the purpose of paying the proportion of the United States' subscription to the bank, the bank interest on which would redeem it in time. Though this idea was plausible, Mr. C. argued it was not solid. The United States must ultimately pay the stock; and as to the income or profit to the Government from the bank, it would be much more simple to compel it to pay such a sum annually to the Treasury, without the circuitous process of taking stock in it, &c. He suggested other modes by which the bank could be made to contribute to the general wealth, without the Government's becoming a stockholder, &c.

Mr. CALHOUN opposed the motion, so decidedly, that he said he should consider the success of it as tantamount to a decision to strike out the first section of the bill. He showed by his statement of the operation of vesting this stock in the bank (which by the bill is to be done in certain annual proportions) that there would be a clear gain to the Government of at least 2 per cent. per annum—being the difference between the interest the Government pays on the stock and the interest it would receive on its bank shares.

Mr. RANDOLPH supported the motion, and availed himself of the occasion of his rising to enter largely into the subject, in a speech of considerable length. His general views follow: He said he could vote for this motion, because one of his chief objections—one of them, he repeated—was the concern which it was proposed to give to the United States in this bank. He referred to the sale by the Secretary of the Treasury, some years ago, of the shares belonging to the Bank of the United States, and stated the reasons of his approving that step; but, he added, that it was a strong argument against the feature of the bank bill, now under discussion, that, whenever there should be in this country a necessitous and profligate administration of the Government, that bank stock would be laid hold of by the first Squanderfield at the head of the Treasury, as the means of filling its empty coffers. But, if there was no objection to this feature stronger than that it would afford provision for the first rainy day, it might not be considered so very important. He argued, however, that it was eternally true, that nothing but the precious metals, or paper bottomed on them, could answer as the currency of any nation or any age, notwithstanding the fanciful theories that great payments could only be made by credits and paper. How, he asked, on this point, were the mighty armies of the ancient world paid off? Certainly not in paper or bank credits. He expressed his fears lest gentlemen had got some of their ideas on these subjects from the wretched pamphlets under which the British and American press had groaned on the subject of a circulating medium. He said he had himself once turned projector, and sketched the plan of a bank, of which it was a feature that the Government should have a concern it; but he became convinced of the fallacy of his views; he found his project would not answer. His objection to the agency of the Government in a bank was therefore, he said, of no recent date, but one long since formed. The objection was vital; that it would be an engine of irresistible power in the hands of any Administration; that it would be in politics and finance what the celebrated proposition of Archimedes was in physics—a place, the fulcrum from which, at the will of the Executive, the whole nation could be hurled to destruction, or managed in any way, at his will and discretion.

This bill, in the view of Mr. R., presented two distinct questions: the one frigidly and rigorously a mere matter of calculation; the other, involving some very important political considerations. In regard to the present depreciation of paper, he did not appear to agree with those who thought the establishment of the National Bank would not aid in the reformation of it. If he were to go into the causes which produced the present state of things, he said, he should never end. As to the share the banks themselves had in producing it, he regarded the dividends they had made, since its commencement, as conclusive proof. The present time, Mr. R. went on to remark, was in his view one of the most disastrous he had ever witnessed in the Republic, and this bill proved it. The proposal to establish this great bank he described as a crutch, and, as far as he understood it, it was a broken one: it would tend, instead of remedying the evil, to aggravate it. The evil of the times, he said, was a spirit engendered in this Republic, fatal to Republican principles, fatal to Republican virtue; a spirit to live by any means but those of honest industry; a spirit of profusion—in other words, the spirit of Catiline himself, alieni avidus, sui profusus—a spirit of expediency, not only in public but private life; the system of Diddler in the farce, living any way and well—wearing an expensive coat, and drinking the finest wines, at anybody's expense. This bank, he imagined (he was far from ascribing to the gentleman from South Carolina any such views) was to a certain extent a modification of the same system. Connected, as it was to be, with the Government, whenever it went into operation, a scene would be exhibited on the great theatre of the United States, at the contemplation of which he shuddered. If we mean to transmit our institutions unimpaired to posterity, if some now living wish to continue to live under the same institutions by which they are now ruled—and, with all its evils, real or imaginary, he presumed no man would question that we live under the easiest Government on the globe—we must put bounds to the spirit which seeks wealth by every path but the plain and regular path of honest industry and honest fame. This was one of the grounds on which he was hostile to this bill.

Alluding to Mr. WEBSTER's observation respecting the laws fixing the currency of the United States, he said, it was very true they were clear and peremptory in their provisions. If the existing laws did not compel men to pay their debts, the establishment of a bank would not. Let us not disguise the fact, said he, pursuing his remarks on what he described as the evil of the times; we think we are living in the better times of the Republic, we deceive ourselves; we are almost in the days of Sylla and Marius; yes, we have almost got down to the time of Jugurtha. It was unpleasant, he said, to put one's self in array against a great leading interest in a community, be they a knot of land speculators, paper jobbers, or what not; but, he said, every man you meet in this House or out of it, with some rare exceptions, which only served to prove the rule, was either a stockholder, president, cashier, clerk, or doorkeeper, runner, engraver, paper-maker, or mechanic in some other way to a bank. The gentleman from Pennsylvania, he said, might dismiss his fears for the State banks, with their one hundred and seventy millions of paper on eighty-two millions of capital. However great the evil of their conduct might be, he asked, in the course of his illustrations, who was to bell the cat—who was to take the bull by the horns? You might as well attack Gibraltar with a pocket pistol as to attempt to punish them. There were very few, he said, who dared to speak truth to this mammoth; the banks were so linked together with the business of the world, that there were very few men exempt from their influence. The true secret is, said he, the banks are creditors as well as debtors; and if we were merely debtors to them for the paper in our pockets, they would soon, like Morris and Nicholson, go to jail (figuratively speaking) for having issued more paper than they were able to pay when presented to them. A man had their note, he said, for fifty dollars perhaps in his pocket, for which he wants fifty Spanish milled dollars; but they have his note for five thousand in their possession, and laugh at his demand. We are tied hand and foot, Mr. R. said, and bound to conciliate this great mammoth, which is set up to worship in this Christian land—we are bound to propitiate it, &c. Thus, he said, whilst our Government denounces hierarchy, will permit no privileged order for conducting the service of the only true God, whilst it denounces nobility, &c., has a privileged order of new men grown up, the pressure of whose foot he at this moment felt on his neck. If anything could reconcile him to this monstrous alliance between the bank and the Government, he could, if the object could be attained of compelling these banks to fulfil their engagements, almost find in his heart to go with the gentleman in voting for it.

Mr. R. proceeded to a minute examination of the state of the paper currency, and its various phases, recently and in earlier times. The stuff uttered on all hands, and absolutely got by rote by the haberdashers' boys behind the counters in the shops, that the paper now in circulation would buy anything you want as well as gold and silver, was answered, he said, by saying, that you want to buy silver with it. He examined, in detail, the present mode of banking, which, he said, goes to demoralize society; it was as much swindling to issue notes with intent not to pay, as it was burglary to break open a house. If they were unable to pay, the banks were bankrupts; if able to pay, and would not, they were fraudulent bankrupts, &c. But, he said, a man might as well go to Constantinople to preach Christianity, as to get up here and preach against banks. He despaired, he said, almost, of remedying the evil they cause, when he saw so many men of respectability directors, stockholders, debtors of the banks. To pass this bill, he said, would be like getting rid of the rats by setting fire to the house; whether any other remedy could be devised, he did not now undertake to pronounce. The banks, he said, had lost all shame, and exemplified a beautiful and very just observation of one of the finest writers, that men banded together in a common cause, will collectively do that at which every individual of the combination would spurn. This observation had been applied to the enormities committed and connived at by the British East India Company, and would equally apply to the modern system of banking; but still more to the spirit of party, &c., on which Mr. R. digressed at some length.

He then resumed the consideration of the history of bank paper in this country, and stated the fact that, not many years ago, the New England paper had been at almost as great a discount here, as the paper of this part of the country now was there; and that even in New England the notes of some of the banks were not current within their own States, except at a discount. As to establishing this bank to prevent a variation in the rate of exchange of bank paper, he said, you might as well expect to prevent a variation of the wind; you might, said he, as well pass an act of Congress (for which, if it would be of any effect, he should certainly vote) to prevent the northwest wind from blowing in our teeth as we go from the House to our lodgings. After a minute discussion of the causes and rates of the difference of exchange in the paper of various banks, Mr. R. concluded his remarks by pledging himself to agree to any adequate means to cure the great evil, that were consistent with the administration of the Government, in such a manner as to conduce to the happiness of the people, and the reformation of the public morals.

Mr. WARD defended the Massachusetts banking institutions from imputations, which he thought a part of Mr. R.'s remarks on the currency calculated to cast on their correct management.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, then rose, and addressed the House at considerable length in opposition to the motion before the House, and in reply to Mr. CADY, Mr. RANDOLPH, and other gentlemen. He explained, by ample illustrations, the preference which a note of the National Bank would have over the notes of other banks, and even over Treasury notes bearing interest, and the manner in which it would guard itself from a run for specie, &c., by a combination of individuals or other banks. In regard to the direction and management of fiscal affairs, he said, the late Secretary of the Treasury, (meaning Mr. Gallatin,) who went into that Department with as many prejudices as any man could well entertain, thought all was wrong there, and he was the very person to set all right. He had examined the subject day and night, and, after all his examination, he had not found a single iota of Mr. Hamilton's system which it was necessary to alter, &c. By this anecdote, Mr. S. illustrated the advantage of practice over theory. He made many remarks, to show the operation which made Treasury notes generally more valuable than the notes of any bank not paying specie, and less valuable than the notes of any bank which does pay specie; and, he said, if this were not to be a specie bank, he should not have been found in favor of it. The depreciation of paper, he said, was not wholly owing to the suspension of specie payments, as he proved by a reference to the difference of exchange between Baltimore and New York, in both of which places specie was not paid by the banks, and yet the exchange was $9\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. against Baltimore, &c. This was owing to the balance of trade being thrown against them during the war, the Chesapeake having been almost wholly shut up, whilst Baltimore vessels put into the port of New York, with their cargoes and prizes, &c. He did not wish the Government to pay any money into this bank, but stock to be created, &c., respecting which he did not know; but he should move an amendment, and also to expedite the payment of the specie portion of the subscription by individuals to the bank, for, without three-fourths of the proposed amount of specie in its vaults, the bank would not dare to issue a note.

Mr. CADY again spoke in support of his motion, and in reply to the objections against it. When he concluded the Committee rose.

FRIDAY, March 1.

Mr. TELFAIR presented a petition of James E. Houstoun, brother and guardian of Mossman Houstoun, late a Lieutenant Colonel in the Army of the United States, and who, while in that capacity, became deranged in his mind, praying that some measure may be adopted for the support of his said brother.—Referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. YANCEY made a report on the petitions of Thomas Farrar, William Young, and William Moseley; which was read; when Mr. Y. reported a bill for the relief of Thomas Farrar, William Young, and William Moseley; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

On motion of Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, the Secretary of War was directed to lay before this House an estimate of the damages sustained by the vessels sunk in the entrance of the port of Baltimore, by order of the Commanding General, to prevent the enemy from passing Fort McHenry.

The bill in addition to the act establishing the Post Office Establishment, passed through a Committee of the Whole, and was reported to the House.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

On motion of Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH—

Resolved, That the Committee on the District of Columbia be instructed to inquire by what authority and for what object the digging of the ground on Capitol square has been commenced, and into the propriety of putting a stop to it.

[Mr. G. had reference in his resolution to some operations commenced on the public square for making bricks.]

After some remarks to show the great evils resulting to the community from the influx of unauthorized notes purporting to be issued by banks which no one knew, and which in some cases were palpable frauds, unsupported by any ability to pay them, Mr. G. moved the following resolution, which was agreed to:

Resolved, That the committee appointed to inquire into the state of the several banks in the District of Columbia be instructed to inquire into the expediency of prohibiting, within the said District, the circulation of notes issued by any private banking association, whether existing within the District or elsewhere, and of restraining the formation of such private banking associations in future.

TRAFFIC IN SLAVES.

Mr. RANDOLPH then rose and said that it was his purpose to move for instructions to the Committee of the said District upon a subject of infinitely more importance in every point of view than those to which Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH had adverted. He expressed a wish that some other gentleman had undertaken the business; but as no one had thought proper to awaken the House to a sense of their concern in it, or to point the finger of scorn at it, he would take upon him the office to do it, and to call upon the House to put a stop to proceedings at that moment carried on under their very noses; proceedings that were a crying sin before God and man; a practice which, he said, was not surpassed for abomination in any part of the earth; for in no part of it, not even excepting the rivers on the coast of Africa, was there so great and so infamous a slave market as in the metropolis, in the very Seat of Government of this nation, which prided itself on freedom. Before he proceeded further, he fenced himself in against all suspicion of unduly interfering in the very delicate subject of the relation between the slave and his owner, and to that end he reminded the House that where a bill was brought in some years before to prevent the prosecution of the African slave trade, he had voted against it, because it professed a principle against which it was the duty of every man of the southern or slaveholding States to set his face; for it assumed a prerogative to interfere in the right of property between the master and his slave. On account of that opposition he had been calumniously and falsely held up, as one of the advocates of the most nefarious, the most disgraceful, and most infernal traffic that has ever stained the annals of the human race. Upon another occasion, too, when a member of that House had taken upon him the lien between slave and master, he had raised his voice against him. He had never directly or indirectly acquiesced in the weak and wailing plans of those who, by way of relieving the unfortunate African, would throw the States into danger; he would never weaken the form of the contract between the owner and his slave, and he would never deny that the citizens of other States coming into the slaveholding States might exercise the right of ownership over the slaves they might purchase; but it was not necessary to that exercise that this city should be made a depot of slaves, who were bought either from cruel masters or kidnapped; and of those who were kidnapped, he said there were two kinds—slaves stolen from their masters, and free persons stolen, as he might say, from themselves. It was not necessary that we should have, here in the very streets of our new metropolis, a depot for this nefarious traffic—in comparison with which the traffic from Africa to Charleston or Jamaica was mercy, was virtue. Indeed there could be no comparison rationally instituted between taking those savages from their native wilds and tearing the civilized informed negro, habituated to cultivated life, from his master, his friends, his wife, his children, or his parents. As to the right of passing through the place, as ordinary occasions might require, it was unquestionable; but there was a great difference between that and making the District a depot for a systematic slave market—an assemblage of prisons where the unfortunate beings, reluctant, no doubt, to be torn from their connexions, and the affections of their lives, were incarcerated and chained down, and thence driven in fetters like beasts, to be paid for like cattle. Mr. R. therefore moved that the Committee of the District of Columbia should be instructed to inquire into the inhuman and illegal traffic in slaves carried on in the District, and to devise some speedy means to put a stop to it.

Mr. TUCKER (chairman of that committee) suggested that it would be better to have it referred to the committee some time since appointed to form a system of laws for the District.

Mr. RANDOLPH expressed his regret that the honorable gentleman seemed disposed to decline the task, and offered himself to take his share in the enterprise. The object of the resolution, he said, was a more coercive police. He knew that the demands for cotton, tobacco, and latterly of sugar, created a demand for slaves, and we had a description of people here like those described by Mungo Park, (only that they are not so humane or so honest,) white traders, who make this their depot, and sell human beings; and to verify this charge, and show the audacious villainy of their proceedings, he dwelt upon these words of an advertisement of a sale of negroes—"No objection to TRADERS bidding." The increase in the price was the temptation for which their base, hard-hearted masters sold out of their families the negroes who had been raised among them. That very day he had heard a horrible fact from a respectable gentleman as he came to the House, which he would relate. A poor negro, by hard work and saving of his allowances, had laid by money enough to buy the freedom of his wife and child, and had paid it from time to time into the hands of his master, but the poor fellow died. The transaction was an affair of honor with the master, and the day after the poor fellow's death, the woman and child were sold. One fact like this spoke volumes. He repeated, that if the honorable chairman of the Committee of the District of Columbia refused to take upon him the inquiry into this rank offence, he (Mr. R.) would himself be among these people. He declared that he was lately mortified at being told by a foreigner of high rank, "You call this the land of liberty, and every day that passes things are done in it at which the despotisms of Europe would be horrorstruck and disgusted."

Mr. WRIGHT said the laws were sufficient to take cognizance of this business, and said that there was worse slavery practised in Europe, [Alluding to pressing in the navy of England.]

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH expressed his satisfaction at this affair being brought before the House. He had himself more than once met more than a dozen of those unhappy wretches marching in droves through the street. He met them even in the avenue, and it was a notorious fact that this was the channel of transmission for them. Speaking of laws was useless. When the evils were seen to exist, and were not prevented, it was a proof that the laws were of no value, or were not executed.

Mr. HOPKINSON had no idea of Congress taking such care about matters of inferior consideration, while such flagitious, and, to the nation, disgraceful deeds of guilt were suffered to be perpetrated under its very eye and with its knowledge. He suggested that as Mr. RANDOLPH had, to his own great honor, offered his co-operation, it would be best to appoint a select committee for the purpose, and moved for one accordingly.

Mr. TUCKER declared that the honorable gentleman (Mr. R.) had misunderstood him, and that he was no less willing than himself to co-operate in the measure, and concurred in Mr. HOPKINSON's opinion, that a select committee would be best.

The resolution passed is as follows :

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire into the existence of an inhuman and illegal traffic in slaves carried on in and through the District of Columbia, and to report whether any, and what, measures are necessary for putting a stop to the same.

Messrs. RANDOLPH, HOPKINSON, GOLDSBOROUGH, MAYRANT, and KERR, were appointed the said committee.

NATIONAL BANK.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the National Bank bill. The motion to strike out so much of the first section as allows Government to subscribe for seventy thousand shares of the stock, being still under consideration—

Mr. WRIGHT opposed the amendment at some length. He was sorry to see a plan which promised such great benefit to the country in the present deranged state of its currency, endangered by the present motion. If the motion prevailed, he should be compelled, he said, to vote against the bill, much as he was in favor of establishing a bank. He wished to see the bank possessed in part by the Government and partly by the citizens, because the stock of it would be extremely profitable. The Government ought to have an interest in the bank, as they would thereby be informed of all the plans which might be at any time entertained by the directors of so powerful an institution. He was not afraid, however, to trust our citizens; nor ought they to be suspicious of the Government; and the participation of the Government could not, he conceived, be productive of injury or mischief. Mr. W. adverted to the assertion that such an institution would realize the imagined lever of Archimedes, with which the world might be moved. He wished it did possess that mighty power, and it could be brought to bear on the rotten and corrupt Governments of Europe. We have, he said, given to that portion of the world examples of liberty, of valor on the sea and on the land, and he should be glad if, by any power, we could crush the despotisms which oppress it, &c. He said he was surprised at the objections made by gentlemen from the East to establish this bank on so large a proportion of the public stock, as the effect would be to raise that stock immediately to par, &c.

Mr. JEWETT, in reply, said, the gentleman who had just sat down had exorcised the House in the outset, and had threatened it with voting against the bill if it did not suit him. He would not follow the example of that gentleman. He would not go to Europe to put down Governments, to light flames, and put out fires; but he would state a few matters of fact. This question affected the interest of every State and town in the country. It was of great magnitude; it would either restore the credit of our currency, or make it worse than it is already; and to illustrate his opinion on this important subject, he would state a case in point. Some ten or fifteen years ago, he said, there was a certain State (Vermont) which had no bank; but there were banks in adjoining States which afforded much profit; and the people of the State thought they might as well grow rich by banking as their neighbors. They supposed, if the limited means and numbers of private banks could make money, that the extended means of a State would make an institution still more profitable; that it would drive out the paper of other banks, facilitate the operations of the State, &c., as had been argued in favor of the bank now proposed. A State bank was accordingly established on a small specie capital, and paper to a large amount issued, which they thought would never be returned for payment. What was the consequence? The paper of other banks, it was true, disappeared; but it was because of the suspicion which attached to the State paper. The machine, if it might be called so, went on badly; it was attributed to bad management of its concerns; and attempts were made to remedy the defects, but in vain. The paper depreciated from six to ten, and from ten to fifteen per cent.; and finally, by the juggle, the people of the State lost, how much he was not certain, but a great amount he knew. So it would be, he said, with the plan now contemplated, if not amended; and if the objections to it were not obviated, he should be compelled to vote against the bill, although he was strongly in favor of a bank on proper principles. If passed in its present shape, it would entail evils on the country, which money could not compensate, &c.

Mr. ROSS advocated the motion to amend the bill. He did not believe, as had been argued, that a participation in the bank would strengthen the arm of the Government, or be very profitable. If, however, the arm of Government was to be strengthened by weakening that of the citizens, and uniting with a privileged aristocracy, he was decidedly opposed to it. He did not wish the Government to become partners in such a privileged order. If the reasons for retaining the principle in the bill were correct, he thought the proportion allowed too small. If Government was to derive this great profit from the participation, its share was not great enough. It had been said that the influence of one bank (the Manhattan) could have prevented the election of Mr. Jefferson to the Presidency; if that bank had been under Executive control, he believed its power would have been exerted. This was a proof of the danger of giving Government a great influence in such institutions. He was opposed to the plan chiefly from his objections to joining a moneyed aristocracy, and his fears that it might operate injuriously to the liberties of the country, &c.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH made a few remarks on the motion. If the provision was inserted as an apology for the appointment of the five directors by the Government, then he was opposed to it; but if it would be as profitable as was predicted, and would enable us to dispense with some of the existing internal taxes, he should be glad to vote for it. A good bank, Mr. G. said, would be very serviceable; and he should vote against the motion because he could not see that any harm would arise from the nation participating in a pecuniary establishment, &c.

The question was then taken on striking out the provision, and decided in the negative, as follows: For the amendment 38, against it 61.

The Committee of the Whole proceeded with the consideration of the rest of the bill. After the adoption of some verbal amendments—city for Philadelphia, as the place to which to return the books, &c., (to place the bank at Washington.) Mr. W. said, having a strong desire that the bill should pass, and knowing some to feel a delicacy in supporting it, from Constitutional scruples, he thought it better to fix the bank where there could be no objections on that score, and where also its operations would be facilitated. Washington is the seat of Government of the nation, and here, he said, it would be under the eye of the Government, where there would be less danger from so great a moneyed aristocracy, and the national interest would be better guarded than at any other place. Mr. W. said it was not his purpose to anticipate objections to his motion; but the principal one he knew to be, that a sufficient number of persons could not be found at Washington qualified for directors. The force of this objection he denied in the extent to which it was urged. In the city and neighboring country, he was convinced that there would be found abundant talents for managing the concerns of the bank. The people of this District, moreover, deserved highly of the Government. They had, in time of need, done as much or more, in proportion to numbers, to aid the country, than any other section of the Union. Mr. W. adverted to the source whence the bill originated, and insinuated that much of the ground for recommending Philadelphia must be attributed to the partiality of those who had named that city in the bill; and concluded by saying that the motive for fixing the old Bank of the United States at Philadelphia was the same that ought now to place the present bank here, to wit, that it is the seat of Government.

Mr. WRIGHT moved to substitute Washington

Mr. ROBERTSON said he coincided with the gentleman in some of his views. He could see no strong reason for preferring Philadelphia; because, if the object was to select a city on account of its commerce, Philadelphia was not the most commercial place; and if that reason carried the bank from the Seat of Government, the same reason would prevent its being located at Philadelphia. But Mr. R. said he had another reason for disapproving the place mentioned in the bill—he was unwilling to impose upon Philadelphia an institution so obnoxious to the Representatives from that city, all of whom were so decidedly hostile to the bank. However, he said, he should not vote for the motion, because, as a place of greater commerce, he preferred Philadelphia to Washington.

At the suggestion of Mr. CALHOUN, who thought the motion had better be offered on a subsequent stage of the bill, Mr. WRIGHT withdrew his amendment for the present.

On motion of Mr. WEBSTER, the bill was amended by inserting a clause making foreign coins receivable for subscriptions at their real ascertained value, and not according to the rate fixed by the former act of Congress, which was admitted to be incorrect, particularly in the value placed on Spanish gold coins.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, adverted to the insinuation which had been thrown out, that the bank was not intended to be, and could not be, a specie bank; and repeating that he, for one, had in view a bank of no other kind—to insure to it that character therefore, and remove the doubts now entertained by others—he moved to strike out the word five (the amount of the second payment, required in specie) with the intention of moving to substitute a larger sum. He thought it better to enable the bank to do, as soon as practicable, a liberal business, and at the same time lessen the chance of drawing out, by any run on it, the specie at first paid in, &c.

Mr. CALHOUN had not much objection to the motion; though he thought the bank could certainly do safely a business to the amount of the first specie payment; and if a greater business was offered to them, they would have it in their power to increase their specie at pleasure. His only objection to enlarging the first cash instalment was, that it might have the effect to draw the specie out of the existing banks.

Mr. SMITH's motion to strike out the word five was carried, and he then moved to fill the blank with the word fifteen, and to strike out altogether the last payment of ten dollars in specie, which was to have been made at eighteen months from the day of subscription;—which was also agreed to—ayes 56, noes 44.

Mr. ROOR said the section under their consideration was the essential part of the contemplated institution, as it contained its constituent or vital parts; and proceeded to enumerate the various stocks receivable in subscription, the rates fixed for them by the bill; the price paid for them by the lenders to the Government, and the profits now about to be given to those lenders, by raising the stocks to par—thus granting a bounty to those men. The same reasons did not exist, he said, for such a measure at present, as existed at the last session. Then, the credit of the Government was weak; now it was strong. He would not deny that the lenders to the Government might have been actuated by patriotic motives; but that was no reason for granting to them anything more than was bargained for—and he proceeded to show that by allowing the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund to buy up this stock, instead of permitting it to be subscribed in the bank at the rates prescribed by the bill, the Government would save about two millions in its redemption, &c. For these and other reasons adduced, he moved to amend the bill by fixing the rate at which the six per cent. stock shall be received in subscription to the bank at ninety per cent. instead of par.

Mr. CALHOUN objected to the motion. Its obvious effect, if not its object, he said, was to increase the bonus. If the stocks are depreciated, said Mr. C., it is not the fault of the holders of it, but of the Government itself, and it would be improper in the Government to take advantage of this depreciation. The measure would also have an injurious influence on the subscriptions to the bank, without answering any good purpose, and he, therefore hoped the motion would not prevail.

Mr. ROOR said in reply, that those who boasted so much of having loaned their money to the Government, only gave their depreciated notes, and received in return the notes of the Government, by which they made a great profit, and that was all their merit, &c.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH made a few remarks on the motion. He thought it questionable whether a Government ought to fix on its own stock a manifest depreciation, and in this instance, it would be an act of very great injustice, and a violation of public faith; because, in the next clause, it was provided, that the stock should be redeemed and liquidated at the rates at which it was paid in to the bank, &c.

Mr. ROSS thought the circumstance deprecated by the gentleman last up, existed already; which opinion he supported by a few arguments. The whole system of this bill, he said, was an encouragement to stock-jobbers, and was of the same character as the measure which once benefited the speculators at the expense of the Revolutionary soldier, by funding their certificates, &c.

The question was then taken on the motion of Mr. ROOR, and negatived—only seven or eight gentlemen rising in favor of it.

The Committee then rose, reported progress and obtained leave to sit again.

SATURDAY, March 2.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a report and statement of additions which have been made, since the 30th September last, to the funded and floating debts of the United States; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. WRIGTER, from the committee on that part of the President's Message which relates to an arrangement of the militia expenses, incurred by the States without the sanction of the General Government, reported a bill for the payment of the militia in the case therein mentioned; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

On motion of Mr. HALL,

Resolved, That the Committee on the National Currency be directed to inquire into the expediency of compelling the banks in the different States, after the first day of November next, to resume specie payments, by increasing the duty on stamps, or in any other manner which may be best calculated to produce the desired effect.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill "to reduce the amount of the direct tax upon the United States and the District of Columbia, for the year 1816," with amendments; they have also passed a bill "for the relief of Richard Mitchell," in which amendments and bill they ask the concurrence of this House.

POST OFFICE BILL.

The House then proceeded to the report of the Committee of the Whole, on the bill in addition to the act regulating the Post Office Establishment. The report being gone through, many amendments were successively offered to the bill, which produced much discussion.

Post Office Bill.

MARCH, 1816.

The bill having been amended, on motion of Mr. WRIGHT, so as to allow to members of Congress the privilege of franking letters during the recess, the same power was attempted to be obtained for the Chaplain; which motion was supported by Mr. WRIGHT, and opposed by Mr. PICKERING, and then negatived—yeas 5.

Mr. TALLMADGE moved the following amendment as section 4.:

And be it further enacted, That no mail shall be transported on the Sabbath; nor shall any post office be opened for the receipt or delivery of letters, packets, or newspapers, on the Lord's day; any law or usage to the contrary notwithstanding.

Mr. T. said, when he recollected the numerous petitions which had been presented to Congress from all parts of the United States, at the present session, he had hoped that, when the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads made their report, they would have noticed this subject with particular attention. He said he was fortified in this hope, from the consideration that the subject was not a new one; it had been presented again and again, by various classes of the community, without respect to party, praying for the interposition of the National Legislature to prevent the transportation and opening of the mail on the Sabbath, but in this he was disappointed.

He was, moreover, aware that great difficulties were to be surmounted, and strong prejudices overcome, to effect the objects he had in view. The worst passions of the human heart would be brought into exercise when their stronghold should thus be attacked. The plea of necessity, and very possibly even of duty, would be urged to continue a practice which had too long been a reproach to our legislative code, and exposed our country to the judgments of Heaven.

Mr. T. said, the argument he proposed to offer to the House, in support of his amendment, was of a twofold nature. It had for its basis the unequivocal command of the Supreme legislator, and it was fraught with blessings to mankind.

It would be needless, said Mr. T., if not indecorous, to prove the Divine institution of the Sabbath day. In this enlightened age, and in a Christian country, it is presumed that such a task would be useless. I will only take occasion, said he, to remark, that in the decalogue this precept is given with a solemn sanction, and with great clearness and precision; nor does there appear to be any dispensing power left to human wisdom, but that which may be derived from works of necessity and mercy.

As to the advantages resulting from a due observance of this sacred precept, they are numerous and great. The cessation of labor through one day out of seven, serves greatly to relieve and refresh both man and beast, and thus to fit them more effectually to perform the duties of the ensuing week. But the solemn duties of public worship, which are more immediately enjoined on this holy day, are by no means to be dispensed with. In the sanctuary of the Lord, and from the lips of the priest, are the people to expect lessons of pure morality and virtue.

The history of the world, in every age, exhibits indubitable evidence, that where the Sabbath has been revered, and the worship of the Supreme Being attended with reverence and devotion, then public prosperity and private happiness have been most abundantly enjoyed. In ancient history, the Jews afford the most incontrovertible evidence of this truth. While under the immediate direction of the Supreme lawgiver, they were commanded to observe the Sabbath day and keep it holy; to worship the great Jehovah in their solemn assemblies, and wholly to abstain from servile labor. To the observance of these duties manifold blessings were promised; and, on their neglect, the heaviest judgments were denounced. And who is so ignorant as not to know that, so long as they remained faithful to their covenant obligations and obedient to their God, (and no duty was more pointedly enjoined than a due observance of the Sabbath,) they were the most prosperous and happy nation on the earth; but when they declined in their duty, and forgot their vows; when they neglected to keep the Sabbath day holy, according to the Divine command, and the consequent practice of idol worship supplanted that of the living and true God, they became uneasy under the restraints of the law. He fulfilled his righteous judgments, by giving them up to be destroyed. And where are they now as a nation, and what has become of their beautiful temple and their glory? Nay, further, Mr. Speaker, I venture to assert that there is not a nation on earth, where the great Jehovah is not respected by a due observance of the Sabbath, that the people can be said to be either prosperous or happy.

On a former occasion, when this subject was before Congress, I recollect that a prominent objection against granting the relief prayed for, was, that the nation was in a state of war, and that it became indispensable that every facility should be afforded to communication as well as transportation. Happily for this country this heavy judgment has been removed, and we are now at peace with all the world. A more favorable time may probably never occur to retrieve our national character, and wipe this foul reproach from our system. Let it not be said that our laws, relating to the Post Office, do not absolutely require that the Sabbath should be broken to carry them into effect. If evils exist which the Legislature can only remedy, and they omit to correct them, they must be deemed responsible for all their consequences.

I am aware, however, Mr. Speaker, that objections will be made to the amendment now proposed, by men of pleasure and amusement, by men of business, and by those who are burdened with the cares of State. The pleasure of hearing from friends; of receiving and communicating the earliest news; and of promoting worldly profits, will be deemed by many insuperable objections to the proposition which I have now submitted. But, sir, to every objection of this sort, it is enough for me to find what is the rule of duty. If the sanction of the Supreme lawgiver can be clearly discovered claiming the Sabbath for himself, and prohibiting worldly amusements and employments, our duty is clear, and the neglect of it is criminal. In that case we may not confer with flesh and blood; we are not left to consult our own pleasure and advantage; but we are bound to obey, and to trust the providence of God to provide for us in some other way. "Thus saith the Lord," is calculated to silence every objection, and lay the whole race of Adam at his footstool.

I beg leave further to remark, that if the mails are permitted freely to pass on the Sabbath, and the post offices to be opened for the delivery of letters and newspapers, the former will probably increase to disturb the worship of our solemn assemblies, while the latter may become, in some places, receptacles for those devoted to noise and riot. Sir, I wish to see this evil remedied before it has progressed so far as almost to defy the salutary restraints of municipal law; I wish to see the Sabbath rescued from violation and reproach.

In offering the present amendment, I hope no one will impute to me motives derived from selfishness or popularity. I am fully aware that the predominant passions of the human heart are all against me, and, having nearly closed my political life, I have nothing to hope for or expect from popular applause. I am always ambitious to obtain the approbation of the virtuous and the good; and, whether this attempt shall succeed or not, I ask no more of this honorable House than a belief that I have offered this amendment from a solemn conviction of duty, and that the best interests of our country demand such a measure at our hands. I have only one request further to make, which is, that the yeas and nays may be granted on the final decision of this question.

Mr. T.'s motion gave rise to a debate of considerable length, involving the arguments, pro and con. It was opposed by Mr. INGHAM. (chairman of the Post Office Committee.) because the subject of the motion was specially referred to that committee, on which they would very soon make a report, when the propriety of the measure might be argued. The motion was also opposed by Messrs. PICKERING, MILLS, of Massachusetts, JACKSON, HALL, and WRIGHT, for this and other reasons.

The motion was finally decided in the negative—yeas 35, nays 100, as follows:

The House then, on motion of Mr. HALL, for reasons which he stated, agreed to reconsider the amendment which gives to the members of Congress the privilege of franking during the recess.

In the debate which ensued on this subject, the privilege of franking during the recess was advocated by Messrs. RANDOLPH, WRIGHT, GROSVENOR, and CULPEPER; and opposed by Messrs. HALL, COMSTOCK, and PICKERING. The debate was of a miscellaneous character, desultory but rather interesting. The principal argument against granting the privilege was, that it created at their homes, in private life, an odious and unjust distinction from other citizens, in favor of members of Congress. To this it was replied, besides the arguments obviously favoring the amendment, that this privilege was not comparable in magnitude to that of exemption from militia service already existing by law, and which no one would propose to abrogate, &c.

The amendment going to allow this privilege to members of Congress, was at length agreed to—yeas 74, nays 62, as follows:

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH moved to insert in the bill the following section, as the fifth thereof, viz:

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That vessels whose business is confined to bays and rivers, and to ports and places between which no regular and direct mail is carried by water, shall be excepted from the operation of the fourth and fifth sections of the act passed at the last session of Congress, entitled "An act in addition to an act regulating the Post Office Establishment."

And the question thereon being taken, it passed in the negative.

Several other amendments were proposed to the bill, which being rejected, the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time on Monday next.

MONDAY, March 4.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, from the committee appointed on the petition of John M. Forbes, reported a bill for the relief of John M. Forbes; which was read twice and ordered to be engrossed and read the third time to-day, which was subsequently done, and the bill passed.

The bill in addition to the act to establish the Post Office Department was announced for a third reading, but recommitted to the Post Office Committee, for the purpose of receiving some trivial amendment.

The bill from the Senate for the relief of Richard Mitchell was twice read, and committed.

Mr. RANDOLPH, on the part of the committee appointed to inquire into the illegal traffic of slaves carried on through this District, asked and obtained authority to send for persons and papers relative to the inquiry.

COMPENSATION OF MEMBERS, &c.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, said he considered it his duty to make a proposition to the House, the object of which was the despatch of public business, a more punctual attendance of the members of Congress to their duty, and to shorten the sessions of Congress, by changing the compensation of the members from six dollars per day into a gross sum for each session, and by other regulations connected with the subject, having the same tendency; and to deduct the compensation of members in proportion to their absence from the House during the session. The public business has been so protracted, that at the close of three months, no member could yet see, with any certainty, the termination of the session. This delay may be ascribed to a variety of causes: such as the accumulation of business after a war; the variety of sentiment on every subject; but to no cause could we ascribe so much the delay of business, as to the constant and never-ending debate on every subject that came before Congress for decision. On subjects of importance, difficulty, and complication, discussion was necessary and proper; and on such occasions it should always be indulged, without restraint, until the subject was thoroughly understood. In speaking of the proceedings of the House, he did not wish to be considered as casting censure upon any member; he spoke of the House as a body; he spoke of evils which were apparent to all, and it was the duty of all to put an end to them. He could speak more freely of the necessity of reform in the proceedings of the House, because he did not pretend to inculcate himself less than others; on minor subjects, on detail, as to phraseology, and all amendments to bills and reports, it was the bounden duty of members to have confidence in each other, and not presume any to be unprepared to act. On the contrary, it should be admitted, as a matter of fact, that each member could judge for himself, and correctly, upon hearing the proposition made; and if any difficulty should exist as to matters of fact, a single inquiry of those whose duty it had been to examine them, would be all that should be required, in the way of conversation, and not in set speeches. In any such cases it would be a poor compliment to the capacity or attention of any member to suppose tedious examination necessary. Indeed we are very much mistaken if we presume that the silent members of the House (and they compose a majority) think less than those who speak most. Those who said but little were generally masters of the subject, understanding the principles and the details of a bill before it was acted upon. The House had adopted a rule that no member should speak more than twice on the same question. It was easy to evade the rule, by varying the question, and, indeed, the rule was nominal, for leave was always granted, when asked. The cry for the question was a kind of disorder that had no influence, because it was the duty of the Speaker, at all times, to suppress it, if a member was on the floor speaking. The inattention of the House to members speaking, had no greater influence, as it was not uncommon to see an interesting speaker occupying the floor, with an able speech, with a half dozen friends around him, listening, more out of courtesy, than a desire to have any doubts removed in relation to the subject. It is well known to the House that for several years past, particularly during the war, there was a universal disgust, clamor, and censure throughout the nation at our much talking and little action. The people had much reason on their side in this disgust, but they were not exactly acquainted with all the difficulties we had to encounter. It is, however, high time that Congress should be redeemed from imputations which have lessened very much the confidence of the people. It is also well known that daily and hourly we hear the entreaties of claimants, urging us to act upon their petition, until the applicants in many cases have to return home upon the bounty of friends, and continue to attend Congress many years, without a decision of their cases; and in most instances their claims were of the most meritorious character. To these inducements, Mr. J. said, a rule existed, known by the name of the previous question—a rule which would never be enforced but in the most extreme necessity; but, if it could be enforced, it would be effectual. But even in war, when we had such strong reason for it, very few members could be brought even to call it, and, when demanded, very seldom supported by the House; and, if supported there, certain members to whom the rule was obnoxious, would call the ayes and noes, and put every obstacle in the way of progressing. From the experience of the House on this subject, all would agree that the previous question, however proper to be in the hands of a majority of the House, was a dead letter in time of peace. There must be some remedy for this evil, and what is so effectual as to give a gross sum of money by which members will be made attentive to business, and not adjourn any day at four o'clock, when such a course of conduct would be to deprive them of an adequate compensation, &c.; on the other hand to take away the imputation on members of remaining in session for the per diem; and it will hold out the inducement of a higher reward, in proportion to the industry of the House. Without this remedy Congress would, after a while, have to sit all the year, which would ultimately drive every man from Congress whose time was valuable to himself and family, and who was not wealthy enough to make such a sacrifice of time. In a few years, riches and not patriotism would rule the nation; whatever we have, let it be by the session and not by the day. We can do in three months what we fail to do in ten under the present arrangement. As soon as the Spring opens what do we witness? The farmer wishes to return to his family and farm; the mechanic to his shop; the lawyer to his courts; applications are daily made for leave of absence, until we are left with a bare quorum, and sometimes not that; we have to send for members, and those who stay are injured, and some ruined, and ultimately quit Congress from necessity.

Compensation of Members, &c.

The session should be reduced to three, and not extended to six months. In such a case its sacrifice would not be so great. If inquiry should be made in this stage of the business, what compensation should be given as a gross sum of money to each member, the answer would be easy: such a compensation as will not cost the United States one cent more, but by our industry might be more to us; give a member of Congress what you give to your Doorkeeper, your Sergeant-at-Arms, and it will be better than the present system. Nothing extravagant, nothing prodigal; a compensation received by a good clerk in one of the departments would be sufficient: give what we may, the compensation should be in a gross sum, and not a compensation by the day. Mr. J. said the effect of this change would produce three results: 1st. It would lessen the duration of the session; 2d. It would give the members greater compensation if they acted with industry; 3d. It would save money to the nation, by lessening the contingent expenses of the House in fuel, stationery, and attendance, which was now very great. But it may be asked, should a gross sum operate upon members of Congress to be more industrious, as it would upon the day laborer, and he who worked by the job? Mr. J. said he had no doubt on the subject, and it was no disgrace to members to say that they could be operated upon like other men. In a Government like ours, we should avoid extravagance, so we should extreme parsimony. In relation to the Representatives of a free people, he thought they should be actuated from patriotic, and not sordid motives; and a reasonable compensation was all they should have. But a member of Congress who represents thirty-five thousand free men would feel himself degraded, and so would the people, if such was the reward as to drive from Congress all but the rich and the favored few. Mr. J. then moved the following resolution:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire into the expediency of changing the present mode of compensation to the members of Congress into a gross sum for each session; and to report such other provisions as may have a tendency to the despatch of public business, and to compel the punctual attendance of members of Congress during the session.

Mr. RANDOLPH expressed his hope the resolve would be adopted, and carried into complete effect. In moving it, he said, the gentleman from Kentucky had acted with a manliness which became his character; with a frankness and independence which deserves not only the thanks of this body, but the approbation of the nation. The situation in which members of Congress were placed, growing out of the manner in which they were compensated for their public services, was, he said, disgraceful to them individually, as well as a great public detriment. Was it wonderful, he asked, that they should be considered by the people at large in the light of day laborers, who work here for something less than a dollar an hour; for something more perhaps than you have to pay a man for sawing wood! He premised, with a solemn assurance of his sincerity in the declaration, that his opinion was now, and always had been, that the members of this and the other branch of the Government ought to receive no pay at all. This, he said, he knew to be an unpopular sentiment, but he sincerely entertained it. But, if the members were to receive pay, he would have them paid like gentlemen; because members of Congress ought to be gentlemen—they ought to be, and he trusted they were, in principle—not merely in their exterior, but in their high sense of honor, in a character which scorns, which spurns, to do that which is mean and base. In this point of view, Mr. R. said, he was decidedly in favor of the proposition of the gentleman from Kentucky. Mr. R. here took a discursive view of the course and origin of the Committee of Accounts, and of an attempt on the part of the Senate some years ago to establish a difference in the rates of payment between members of the Senate and the other House. A member of Congress, he went on to say, was as much entitled to his pay for the day he does not attend as for the day he does attend: it was not to be presumed, because he was not in his seat, that he was idle. His business, he said, was not merely to come here to write and frank so many letters, read so many newspapers, and stitch together so many documents as he daily finds on his table; to adjourn whenever the index of the clock pointed to four o'clock, and pass the remainder of the four and twenty hours in a perfect abstraction of mind and body from labor and exertion. No, Mr. R. said, even Sunday shone no Sabbath day for him; and yet, his account with the public for his services when a member heretofore, to this day remained unsettled, because he could not undertake to say to the Committee of Accounts how many days he had been absent, &c. This is a sort of economy he condemned—would they think of subtracting from the compensation of the head of a Department so much for every day he did not go to his office? A member of Congress, if he deserved to come at all, Mr. R. said, had no compensation for his services in the miserable pittance which the Government now allows, &c. He hoped this motion would pass, and that another reform would take place in the mode of doing business in the House; that was, by allowing days for business in the House, and leaving other days for doing business out of the House, &c. The present system might do, said he, for mercenary soldiers, for day laborers; but not for men of our time of life and of our state. With respect to devising any mode of forcing the attendance of members, he was afraid no better could be devised than that which exists; the compulsory process, stopping wages, &c., treating the members of this House like livery servants, would not do. Mr. R. concluded his remarks by saying he had sometimes reflected with pain on the gradual depreciation of the value of a seat in this House, since he first had the honor of a seat in it. Members then made no sacrifices of the dignity of their station, and of their own personal dignity. If they had not possessed native dignity, they acquired it from their stations; they felt themselves the Representatives each of thirty thousand souls. They thought it beneath them in those days, he said, to truckle to the great or to the small vulgar; to curry favor even with great officers of State, either foreign or domestic; much less with printers of journals, newspapers, &c.

Mr. STANFORD rose to enter his protest against any increase of the compensation of members of Congress; against offering such emoluments as would induce men of abilities to prefer offices and stations under the General Government to those under the State Governments. He would diminish rather than increase the compensation of the members of this House. He was willing to change the mode of compensation, but not in any way so as to increase it. The depreciation of money was, he said, a great and just complaint; but any change contemplating an increase of the compensation of the members, he thought, would be a change essentially to the mischief of principle. He was willing to change the mode of compensation; because in such a change there might be both economy and advantage.

Mr. RANDOLPH again rose. He said that whenever he differed from the gentleman last up, he doubted the correctness of his own judgment, so great reliance had he on that of that honorable gentleman. The resolution before the House did not speak of increase at all, but of a change in the mode of compensation. And, he asked, ought it not to be changed? Was it not an allegation every day presented to their eyes in the public prints, that the sessions of Congress were protracted for the convenience of some members who saved four dollars a day out of six? Mr. R. said he could conceive nothing worse than giving pay not adequate to the support of a member of this House, as he ought to live, and yet very adequate to the support, and profit too, of a man who lives as a member of this House ought not to live. This was the very surest mode that could be fixed on to make them tools of the Executive. He did not mean to speak of the present members, but he knew, he said, that in old times there were members who did live as members ought not to live, and there were members who laid up a very considerable sum by the end of the session, which they carried home with them in round eagles and half eagles, and not in rags. Ambition, "the infirmity of noble minds," might bring a man here, he said, but he seldom served long, because a proper regard to his private affairs would not authorize him to do so. The consequence had been, he added, that young men, not destitute of capacity, certainly, nor, perhaps, of education, but of anything that constitutes statesmen, had stepped into the chair of this House, to the heads of committees; and to their genius, if you will, but nothing like wisdom, are the destinies of this nation committed; and by the time they form some tolerable notion of the affairs of Government, they, too, are obliged to go home, and their place is supplied by another brood, equally callow and unfledged. If the State governments did not pay their officers properly, Mr. R. said he had no objection to offer such compensation to their men of talents as should compel the State governments to loose their niggard purse-strings. In speaking of Legislatures, Mr. R. said, we see, about November, about the time the fogs set in, men enough assembled in the various Legislatures, General and State, to make a regiment; then the legislative maggot begins to bite; then exists the rage to make new, and repeal old laws. He said he should not think we should find ourselves at all worse off if no law of a general nature had been passed by either General or State governments for ten or twelve years last past. Like Mr. Jefferson, he said, he was averse to too much regulation—averse to making the extreme medicine of the Constitution our daily food. He referred to the depreciation of paper as being a standing violation of the Constitution, (where it provides that the compensation of judges shall not be diminished during their continuance in office,) and intimated that an attempt had been lately made to induce the Chief Justice (Marshall) to accept his salary in the paper of this District, &c. The salaries of the officers of the Government were notoriously scanty; and though he would rather see the salary a disgrace to the man, than the man a disgrace to the office, he would give the public servants such salaries as would enable them to live without the imputation of dishonor. For, he asked, what man can live here on five thousand dollars a year? He may breathe on it.

MARCH, 1816.

Direct Tax.

H. OF R.

But who can keep a family, rent a house, furnish it, keep an equipage, give and receive entertainments on that annual amount? A five-penny bit would be just as adequate to that purpose, both being notoriously incompetent. A man so situated may have no patrimonial estate; he may be sui fortunæ faber—have sprung from the Lord knows where, and be without resources. If he lives as he ought in his station, the imputation is, that he wants money, and must have it, and that he has the means of coming at it directly or indirectly. If he had no other object, he said, in increasing the compensation of the members, if he could thereby compel the State governments to rescue their officers from the situation in which they were placed, he would do it. We have a right, said he, to go into market and bid against them. When we want a lawyer in an important case, do we go to him who will do our business for fifteen shillings, or to the Emmetts, the Tazewells, the Pinkneys, the Wickhams? When our personal interest is concerned we apply to master workmen, not to those who will job for us at six dollars a day.

Mr. WEBSTER said, the resolution presenting no question but that of inquiry, in that view he should concur in it. There was, he said, something radically defective in the present system of legislation. No Legislature in the world, he believed, however various its concerns, or extensive its sphere, sat as long as this, notwithstanding that its sphere of operation was so greatly contracted by the intervention of eighteen distinct Legislatures. The system does not compel, on the part of members, that attention which the nature of their public business requires. He referred to the letters and papers on the desks of the members every day. They ought to have none of them. When a man came into this House, he ought to leave on the threshold every feeling and thought but what was connected with the public service. Private letters and private conversation ought not to be permitted to encroach on the unity of his object. If, in any way, the attention of the House could be fixed on the speaker, Mr. W. said there would be an end to long speeches; for he defied any man to address any assembly of this sort, and address them long, if that attention was fixed on him. They would cease to speak when they ceased to have anything to say on anything or subject under debate. Mr. W. maintained that, under proper regulations, a session of two months in a year was perfectly adequate to the ordinary business of legislation. He expressed no opinion whether the compensation of members should be increased or diminished; but he was willing to inquire whether the mode of compensation could not be beneficially changed.

Mr. STANFORD said he had no idea of opposing this motion for inquiry when up before, but had merely risen to protest against any increase of compensation. The inquiry he thought proper. He believed such a change might be devised as would economize both the time and the funds of the nation.

The resolution was then agreed to without opposition; and Messrs. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, WEBSTER, PITKIN, JACKSON, GROSVENOR, YATES, McLEAN, of Ohio, were appointed the committee.

DIRECT TAX.

The amendment of the Senate to the bill to reduce the direct tax on the United States to three millions, and continue the same one year, was taken up for consideration.

The amendment made by the Senate was merely to provide, that where a State shall assume the payment of its quota of the direct tax and shall fail to pay it, then the Secretary of the Treasury shall direct the United States officers to proceed to assess and collect the same.

Mr. STANFORD moved to amend the amendment by placing in the President of the United States a discretionary power to suspend the assessment in the cases referred to, if in his opinion it should be found expedient.

This motion was opposed by Mr. RANDOLPH and Mr. JACKSON, and rejected without a voice in its favor.

Mr. HANSON, then, after stating his objections to the bill because it had not been modified in the Senate, as he hoped, into the form of a permanent tax, in which shape only it could be extensively useful to the nation, moved (with a view to repeal the direct tax in toto) to postpone this bill indefinitely, and thereon demanded the yeas and nays.

The motion was decided in the negative, without debate, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Atherton, Baylies, Boss, Bradbury, Brown, Champion, Goldsborough, Grosvenor, Hale, Hanson, Hopkinson, Jewett, King of Massachusetts, Langdon, Lewis, Lyon, Marsh, Mason, Noyes, Pickering, Pitkin, Randolph, Reed, Smith of Pennsylvania, Strong, Sturges, Tallmadge, Tate, Vose, Webster, Wheaton, and Wilcox—32.

NAYS—Messrs. Adgate, Alexander, Baker, Barbour, Bassett, Bateman, Bennett, Betts, Blount, Breckenridge, Brooks, Burnside, Cady, Calhoun, Cannon, Chappell, Cilley, Clarke of North Carolina, Clark of Kentucky, Clayton, Clopton, Comstock, Condict, Conner, Cooper, Crawford, Creighton, Culpeper, Cuthbert, Darlington, Davenport, Desha, Edwards, Forney, Forsyth, Gaston, Goodwyn, Griffin, Hall, Hammond, Har- din, Hawes, Henderson, Huger, Hulbert, Hungerford, Ingham, Irving of New York, Jackson, Johnson of Virginia, Johnson of Kentucky, Kent, Kerr of Virginia, King of North Carolina, Lowndes, Lumpkin, Lyle, Maclay, Mayrant, McCoy, McKee, McLean, of Kentucky, McLean of Ohio, Middleton, Milnor, Moore, Nelson of Massachusetts, Nelson of Virginia, Newton, Ormsby, Parris, Piper, Powell, Robertson, Root, Ross, Savage, Sharpe, Sheffield, Smith of Maryland, Smith of Virginia, Southard, Stanford, Taggart, Taul, Taylor, of New York, Telfair, Thomas, Townsend, Tucker, Wallace, Ward, of New York, Ward of New Jersey, Wendover, Whiteside, Wilde, Williams, Willoughby, Thomas Wilson, William Wilson, and Woodward—101.

Mr. RANDOLPH then, after disclaiming any disposition to embarrass or delay the public business by the motion, moved to postpone the subject until to-morrow, but subsequently withdrew his motion to make way for one by Mr. GASTON.

Mr. GASTON moved that the bill, as it was returned from the Senate, should be recommitted to the Committee of Ways and Means. Notwithstanding he was in favor of the land tax, as necessary to preserve the public faith, and to perfect the system of taxation, and had hoped that the other branch of the Legislature would have been able to restore the bill to its original character; yet, as the system had been broken up by the limitation of the tax to one year, and believing the revenue would eventually be reduced to the actual expenditures of the country, he wished the whole subject again referred to the committee which originally reported it, with a view to attempt the entire repeal of the tax.

Mr. LOWNDES thought the motion entirely irregular, inasmuch as it was properly impracticable to recommit a bill whose provisions had been assented to by both branches of the Legislature. He submitted it to the gentleman himself, as well as the Speaker, whether such a course was proper after the bill had reached its present stage; and if any amendment, which could be proposed by the Committee of Ways and Means, would be in order after the principle had been fully acted on by both Houses.

Mr. GASTON, in reply, said it was perfectly immaterial whether any amendment could be acted on or not. The motion was made to try whether a majority of the House was willing to repeal the tax altogether, or keep it on as a permanent tax; there would be no difficulty in finding a way of carrying their decision into effect.

Mr. SHEFFEY avowed himself in favor of a total repeal of the tax, but could not see how that object could be effected by recommitting the bill; because the committee could report no amendment which could with propriety be acted on. Both Houses have agreed that a tax of three millions shall be imposed, and a committee of one House could not now properly recommend a repeal of it. Besides, the question had just been tried to postpone the bill indefinitely, and rejected by a large majority.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH likewise desired a repeal of the direct tax, if it could be done consistently with the obligations of the Government. There were various modes, he said, by which the object could be yet effected, and amongst them the motion to recommit was perfectly regular; for if the Committee of Ways and Means should, on reconsideration, think the tax was unnecessary, they could report such propositions as would effect a repeal.

Mr. HARDIN had been in favor of an entire repeal of the land tax; but, not being able to get that, had favored the smallest amount proposed. He could say with confidence, that three-fourths of the Senators who voted against the tax, did so because it was not made permanent; and if we lose this bill, said he, I am afraid we shall be saddled with a tax of six millions. Who made the present motion? A gentleman in favor of a permanent direct tax. This excited his suspicions; and fearing that the repeal of the tax could not be now effected, he should vote against the motion to recommit the bill. In fact, he considered the motion not in order; but, if the gentleman would propose to effect the repeal in any other way, he would go with him.

Mr. GASTON again explained his view in making the motion, which was simply to try the disposition of the House; but as those who were in favor of repeal were averse to his motion, he would withdraw it.

Mr. RANDOLPH then renewed his motion to lay the bill on the table until to-morrow; which was decided in the negative—ayes 62, nays 67.

Mr. RANDOLPH then rose, and among other general remarks said, there was no question more susceptible of proof than that this tax of three millions was not wanted for any purpose of finance; and had no doubt it would be allowed, although insisted on now, to terminate with the next session. If, however, it was determined to raise the amount contemplated, he trusted the House would not persist in the present mode; although, Mr. R. said, he preferred the land tax, when necessary, to any other internal tax. But, much as he was opposed to loans, he would rather authorize the Government to borrow these three millions than vex the people with such a tax for one year only. After some further remarks on the impropriety of the present policy of the majority in regard to large expenditures, &c., he moved that the bill be laid on the table; that measures might be taken in concert with the Senate for a total repeal of the direct tax.

This motion was decided in the negative—ayes 63, nays 67.

The House then agreed to the amendment of the Senate. The bill is therefore passed.

NATIONAL BANK.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill to incorporate the subscribers to the National Bank.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, moved to strike out of the sixth section the words "Treasury notes," as forming a constituent part of the Government subscriptions to the bank, the effect of which amendment would be to limit the mode of payment of the subscription to stock and specie.

The motion was supported by Mr. SMITH, assented to by Mr. CALHOUN, and opposed by Mr. HOPKINSON; and then agreed to without a division.

Mr. SMITH then moved further to amend the same section by making the amount of the shares reserved to the Government receivable in stock bearing an interest of five instead of six per cent., with the view also of providing subsequently that the whole subscription of the Government shall be made on the 1st of January, 1817, instead of being paid in instalments, at distant dates.

After some objection on the part of Mr. WEBSTER, the motion was agreed to—ayes 63, nays 40.

The bill was subsequently amended so as to make its provisions correspond with the preceding amendments.

After the adoption of some other amendments, involving no principle—

Proceedings.

H. OF R.

Mr. PITKIN moved to strike out of the tenth section so much as gives to the President and Senate the power of appointing five directors of the bank.

This motion was supported by Messrs. PITKIN, WARD of Massachusetts, HOPKINSON, McKEE, HUGER, SHEFFEY, ROSS, and GROSVENOR; and opposed by Messrs. SMITH of Maryland, CALHOUN, TUCKER, and ROBERTSON.

The reporter can only generalize the argument. On the one hand, it was said this control over the bank would be an engine in the hands of the Government which might be used in a manner dangerous to the best interests of the country; that this feature would be pernicious to the interests of the bank, which would be best managed without the interference of the Government; that the reservation of this power would be of no advantage to the Government, (except that it would tend to increase Executive patronage, already much too extensive,) as every necessary investigation could be made into the state of the institution, without the aid of this power; that the Government would have quite as much influence over the bank as it ought to have, without this power being given to it; that the principle would be most odious to moneyed men, and of such an inquisitorial character as would deter many of our most respectable citizens from embarking in the institution, &c. On the other hand, it was contended by gentlemen in favor of retaining the provision, that it was necessary as well to guard the public interest, as to secure a just administration of the affairs of the bank as regarded the public, that a proportion of the direction should be appointed by the Government; that it was certainly not unfair that the Government should stand on a footing with the individual stockholders, by having a share in the direction of the bank; that such a feature existed in the charters of many State banking institutions, and was not abused as far as was known; that this power could not be dangerous either to the bank of the nation, as the twenty directors appointed by the individuals would always be competent to control the five appointed by the Government; some State banks were cited, in which the State possessed an entire control, from which no disadvantage had been realized; and as the selection by the Government in this case would certainly be made with a reference to the wealth and respectability of the persons chosen, no abuse ought to be anticipated, any more than it could succeed if attempted.

Before deciding the question, the Committee rose, and obtained leave to sit again.

TUESDAY, March 5.

Mr. WARD, of Massachusetts, presented a petition of sundry merchants of Boston, interested as owners and shippers in certain vessels which have sailed since the peace for British ports in the East Indies, praying that the provisions of the proposed new tariff duties, as regards the importation of cotton goods from India may not be extended to such goods as may arrive under orders sent out in said vessels, or that such provisions may be adopted as will protect them against the evils of which they complain.—Referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. MILNOR presented a petition of U. P. Levy, praying a remuneration of expenses incurred by him in prosecuting and bringing to justice a band of pirates.

Mr. MIDDLETON presented a petition of John Philip Wilhemi, a citizen of the United States, praying permission to import from the West Indies a number of negro slaves, the property of the petitioner.—Referred to the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures.

Mr. EASTON presented a petition of John P. Maxwell and Hugh H. Maxwell, praying to be permitted to inherit a landed estate of which their uncle died possessed, leaving no other heirs in America, which they are prevented from doing because they were not citizens of the United States at the time of the death of their said uncle, although they were in the United States and gave notice of their intention to become citizens thereof previous to that event.—Referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. HOPKINSON, from a select committee, reported a bill for the relief of Bible Societies in the United States; (exempting from duty all plates, &c. imported for such societies;) which was twice read and committed.

On motion of Mr. EASTON, the Committee on the Public Lands were instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing by law for the appointment of a surveyor of lands of the United States, for the Territories of Illinois and Missouri.

On motion of Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH, the Secretary of the Treasury was directed to lay before this House a statement, showing the valuation of real property and slaves, in the city of Baltimore, and in each county of the State of Maryland, the quota or amount of direct tax apportioned to the said city and each of the said counties, and the rate of tax on the one hundred dollars assessed property, agreeably to the valuation and apportionment made under the act entitled "An act for the assessment and collection of direct taxes and internal duties," passed July 22, 1813, and the act entitled "An act to lay and collect a direct tax within the United States," passed August 2d, 1813; and a similar statement of the valuation, apportionment, and rate of tax under the act entitled "An act to provide additional revenues for defraying the expenses of Government and maintaining the public credit, by laying a direct tax upon the United States, and to provide for assessing and collecting the same," passed on the 9th of January, 1815; so as to exhibit a comparative view of the valuation, apportionment, and rate of tax in the said city and each of the said counties, under the several acts above-mentioned; also, the names of the principal assessors within the said State for the year 1815, and the counties embraced within their respective districts, and such further statement of the transactions of the board of principal assessors within the said State, as reported to the Treasury Department, as will show what changes, if any, have been made by them in the relative valuation of property in any of the said counties, and the principles on which they have proceeded in performing the duties required of them by the act last above-mentioned.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill "making appropriations for ordnance and ordnance stores for the year 1816," with amendments; and they have passed a bill "for the relief of Edward Wilson; also, a bill "to increase the pension of William Munday;" in which amendments and bill they ask the concurrence of this House.

The bill from the Senate "for the relief of Edward Wilson," was read twice and referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

The bill from the Senate "to increase the pension of William Munday," was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

The House took up the amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill "making appropriations for ordnance and ordnance stores, for the year 1816," which were read and referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

NATIONAL BANK.

The House then again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the National Bank bill; the question to strike out the provision giving to the President and Senate the power of appointing five of the directors, being still under consideration.

On this question the debate was resumed and continued to a late hour, before the decision took place. The gentlemen who supported the amendment were MESSRS. GASTON and PICKERING; and those who opposed it, were MESSRS. WILDE, TELFAIR, WRIGHT, CLAY, CALHOUN, and FORSYTH. The ground taken was substantially the same as that already stated, but illustrated and enforced by various arguments, which gave much interest to the debate.

In the course of the day an amendment was adopted, on motion of Mr. CONDIOT, to confine the selection of directors to be made by the President and Senate, to persons holding stock in the bank.

On motion of Mr. SMITH of Maryland, an amendment was also adopted, to prevent more than three of the directors appointed by the President and Senate from being taken from any one State.

The main question was at length taken, about 4 o'clock, on Mr. PERKIN'S motion to exclude the Government from the appointment of any of the directors, and decided in the negative—for the amendment 64, against it 79.

The Committee then rose, reported progress, and obtained leave to sit again.

The following are the only remarks which we have been enabled to find on the above question.

Mr. FORSYTH said, he was one of those who was unfortunate enough to attach great importance to that part of the plan of the bank which was intended to be altered by the motion of the gentleman from Connecticut. At the last session of Congress he had in vain endeavored to convince the members composing it, of the necessity of retaining such an influence over the management of the institution. The honorable gentleman from North Carolina (Mr. GASTON) had suggested, that the opposition to the amendment proposed came from the Treasury Department, or from the Executive. He begged leave to assure him, that the recommendation or opinion of the Department, or of the President, was not the foundation of his belief of the necessity of this measure. Although he did not expect to satisfy others who differed with him, of the incorrectness of their views of the subject, he did hope to be able to show at least plausible reasons in favor of his own. At the last session of Congress he had the honor to advocate, with a zeal arising from a thorough conviction of the necessity of the measure, the establishment of a bank differing from the present, because it imposed an obligation to make a large loan to Government. He had to regret that the ability with which that duty was discharged was not equal to his zeal, and still more, that his exertions were not crowned with success. It would have produced at least one good effect—this discussion would have been avoided, and the time occupied in it might have been usefully employed on a different subject. This plan failed, for causes which it was unnecessary to trace, and its failure was rendered comparatively unimportant by the restoration of peace. He did not believe, with some gentlemen, that this measure was now necessary. The necessity for it had ceased. It was no longer essential, but it was both politic and prudent to adopt it. If it fails, no dangerous consequences will result from its failure. He should survive the shock, although this bill should follow its predecessor to the tomb. The body politic was obstructed by a diseased circulation, but time would furnish a healing remedy, although the application of this panacea should be rejected by the State physicians. Mr. F. said, he did not wish to be understood as recommending the establishment of any bank as prudent and politic; it was not a bank, but a bank of a peculiar character which was required. We had banks enough already; they rose like mushrooms from every hotbed in the country; it was not a moneyed bank only—a bank exclusively regulated by the moneyed interest, and governed by the jealousy, avarice, or factious views of moneyed men, capable of being made the instrument of artful and designing combinations, to cramp your resources, and destroy your capacity to make either permanent or temporary loans—it must be a bank having a national character, regulated by the national interest, and under the influence of the national councils. If it was not of this character, its failure or success was indifferent to him. It seemed to be admitted on all hands, that we ought to have an interest in the proposed institution. It was admitted, too, that we ought to have an influence, and the dispute was between a direct influence by the appointment of directors, or an indirect influence by the operation of the revenue system. It would not be difficult to demonstrate, that an indirect influence would be altogether insufficient. Your seven millions of interest in the capital gives you no power, unless it is coupled with the authority to appoint a portion of the directors. This, it is said, must not be given, because you have ample influence by means of your revenue system. What difference will be produced by the establishment of this new plan? Will your direct influence over it be greater than over the State institutions? You may withhold your deposits; so you may from the State banks; you may refuse to receive its paper in payment of taxes or imposts; you may refuse the paper of the State banks; you may tax either at your pleasure. After this plan is perfected, the annulment of the charter is for twenty years as completely beyond your authority as the annihilation of the State banks. The sole difference is, that at the end of twenty years the Bank of the United States will be dependent on you for a renewal of its charter, while the State banks look only to the State Legislatures. Your power, then, over the present banks is equally great with your power over the one proposed. An honorable gentleman from New York (Mr. GROSVENOR) has told you, and truly told you, that when you threaten the State banks they laugh at your threats—when you menace them, they menace you in turn. If a mere local institution cannot be beneficially controlled by your indirect influence, how can you expect to affect an institution extending through the whole community, which combines the great moneyed capital of all the States into one solid column of power? It seems, however, to be imagined, a direct control is unnecessary. The keen magnetic sense of the directors will always induce them to pursue their own interest, and their interest will always produce a compliance with the reasonable wishes of the Government. This sense was too magnetic for Mr. F.'s taste; it pointed with unerring polarity to self, and the general interest, when in conflict with self-interest, did not produce even a vibration of the needle. Besides, there was such a thing as the sacrifice of pecuniary to political interest or party policy. This institution might, in the course of time, fall into the hands of men who would think it immoral and criminal to loan their money for the necessary purposes of Government. What would be the situation of the country in such an event, at a time when this institution furnished the great mass of the medium of circulation? It was to guard against such an event an immediate agency in the direction was necessary; there was a greater probability of finding eight reasonable and virtuous men out of twenty, than thirteen out of twenty-five. Mr. F. regretted that the number of directors to be appointed by Government was not greater; and also the amendment which prevented the President from appointing more than three at the seat of the mother bank; but he supposed he must be satisfied with it as it stood, as there was little hope of obtaining more. It was objected, however, that moneyed men would not like the introduction of this direct influence. This was perfectly natural. Moneyed men have no objection to manage your funds for their benefit, but have no desire to admit your influence in the management of theirs. But will the introduction of this principle prevent the subscription of the capital from being filled? No gentleman had or would venture to predict such an effect. They will no doubt make wry faces, but the bitter pill would be swallowed if it was well gilded. Arguments had been urged against this part of the plan, founded upon the supposition that improper appointments would be made. The President and Senate had not the same information to enable them to choose proper directors. Stockholders were better judges of the necessary qualifications of directors. Corrupt men would solicit and procure these appointments for improper purposes. Great injury would result to the bank from their success. They would procure for themselves and friends accommodations to which they were not entitled. A slight examination of these arguments would show their fallacy. Intelligence and integrity were the qualifications required in directors. The same ability existed to ascertain who possessed them, for this as for all other offices. The President and Senate can command or procure the most accurate information of the character of persons who are thought of for these appointments, from every source to which it may be necessary to apply. Is it not passing strange that a man, who has raked up money from every kennel into which he may have dipped his fingers, is, from that circumstance, a better judge of the proper person for a director than the President and Senate; that a stupid fellow, who has blundered into a fortune in New Orleans or Providence, should be able to procure better information of the character and circumstances of individuals than the President residing at Washington, and the Senators coming from the several States. These men, however, who intend to swindle the bank, will worm themselves into the good graces of the President, and receive the appointment. After their appointment, paper will be discounted having their names upon it, which ought not to be discounted, because the extreme delicacy of the other directors will not permit them to object to it. This morbid delicacy, too, is to be found in persons chosen by the keen-sighted individual stockholders, who are the best judges of the persons competent to manage their concerns. Such is the argument. It supposes folly in the President and Senate who make the appointments; corruption in the persons seeking to be appointed; and stupidity and criminality in the other directors, in permitting this folly and corruption of the choosers and the chosen to injure the institution.

Mr. F. asked, what advantages could be derived from this institution if this amendment prevails, which could not be produced through the agency of the State banks? It is admitted that the great object of this bill, the restoration of specie payments, might be effected by a rigorous system of measures against the State institutions. Mr. F. said, he did not feel that indignation against the State banks for stopping the payment of specie, which had been expressed by others. His indignation had been so thoroughly exhausted upon the smugglers of English goods, and the cash dealers in British Government bills for the use of the Canadian army, that he had none left for the banks who had loaned their notes to their own Government, who, in consequence of an extraordinary emission of their paper, had been under the necessity of dishonoring it. He was not, however, the apologist of the banks for withholding specie payments since the restoration of peace. It was, however, certain, that no one bank could, without ruin, resume the payment of specie. The resumption must be simultaneous. He had no objection to any system which should induce the banks to perform their obligations in this regard to the community; but he protested against the cruelty and injustice of any rigorous measures which should compel them immediately either to sell their Government stocks or to curtail their discounts. It was saying to these banks, you have loaned us too much of your paper; you have made too much money out of the General Government; your paper has, indeed, performed the trifling service of carrying us triumphantly through a dangerous conflict, but we are not now in want of a further accommodation; you must take in your paper; you must sell your stock; you must disgorge your gains; you must resume your specie payments. And what will be the consequence of all this? They are forced to sell their stock; it goes into market, and its price is depressed. Are you in a situation to buy—to take advantage of this disgorging of their unrighteous gains? Far from it; you cannot be benefited—you cannot enter as a competitor into the market. And who are the gainers by this system of rigor? The hard-money men, who withhold their money in the hour of your necessity and peril; who combined together for the purpose of defeating your loans. Mr. F. begged the House, if these banks were to be punished, to wait until the Government, who had been the sufferer, should be prepared to take advantage of their punishment. At all events, to be so cautious in their castigation, that, in punishing puny, petty speculation, they do not reward the vilest of all gamblers, those who staked their money against the safety of your empire; who sought to destroy you by cramping your resources; who sought to beggar the country, that an Administration might be ruined.

Mr. TELFAIR observed, that the great cause of difference of opinion on this question, seemed to arise from a misapprehension of those who advocated the amendment, as to the primary objects for which this institution is designed. Gentlemen argue as though the moving cause for the establishment of a National Bank was the interest of the individuals who may become subscribers, and that the Government has but one interest, and that is, the attainment of the highest possible bonus.

In this view of the subject, I must be permitted totally to differ from those who are disposed to deprive the Government of all participation in its direction. Did I deem it practicable to manage such an institution without greater liabilities to corruption of its principles, I should most decidedly prefer one whose stock was exclusively the property of the nation. But it requires no great political sagacity, and but ordinary experience to ascertain, that those institutions which derive their principle of action from private interest, are more active in pursuit of their object, more vigilant in the detection of error, and more likely to prosper, than those which derive their impulse from the spirit of patriotism, and have in contemplation solely the public good. Private interest is ever more active, more vigilant, more pervading, more alive to its object, than national; which is more sluggish, because its direction is towards remote or general good, less quicksighted, because its instinct is not so strong.

This institution is designed not merely to fulfil the ordinary purposes of banks of discount; it aspires to great national objects; it contemplates a restoration of the legitimate currency of the country; its end is to give an uniform and valuable medium to the whole empire; its design is to facilitate the fiscal operations of the Treasury Department. It is, in one word, to restore to this Government the rightful and Constitutional control over the national medium, which is vested in every civilized Government, and which was intended to be vested in the Congress of the United States, when to it was assigned the supervisorship of the Mint establishment. These are the primary and essential objects of its creation; from the attainment of these great objects, certainly, benefits flow to every class of the community; but exclusive benefits are designed by none, save so much as may be deemed necessary to the obtention of these ends, and conformable to these results.

According to these views, then, the interest of the stockholders is not to be considered as holding a priority of station to that of the Government; on the contrary, the institution is to be looked upon as the property of the nation, and that individuals for political considerations, viz., because their aid will facilitate, or, if you please, is necessary to participate in its immediate profits—that characterizes the schemes of individual pursuit—that while its capacities and controlling power be national, its impulse, its life and animation, shall be private interest. But private interest, unrestrained, naturally produces much mischief. I have admitted that a bank, exclusively managed by the Government, would be exposed to a corruption of its principle; and with so many facts to support me, while casting an eye upon the numberless banks around, I certainly shall not be charged with overweening suspicion, when asserting that banks, too exclusively managed by stockholders, are liable to become instruments of public evil from the invitations of self-interest.

The true policy in the creation of a bank, then, is to give it a double character—to combine in it the elements of public and private interest—but to secure to the former a control over the latter; for the Government which creates this institution is responsible for its fulfilment of the great objects of its creation; and it is wiser to use means of precaution, than to rest upon ultimate means of severe correction. But the gentleman from North Carolina, (Mr. GASTON,) who has certainly spoken with ability on this subject, is satisfied with the incidental powers and benefits which the Government would derive from this bank. And this brings me to two objections which have been urged—first, an indiscriminate dread is felt of the influence of the Government over this institution, provided it participates in its direction. In what way, let me ask, can the influence of the Government be injurious? Is it presumable that the influence of the Government would induce the bank to loan individuals who were incapable of repaying the debt? Can it be believed that the Government would ever descend, by its influence over the bank, to benefit one class of individuals by loans, while it oppresses another by refusing to extend these benefits? Or can it be imagined that the Government, which is so deeply interested in preserving an uniform and valuable currency, would, in ordinary circumstances, induce the bank to make over issues, and thereby cause a depreciation of its paper? I presume not; these are apprehensions too fantastic to be ascribed to men of sense; they are absurdities too great for them to ascribe to a Government as enlightened as ours; but if they mean that the Government, under the pressure of trying emergencies, may by their influence induce loans from the bank, which prudence in ordinary times would forbid them to make, I shall not deny the probability, but must be permitted to answer there are, or may be periods during a nation's travail, when exertions of such means would be attended with less evil than a want of money; and as this objection has reference to an extreme case, I am willing to await the crisis. But their second objection, which is not a little inconsistent with the first, is, that the President will appoint ignorant, inefficient, and needy directors. What weight, then, could these directors possess? But let us approach this objection a little nearer, and look it in the face. Why is the presumption indulged, that the President will be thus injudicious? Has he not the same respectable class of merchants from whom to make his selection as the stockholders have? Is it reasonable to suppose that any President would be willing thus to commit his fame and reputation; and, if such a one could be found, is there no reliance to be put upon the vigilance of the Senate? But the gentleman from North Carolina thinks that the Government is never safe in trusting its money concerns in the hands of an individual. How then, Mr. Chairman, is any nation to transact its financial concerns—does our Government not daily trust individuals with its money? Is it not obliged to do so? And if in this case it did not trust directors appointed by itself, would it not be obliged exclusively to trust those appointed by the stockholders? If the gentleman's argument is carried a little further, it would recommend the system of farming the revenue as pursued in France, instead of appointing our own officers to collect it. Our policy, in collecting the dues of the Government, has been, to couple the interest of the officer with our own; he derives a profit or percentage upon the money collected, and hence the stimulus superadded to that of a sense of duty. The interest of this bank should be made subservient to the interest of the public, of the people; and hence I wish for some control in its direction.

Mr. GASTON supported the amendment. He concurred with the Chairman of the Committee of Finance in the opinion that the evils which arose from the irregular and depreciated state of the currency called for a remedy—he agreed with him that they affected the industry, morals, the probity, and the public faith of the country—and he added, that there was another evil which no less imperiously demanded the attention of Government, since from it arose the greatest facility of committing frauds upon the revenue. He stated that we had in fact three kinds of currency; one worse than another; and in all of which disbursements were made and the same voucher retained, be the payment made in which currency it might; for an illustration of this he referred to a particular part of the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, which stated that Government had made $33,000 by the difference on depreciated paper. He would not, he said, inquire here whether such a transaction was, or was not honorable to Government, nor should he have mentioned it, but to show that a sum of no less an amount than $33,000 might have been placed in the Treasury, or disposed of in any other manner; and to remind the House that they were unfaithful guardians of the public finances, if they did not take better care that they were better attended to. He agreed with the chairman that the banks ought to be compelled to make payments in specie, but he did not see how that object was to be effected by this bill; yet he thought that a bank formed on correct principles would greatly facilitate. Well constituted, he conceived that a bank would be useful; while badly constituted, he was convinced it would be productive of mischief. As to the capital already fixed upon, he thought it much larger than was necessary; but if that were the only evil it would not be insuperable. The next point of consideration to that of the capital of the bank, was the government of it; and this led him to the question before the House, viz: whether the President and Senate should or should not be empowered to appoint five of the directors. On this subject he would say, that it was incumbent on those who supported the affirmative, to prove its expediency. He had listened to all that had been said upon it, and he heard nothing which appeared to him anything like a sound reason for those appointments being confided to Government. Government, he observed, stood in two relations to the banks, the first of them being as Government merely, and what were the interests it had, as such in the bank? Why that, by its means, a safe and easy transmission would be made of the revenue. And on that head, that is as to the custody, the receipt, the guardianship, and the transmission of the revenue, he affirmed that those were sufficiently well secured. In a word, he thought that by the bill, Government in those respects possessed all the power it ought to desire; but it had far more important interests as guardians of the welfare of the nation, which it was to protect, by taking care that the bank should not degenerate into a paper-making machine, that no persons should be intrusted with its direction that would be likely to abuse it, and that it should be governed by men of skill and integrity. The question then that naturally presented itself was, which would be most likely to make fit appointments, Government or the stockholders of the bank? And the answer to that question was, that, as a cold sense of duty could never stand in competition with a strong sense of interest and fear, the stockholders, whose own interests were deeply involved, would be the most likely. Such directors as they would appoint, would be men versed in the business of money dealing, and well known to be such by them before they were selected; while from the necessity of his situation the President could have no accurate knowledge of such kind of dealings or of men qualified for them, and must trust to the information of others for his election. From that would arise a great evil, namely, that the directors would be appointed, not for their capabilities for the banking trade, but for their political service, past, or to come. If the directors were appointed by the stockholders, they would do right; but if by the President, who could hope that, should the emergencies of the State require a large draft from the banks, they could be able, or would be willing to resist his demand. If there was no positive irresistible reason given for it, therefore, why vest the President with that power? Public confidence, he said, was essential to the success of the bank, and without it that institution could not effect any of the purposes of its establishment. What then, he asked, must be the effect of appointing the directors in the way proposed? Were Government solely to appoint the directors, no man would say that there was a stockholder in the United States who would venture his money in the bank. If Government appointed a majority of them, it would be nearly the same; and exactly in proportion as Government had any hand in the appointments of those officers, the credit of the bank would be impaired. Another objection made by Mr. G. was, the increase of patronage created by these appointments. He said he was no vulgar declaimer against patronage; he had no dread of the ordinary exercise of the President's patronage in the cases of high officers—the judges, for instance, of offices of State—but he was averse to the President's patronage over that kind of office to which little or no salary was annexed, and which could only be rendered profitable by a dexterous management of the facilities it afforded, of employing undue influence. Who would accept such offices? Certainly none but those who know how to make an adroit use of the opportunities they afforded. Here Mr. G. adverted to the disposition expressed by the chairman of the Committee of Finance, to meet the opponents of the bill half way, in a spirit of compromise; he had, he said, agreed to, and acted upon that proposal. There was three leading subjects of controversy belonging to the bill; the capital of the bank, the government of it, and the mode of its operations. One of those had been yielded up, he said, but if the other two were to go in direct violation of his opinions and principles, he would not agree to the compromise. If the gentlemen who were interested in carrying those points, should think that they saw their way clearly, with them be the responsibility!—but for himself, he considered the present amendment a sine qua non, without which he could not give his vote for the bill.

Mr. PICKERING spoke in favour of it, and supported his observations with the authority of Hamilton; respecting which he reminded the House of what was said a few days ago, on that floor, by Mr. SMITH. That gentleman related that when Mr. Gallatin came into the Treasury office, he resolved if possible to detect some errors in the system established by that profound statesman and financier, the first Secretary of the Treasury, General Hamilton; but, after having studied and exhausted much labor and ingenuity in examining and devising the means, he could not with all his natural astutia make a single change for the better in the original system of finance. Such was Hamilton, whose opinions Mr. P. now read from one of his reports, to this effect; namely, that banks could be beneficial only under the direction of private individuals, but never under that of Governments. If the President and Senate owned the stock themselves, the arguments drawn from the right of holding stock might apply, but it was not so; they had but a slight interest in it, and that merely a public one. Needy men would get, through sycophants, recommended for the appointments without regard to their qualifications, so that an honest Government would be glad to get rid of the importunities it would occasion.

Mr. CLAY considered the arguments employed against this part of the bill as very strange. The evil complained of, he said, was that two hundred banks—that is, two hundred and sixty strong powers—were in action without any possible control from Government, or any hope of being stopped except by indirect exertion. Was it proper that they should continue to be uncontrolled? And was it come to this, that the Government could not be trusted with the appointment of five officers, who had no salary? He insisted, that the proposed bank was a power over which Government ought to retain a salutary influence; not only that indirect influence which gentlemen were willing to allow it, but the direct influence imparted by the appointment of those five officers. It ought to have a direct active power, since, possessing one-fifth of the capital, there would always be a sum of from fifteen to twenty millions of its deposits continually in the coffers of the banks. And yet gentlemen said it would be better to place the appointment in the hands of individuals.

Mr. GASTON spoke in answer to some things said by Mr. CLAY, and was replied to by that gentleman to whom he again rejoined.

WEDNESDAY, March 6.

Mr. NEWTON, from the Committee on Commerce and Manufactures, to which were referred the memorials and petitions of the manufacturers of wool, made a report thereon, which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. INGHAM, from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, reported the bill in addition to the act regulating the Post Office Establishment, with amendments, amongst which was a variation of the privilege of franking during recess, voted to members of Congress recently, so as to make the privilege read, "from the commencement of Congress, and until thirty days thereafter."

Mr. ROOR spoke against the report of the committee, and moved to amend it so as to restore the privilege to its former footing, that is, "during each session, and for twenty days thereafter."

The question on Mr. ROOR's motion was decided in the negative—yeas 47, nays 53.

After some remarks by Mr. CONDUCT, the report of the committee was agreed to, and the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

Mr. NELSON, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported a bill to alter certain parts of the act providing for the government of the Territory of Missouri; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. LOWNDES, from the Committee of Ways and Means, made a report on the petitions from the following named persons, to wit: John Kauffett and Michael Hengst. Jacob Reily, and Michael S. Van der Cook; which was read, and committed to the Committee of the Whole on the report of the Committee of Ways and Means of the 2d instant.

Mr. LOWNDES, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported a bill directing the discharge of Ebenezer Keeler and John Francis from imprisonment; which was read twice, and committed to the Committee of the Whole on the bill for the relief of Edward Hallowell.

Mr. LOWNDES also reported a bill directing the discharge of Moses Lewis from imprisonment, which was read twice, and committed to the Committee of the Whole last mentioned.

Mr. LOWNDES also reported a bill for the remission of certain duties on the importation of books for the use of Harvard College; which was read twice, and committed to the Committee of the Whole last mentioned.

Mr. LOWNDES also reported a bill for the relief of Robert Kid; which was read twice, and committed to the Committee of the Whole last mentioned.

Mr. LOWNDES reported the agreement of the Committee of Ways and Means to the amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill, "making appropriations for ordnance and ordnance stores, for the year 1816," and the bill and amendments were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. SERGEANT, from the committee, appointed on the 4th instant, on the petition of Andrew Kurtz, reported a bill authorizing and requiring the Secretary of State to issue letters patent to Andrew Kurtz; which was read twice, and ordered to be engrossed and read a third time tomorrow.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, from the committee appointed on that subject, reported a bill to change the mode of compensation to the members of Congress. [Instead of the six dollars per diem, to allow the gross sum of $1,500 per session to each member.] And the bill was twice read and committed.

Mr. JACKSON, of Virginia, moved,

"That a committee be appointed to suggest to the architect of the Capitol such alterations in the Representatives Chamber therein, as may best provide for the accommodation of the Representatives."

Mr. PICKERING suggested a modification of the resolution, so as to include in its object the improvement of the Hall of the Supreme Court; which was received by the mover of the resolution, and agreed to, and a committee of five appointed accordingly. Messrs. JACKSON, PICKERING, RANDOLPH, MCKEE, and PITKIN, were appointed the committee.

AMENDMENT TO THE CONSTITUTION.

Mr. PICKERING submitted the following proposition of amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which was read, and committed to the Committee of the whole House on the state of the Union:

Resolved, by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, two-thirds of both Houses concurring, That the following be proposed to the Legislatures of the several States as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States; which, when ratified by the Legislatures of three-fourths of the several States, shall be valid, to all intents and purposes, as a part of the said Constitution, to wit:

That, for the purpose of choosing representatives in the Congress of the United States, each State shall, by its Legislature, be divided into a number of districts equal to the number of Representatives to which such State may be entitled.

Those districts shall be formed of contiguous territory, and contain, as nearly as may be, an equal number of inhabitants entitled by the Constitution to be represented. In each district the qualified voters shall elect one representative, and no more.

That, for the purpose of appointing electors of President and Vice President of the United States, each State shall, by its Legislature, be divided into a number of districts equal to the number of electors to which each State shall be entitled. Those districts shall be composed of contiguous territory, and contain, as nearly as may be, an equal number of inhabitants entitled by the Constitution to representation. In each district, the persons qualified to vote for representatives shall appoint one elector, and no more. The electors, when convened, shall have power, in case of any of those appointed as above prescribed shall fail to attend for the purposes of their said appointment, on the day prescribed for giving their votes for President of the United States, to appoint another, or others, to act in the place of him or them so failing to attend.

Neither the districts for choosing representatives, nor those for appointing electors, shall be altered in any State until a census, and apportionment of Representatives under it, subsequent to the division of the State into districts, shall be made. The division of the States into districts, hereby provided for, shall take place immediately after this amendment shall be adopted and ratified as a part of the Constitution of the United States; and successively, immediately afterwards, whenever a census and apportionment of Representatives under it shall be made. The division of such State into districts for the purposes both of choosing representatives and of appointing electors, shall be altered agreeably to the provisions of this amendment, and on no other occasion.

THE NATIONAL BANK.

The House then again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill to incorporate the subscribers to the National Bank.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, moved to amend the tenth section, so as to allow the choice of President of the Bank to be made from any of the Directors, and not to confine the selection of that officer to one of the Directors appointed by the President and Senate. Mr. S. made a few remarks in justification of his motion.

Mr. CALHOUN had no objection to the amendment. He thought the clause proposed to be amended not necessary to give the Government a due control over the concerns of the bank; and that it would still retain as much influence as would serve every beneficial purpose.

Mr. ROBERTSON condemned the motion. He thought it would diminish too greatly the power which it was necessary the Government should have over the Bank. He did not want merely a great money machine, but an institution of a national character; and, therefore, could not consent to part with, one after another, all the features of the bill which gave the Government a proper and necessary control over the bank. He adverted to the liberality which had been manifested by the chairman who reported the bill, (Mr. CALHOUN,) and thought the principle of accommodation might be carried too far. He admonished gentlemen to remember the painter who flattered everybody and pleased nobody. His fate would be that of the bill, if this spirit of concession was carried too far; and he could not, for one, be so far governed by it as to give up those powers which were necessary to the salutary management of the bank, and without which it would not be worth having.

Mr. ROSS could see no reason why the President of the bank should not be selected from the whole twenty-five directors, if it was the object to get the best man. If the President and Senate appoint a director, the most proper for the office, he would doubtless be elected. But, if not, why exclude the fittest character? It would have been just as well to confine the selection of President of the United States to one State, though it might not contain a person as well qualified as one in another State. Mr. R. called the attention of the House to the importance of the office and duties of the President of the Bank, and the absolute necessity of selecting the director best qualified. Such a course was congenial with our political institutions, although he believed the bank itself was by no means congenial with the Constitution, being, as he viewed it, a moneyed aristocracy. He condemned the policy of giving so much additional strength to the Executive arm. Alexander Hamilton himself, in the zenith of his influence, would not have dared to propose such a grant of power to the President as the control and regulation of a great moneyed institution. Mr. R. concluded by saying he thought it would be much safer to adopt the amendment, and withhold from the Executive so important a power, &c.

Mr. CALHOUN rose to make a remark or two in reply to his friend (Mr. ROBERTSON.) He almost despaired of the passage of the bill, after some of the indications which he had witnessed, and began to doubt whether any bill would pass at all on the subject. For himself, Mr. C. said, his anxiety for the measure was not extreme; but as long as there was a lingering hope of its success, he should omit no effort to make it an efficient remedy for the evils of the present currency. If, after making it suit, as far as possible, the taste of every one, gentlemen determined to oppose it, it was time for them to look out for some other remedy. Mr. C. said, he felt deeply the evil of the disordered state of our currency, and the necessity of a cure. In devising that cure, difficulties were to be expected. The direction of the bank he knew had been made a sine qua non by some gentlemen on one side of the House, and he was sorry to find it was one also with some on the other. It was a fate peculiar to great measures to fail in their details. The obstinacy of gentlemen in matters of what they deemed principle, was honorable to them, but he feared it would be fatal to the bill. He lamented it; the disorders were so deep, so great, that justice to the country called for a remedy at the hands of the Government. If gentlemen would seriously consider the character, and power, and nature of the evil—two hundred and sixty banks issuing almost as many millions of depreciated paper—they must see the necessity of co-operating in the measure of relief. The necessity for union was great and urgent, for the disease was almost incurable; it was a leprosy on the body politic, &c.

The question was then taken on Mr. SMITH's motion, and carried—ayes 80, nays 46.

After some further amendment, affecting no principle—

Mr. RANDOLPH moved to add the word native in the clause which limits the choice of directors to citizens of the United States; which motion was agreed to without debate—ayes 68.

After the Committee had proceeded to the clause, which provides for the appointment of directors for the Branch Banks, which clause likewise restricted the choice to citizens of the United States—

Mr. JEWETT moved that the word native be inserted also in that clause, so as to limit the appointment to native citizens.

Mr. CALHOUN objected to the amendment. It was the first time, he said, that any attempt had been made in this country to discriminate between native and naturalized citizens. The Constitution recognised no such distinction, except in the eligibility to the highest office in the Government, and he could see no reason for introducing on this occasion so odious and unprecedented a distinction.

Mr. RANDOLPH said it was indisputably true that it was to our system of naturalization laws the United States owed that spirit of faction by which they had been torn for the last twenty years, and along with it the war out of which the country had just emerged. He spoke from the information of statesmen inferior to none in this or any other country, that the system of granting protections to foreign seamen was one of the chief causes of the war with Great Britain, which system had grown out of our naturalization laws. Much had been said, and he dared to say much more would be now said, and much more be written on this subject, for it was a melancholy truth, that the press was in the hands of those very people who had long taken upon them to dictate to the American people, and to tell them who ought to be their President, who their Vice-President, and who their Representatives, and to direct them in their most essential concerns. He was aware, therefore, that the press would be at work, and that much would be said and much printed about what he was now saying; but that had no terror for him. How long the country would endure this foreign yoke, in its most odious and disgusting form, he could not tell; but this he would say, that if we were to be dictated to, and ruled by foreigners, he would much rather be ruled by a British Parliament than by British subjects here. Should he be told that those men fought in the war of the Revolution, he would answer that those who did so were not included by him in the class he adverted to. That was a civil war, and they and we were, at its commencement, alike British subjects. Native Britons, therefore, then taking arms on our side, gave them the same rights as those who were born in this country, and his motion could be easily modified so as to provide for any that might be of that description; but no such modification, he was sure, would be found necessary, for this plain reason. Where were the soldiers of the Revolution who were not natives? They were either already retired, or else retiring to that great reckoning where discounts were not allowed. If the honorable gentleman would point his finger to any such kind of person now living, he would agree to his being made an exception to the amendment. It was time, Mr. R. said, that the American people should have a character of their own; and where would they find it? In New England and in Virginia only, because they were a homogeneous race—a peculiar people. They never yet appointed foreigners to sit in that House for them, or to fill their high offices. In both States this was their policy; it was not found in, nor was it owing to, their paper constitutions; but what was better, it was interwoven in the frame of their thoughts and sentiments, in their steady habits, in their principles from the cradle—a much more solid security than could be found in any abracadabra, which constitution mongers could scrawl upon paper. It might be indiscreet in him to say it, for, to say the truth, he had as little of that rascally virtue prudence,* he apprehended, as any man, and could as little conceal what he felt as affect what he did not feel. He knew it was not the way for him to conciliate the manufacturing body, yet he would say that he wished, with all his heart, that his bootmaker, his hatter, and other manufacturers, would rather stay in Great Britain, under their own laws, than come here to make laws for us, and leave it to us to import our covering. We must have our clothing home-made, said he, but I would much rather have my workmen home-made, and import my clothing. Was it best, he demanded, to have our own unpolluted Republic peopled with its own pure native Republicans, or erect another Sheffield, another Manchester, and another Birmingham, upon the banks of the Schuylkill, the Delaware, and the Brandywine, or have a host of Luddites amongst us, wretches from whom every vestige of the human creation seemed to be effaced? Would they wish to have their elections on that floor decided by a rabble? What, he asked, was the cause of the ruin of old Rome? Why, their opening their gates and letting in the rabble of the whole world to be her legislators. If, said he, you wish to preserve among your fellow-citizens that exalted sense of freedom which gave birth to the Revolution—if you wish to keep alive among them the spirit of '76—you must endeavor to stop this flood of foreign emigration. You must teach the people of Europe that if they do come here, all they must hope to receive is protection; but that they must have no share in our Government. From such men a temporary party may receive precarious aid, but the country cannot be safe, nor the people happy, where they are introduced into Government, or meddle with public concerns in any great degree. Let them then take away their spinning jennies—let them carry off their principles and their machinery back again to Europe, and leave our Republic to its repose. I dread those men; I have a horror, a loathing of a paper machine, and a manufacturing aristocracy; I would protect commerce, but I dislike and condemn manufacturing. Can you be defended by a rabble of manufacturers? No, you cannot depend upon them; they would leave you to be sacked. It would be as rational for any man who really valued his country, to bring in a bill for the encouragement of a breed of wolves. I never see a merino sheep without its occurring to me that we are about to be the tributaries of the most timid, weak, inefficient animal on the face of the earth. Among our home manufactures, I wish gentlemen would attend to that of human bodies, and not keep foreigners for the purpose of making their clothing at home, when they could import to so much more advantage from abroad. This, he said, was a favorable time to make a stand against this evil, and if not this session, he hoped that in the next there would be a revival of the naturalization laws. He was not partial to the French, but if we were to have emigrants, he wished them to be of that people. Not the birds of Newgate or Kilmainham, nor the rabble of British manufacturing towns. He preferred the French, because they would be a distinct people among us, and not as the subjects of Great Britain, who, from the similarity of their language and manners, identified themselves at once with our people, and brought their principles into our councils.

Mr. WRIGHT said: Mr. Chairman, I cannot be silent when an amendment is proposed to insert the word native, so that none but natives can be directors of this bank. Sir, it is a libel on the Constitution, on that WASHINGTON who recommended its adoption. It would exclude Alexander Hamilton, was he alive, from being a director, who so pre-eminently distinguished himself in the promotion of that Constitution. Look, sir, at that picture. See the bleeding Montgomery weltering in his gore, and sacrificing his life on the altar of American liberty, and then say whether such men ought to be excluded. Sir, the members of the Senate and House of Representatives who may be naturalized citizens—nay, a foreigner, who was here at the adoption of the Constitution, might be a President of the United States; but, if this amendment obtains, he could not be a director of this bank!

The question was taken on Mr. JEWETT's motion, and lost, without a division.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, then moved to strike out that part of the seventeenth section, which gives the President of the United States power, during the recess of Congress, on the application of the stockholders, to authorize the bank to suspend the payment of specie.

Mr. CALHOUN, after admitting the propriety of the motion, said he had no objection to extend it to the whole proviso of the section, so as to deprive Congress, as well as the President, of the power to suspend specie payments.

Mr. FORSYTH opposed this proposition, and Mr. RANDOLPH supported it; after which, the Committee rose, reported progress, and obtained leave to sit again.

The House then went into Committee of the Whole on the report of the Committee of Ways and Means, on the amendments of the Senate to the bill making appropriations for the Ordnance department. The Senate's amendments were agreed to by the Committee of the Whole, when it rose; and the House adjourned.

THURSDAY, March 7.

Mr. ROBERTSON, from the Committee on the Public Lands, reported a bill further extending the time for issuing and locating military land warrants; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

On motion of Mr. CRAWFORD,

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to lay before this House a statement, showing the valuation of real property and slaves in the city of Philadelphia, and in each county of the State of Pennsylvania, the quota or amount of direct tax apportioned to the said city and each of the said counties, and the rate of tax on the one hundred dollars of assessed property, agreeably to the valuation and apportionment made under the act entitled "An act for the assessment and collection of direct taxes and internal duties," passed July 22, 1813, and the act entitled "An act to lay and collect a direct tax within the United States," passed August 2d, 1813; and a similar statement of the valuation, apportionment, and rate of tax under the act entitled "An act to provide additional revenues for defraying the expenses of Government and maintaining the public credit, by laying a direct tax upon the United States, and to provide for assessing and collecting the same," passed on the 9th day of January, 1815; so as to exhibit a comparative view of the valuation, apportionment, and rate of tax in the said city, and each of the said counties, under the several acts abovementioned; also, the names of the principal assessors within the said State, for the year 1816, and the counties embraced within their respective districts, and such further statement of the transactions of the board of principal assessors within the said State, as reported to the Treasury Department, as will show what changes, if any, have been made by them in the relative valuation of property in any of the said counties, and the principles on which they have proceeded in performing the duties required of them by the act last abovementioned.

On motion of Mr. MARSH,

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury lay before this House a statement of the accounts exhibited, and of the expenditures in the prosecution of offences against the United States, in the courts thereof, in the districts of Connecticut, Massachusetts, New Hampshire, Vermont, and New York, respectively, from the year 1808, to the year 1815, inclusive of both; also, a statement of the fines and penalties paid into the Treasury of the United States, from those districts, during that period; exhibiting the names and number of the indictments, informations, and suits which have been instituted for such offences, and distinguishing those in which there have been convictions, from those in which there have been acquittals.

An engrossed bill, entitled "An act authorizing and directing the Secretary of State to grant letters patent to Andrew Kurtz," was read the third time and passed.

to an act regulating the Post Office Establishment," was read the third time and passed.

NATIONAL BANK

The House then again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the National Bank bill—the motion to strike out the proviso which gives to Congress the power of authorizing the bank, on application of the stockholders, to suspend the payment of specie, being still under consideration.

Mr. RANDOLPH supported the amendment, and reprobated the remarks of the honorable gentleman (Mr. FORSYTH) who opposed it as the most extraordinary he had ever heard. Was that gentleman yet to learn, he asked, that Congress sat under a delegated power, by which they were authorized to do that only which was found specified in their charter, the Constitution? The power to violate contracts between individuals was not one of those granted to Congress and enumerated in the Constitution, and yet that was the amount of the gentleman's argument. Nor could he conceive a case in which their power could extend to impair a contract. If the competency to suspend payment was to be vested in either of them, he would rather trust it to the President than to that House, because nothing was so shameless as a popular assembly. No crime had ever been committed that popular assemblies had not countenanced. He declared that it was astonishing and afflicting to him to hear principles which he had ever been taught to consider monstrous and preposterous, openly and with the greatest indifference promulgated in that House—for what less than monstrous and preposterous was it to insist that Government had a right to make paper a legal tender?

Mr. WEBSTER said he should be sorry if such notions as those of Mr. FORSYTH were to grow into general belief. The language of the Constitution was, he said, that all that was not delegated was reserved. If the power in question therefore was not delegated, it did not exist. He urged the impolicy of retaining the clause, on the grounds that it would defeat the object of the bill, by adding to the depreciation of bank paper. If the power to suspend specie payments were known to exist by authority, individuals holding it would, on the slightest grounds, suspect that it was intended, and press upon the bank for their money. In short, the ingenuity of man could not devise a thing more tending to bring about the evil for which the bill is presumed to be a cure.

Mr. CLAY (Speaker) agreed that the retention of the clause was unnecessary, and said that he would no more make a provision for the suspension of specie payments in a bank, than in forming a government he would provide for a revolution. Either case could arise but from an extraordinary convulsion not likely to occur, and which, if it ever did arise, would bring its own remedy time enough along with it. Providing for it according to Mr. FORSYTH's notion was not only unnecessary but would be pernicious—it would be like calling in a physician to a sick person, and mingling with his prescriptions materials to increase the disease. Were such a power ready at hand to be administered when necessity should require, the bank, whose interest it would be to suspend specie payments, would soon contrive to make that necessity. He therefore concurred in the amendment; which after some observations from Mr. SHARPE, was carried by a very large majority.

Some other amendments were also made to the bill; when at length the Committee, having got through the bill, rose, reported progress and had leave to sit again.

COMPENSATION OF MEMBERS.

The House then went into Committee of the Whole, on the bill to alter the compensation allowed to the members of Congress.

Mr. JOHNSON said, he thought no diversity of opinion could arise on this bill but as to the sum which it proposed to allow the members per annum. If members of Congress were satisfied to adopt a smaller sum, he avowed himself willing to meet them, though he had no doubt the sum mentioned was as low as it ought to be, and was less than the salary received by twenty-eight clerks employed by the Government. Mr. J. also defended the propriety of the proposed mode of compensation over the per diem allowance, and concluded with a few statements to show, that the trifling addition to the pay would be nothing in comparison with the despatch of public business, which would be the effect of the change.

Mr. RANDOLPH coincided fully with Mr. JOHNSON in his views of the proposed change; and in order to divest the measure of its only odious consideration, he moved to amend the bill by suspending its operation until the 4th of March next, so as not to take effect during the present Congress. Mr. R. declared his conviction, however, that the object would not be fully attained by the change. Are not members, said he, obliged to be wakened up to vote; roused up to hear the question? Do they not keep the House from adjourning because they have not finished a letter, or sent off the last newspaper? The debates of the House are swelled to their great length by inattention of members; and to remedy it, we must get rid of this bookbinder's shop. The House, he said, was not exactly like a Dover court, where they were all speakers; but here there is one speaker and no listener.

Mr. JOHNSON was opposed to the amendment. He thought if the bill was necessary at all, it was as proper for the present Congress as a future one. However, he would not refuse his support to the bill, if the motion should be adopted. Congress, he said, had always to act for themselves on this subject, and he was averse to the postponement.

Mr. RANDOLPH said, for himself he would prefer the bill as it stood; but it was to satisfy any over-tender consciences, that he proposed the amendment. For his part, he was not afraid of the thing called popularity; to vote to himself one thousand five hundred dollars—for what? For coming here and living as in a boarding school, or a monastery, &c. There was no profession scarcely by which a man could not earn one thousand five hundred dollars in six months, and do it much more pleasantly too than by coming here. Mr. R. concluded by repeating, that the object of his amendment was intended merely as a quietus to over-tender consciences.

Mr. GROSVENOR said, to decide on the amendment, it was only necessary to inquire, whether this measure was at all proper. If it be necessary, is it not so at this, as the next session? On what principle, he asked, was it necessary to postpone the effect of the bill? It would be viewed only as a little attempt to evade the imputation of regarding their own particular interests; and he was decidedly opposed to it.

Mr. HUGER assured the House, he had never risen to address them with more reluctance, or less satisfaction to himself, than on the present occasion. He had waited to the last moment, and until the question was on the point of being taken, in the hope that some other gentleman would undertake the unpleasant task, (for an unpleasant task it certainly was,) of rising in opposition to a measure, evidently so popular and so well received. Providence in its beneficence, had blessed him with independence, and somewhat more, perhaps, of the good things of this life, than had fallen to the lot of several of those he addressed. He was sensible, that under such circumstances, opposition to the proposed increase of pay might not come with the best possible grace from him; and he most sincerely wished that it had devolved upon any other gentleman, rather than on himself. He had waited, however, as before observed, to the last moment, but no one evinced the least disposition to rise in opposition to the bill. He did not, therefore, think himself so bound down, hand and feet, by the above consideration, or by the feelings of delicacy arising out of it, as to be absolutely precluded from expressing his dislike to a measure, which he disapproved of most decidedly, and in all its bearings; nor under any moral obligation to let it pass sub silentio, and without the most trifling attempt being made to stop its progress. He should, without further preface, throw himself on the candor and indulgence of the House. And whilst he cheerfully acknowledged the merits of the honorable gentleman from Kentucky (Mr. JOHNSON) who had so greatly distinguished himself in other fields, and a kind of warfare rather more glorious than that for which he had been, on the present occasion, extolled in such glowing language; he flattered himself, that he might at least hope and calculate upon the pardon and forgiveness of gentlemen, if he ventured, in like manner, to come forward with some little independence, and oppose a measure, evidently so popular within the walls of the Chamber, and which received such kind, and to all appearance, such general welcome.

Mr. H. repeated that he was decidedly opposed to the bill in all its bearings and provisions; to the increase of pay it proposed, (especially at the present time and under existing circumstances,) and still more to the manner in which that increase was to be brought about. Nothing could be further from his wish or intention than to attribute improper motives to the worthy chairman, or any other honorable gentleman of the committee by whom the bill had been introduced. But he must be permitted to say that the bill, so far as he comprehended its scope and tenor, presented itself to his understanding in a very questionable shape. It wore too much the appearance of disguise and concealment. If there really was such evident necessity for an increase in the pay of members of Congress, why not grant it in the good old way of a per diem. If six dollars a day were not adequate to meet their reasonable expenses, and afford them a comfortable subsistence at the Seat of Government, let the rate be augmented to eight, ten, or twelve dollars, or to whatever sum might be deemed sufficient. But let this be done in such a manner as that their constituents might at a glance, understand what had been done, and have an opportunity of making a fair comparison between the present allowance, and what it was now proposed to raise it to. By changing the per diem, or daily allowance, into a salary, or gross sum, a concealment of the increase of pay was, he would not say sought or intended, yet it certainly was effected. What number of persons abroad, he asked, would comprehend the full effect of the change, or possess proper data upon which to make a correct estimate and comparison between the present daily allowance and that which was contemplated? Even in that House there was great difference of opinion on the subject. The chairman of the committee stated it, including an average of extra sessions, at between nine and ten dollars. He contended they were not likely to have, for some years to come, any extra session. Yet the very fact that there might or might not be extra sessions, was almost conclusive argument of itself in favor of the old mode of a per diem, and against the proposed change of it into a fixed salary and gross sum. At all events there was not the most distant prospect of an extra session, neither had there been one during the Constitutional term of the present Congress. He was strictly correct, therefore, and fully authorized in estimating the addition of pay which would actually be received by the present members, at an increase of from one hundred to one hundred and fifty per cent., or at an average of at least fourteen dollars a day, besides the annual travelling allowance of six dollars every twenty miles. Indeed, this was so obviously the case, that he had heard it in conversation, candidly acknowledged, that the mode adopted of giving an annual salary instead of a per diem, was the only one which could render the thing palatable, and make it go down with the people. And this very observation and acknowledgment had been by no means one of the smallest inducements with him to turn his attention particularly to the subject, and rise in opposition to the bill.

But even granting it to be expedient to increase their pay for the future, it was, in every possible view, incorrect and unbecoming to give the bill a retrospective operation. When the members of this Congress were elected they well knew they would be entitled to six dollars a day, and no more. They accepted their seats under this express condition. But if the bill passed, each member would receive fifteen hundred dollars for the year ending on the 4th of March, which was already elapsed, and during which they had barely been in session three months. Thus, instead of $180 a month, or $540 for three months, to which they were now entitled, and which many had already drawn, the members would receive $1,500 each, while the President pro tem. of the Senate, and the Speaker of the House of Representatives, instead of $1,080, to which they would be entitled as the law now stood, would each receive $3,000; the members a per diem at the rate of about seventeen dollars per day, exclusively of the usual allowance for travelling expenses; the President pro tem. of the Senate, and the Speaker of the House of Representatives a per diem of rather upward thirty-three dollars, likewise exclusive of the usual allowance of travelling expenses. The President pro tem., and the Senate, and the Speaker, and House of Representatives of the Fourteenth Congress, would consequently receive a gratuity, (for a gratuity, concealed as it might be, it certainly was,) over and above their usual per diem, at the close of a bloody and expensive war, out of the public coffers, to the amount of about $200,000 for their services the three months last past, during which they had literally, and to the best of his recollection, done nothing else but make appropriations, and lay taxes. Yet honorable gentlemen had spoken of this gratuity and augmentation of pay they were about to vote to themselves, as a mere pittance, which the liberality of their constituents would confirm without a second thought on the subject; nay, several had gone so far as to say, if the committee had erred, it was rather in fixing upon a sum too small, than in recommending one too large. He thought very differently. And though he had as much confidence in the liberality of those whom he immediately represented, as any other gentleman could have in that of his immediate constituents, yet when he recollected how liberally taxes had been laid on them already during the present Congress, and the high tariff of duties on foreign importations about to be added to these, by way of bounty to domestic manufactures, he could not find it in his conscience to draw upon their liberality for a gratuity, and an addition to his pay at such a moment, and under such circumstances.

Were there no other objections then to the bill, this extravagant retrospective operation would be a sufficient inducement with him to vote against it. But he had a still stronger, and, in his opinion, unanswerable objection to the bill, on account of the proposed change in the mode of compensation, and the novelty of converting members of the Legislature into salary officers. They were said, indeed, to be mere day laborers, and that it was beneath their dignity to receive a stipend, as though they were mere hewers of wood and drawers of water. He saw no force in the observation. They were in fact, and in truth, day laborers, and must, from the nature of their services, continue such. Their predecessors had been so, and had received for upwards of thirty years a per diem, in proportion to their daily services. Yet, it was the first time he had ever heard a whisper as to its baneful influence on their dignity, or that the receipt of a per diem had affected, one way or the other, the standing or respectability of the members of Congress.

Not only their dignity, however, was all of a sudden found to be lessened by the old mode of compensation, but members, it seems likewise to be most unexpectedly discovered, received less than clerks in many of the offices, or those employed to copy their own proceedings; and, it was triumphantly demanded, whether members of that honorable body were not worthy of at least as much compensation as mere quill-drivers. He really did not expect such an argument (well enough adapted, perhaps, to a newspaper paragraph) would have been seriously urged in that House. He would ask in return, whether the question had been fairly stated, or whether there was any point of comparison between a clerk who earned his daily bread by personal labor and his skill in figures and penmanship, and a member who was elevated to a seat in that august body; to whose care was committed the destinies of this great and rising Republic. He put it to gentlemen themselves to say, whether it was indeed with a view of making a livelihood, or upon the principle of obtaining compensation for their services, that they sought or accepted of the high, dignified, and responsible situation of a Representative of the people. He was confident that gentlemen, one and all, would spurn at the suggestion. Indeed, the honorable gentleman from Virginia, (MR. RANDOLPH,) who was one of the most zealous supporters of the bill, had given the most decided negative to any such idea, and the strongest argument in favor of the principle he advocated, when he stated it to be his sober and well-digested opinion, that the members of Congress should not be allowed any pay whatever.

On this point, however, he had the misfortune likewise to differ from that gentleman; and he well remembered, at a former period, and as a member of a former Congress, when "economy and republican frugality and simplicity" were as much the cry and watchword of the day, as are at this time "dignity, and living like gentlemen," he well remembered he had resisted most strenuously a proposal to reduce the pay of members of Congress to three or four dollars a day. He had done so from motives and principles not dissimilar to those which actuated him at present in opposing an increase of pay.

He had always understood that the object of giving a per diem to members, either of the State or National Legislatures, was not by way of a compensation for their services, still less to remunerate them for sacrifices of pecuniary or personal advantages of any kind. No; the real object was to enable individuals, whose private means would not enable them to attend the sessions of the respective Legislatures, to meet the moderate and reasonable expenses to which they must necessarily be subjected by their attendance on them, and to the end that the country might not be altogether deprived of the services of men in narrow circumstances, from their inability to suffice to this extra expense. Hence, and in the same spirit, a moderate and reasonable allowance was made for travelling expenses—not at such a rate, however, as would be required by the nabob of the South, whom the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. KING) describes, and who, he tells us—with all the gravity and dignity he possesses in so eminent a degree, and which so well becomes the occasion—cannot get along without his carriage and two horses, and two black servants, and two dogs, but such as would enable a decent and respectable individual to transport himself comfortably and conveniently from his place of residence to the Seat of Government.

Such, beyond all doubt, was the principle upon which pay has heretofore been given to members of the State and National Legislatures. This was the correct medium between the two extremes of refusing to pay their reasonable expenses, or of giving salaries sufficiently large to compensate members of the respective Legislatures for the loss of time, the sacrifices they made of individual comfort, and the diversion of their talents and industry from their usual avocations; by the first alternative, depriving the country altogether of the services of persons in narrow circumstances, and throwing the Government entirely into the hands of the rich; by the latter, attempting to do that which, if carried into execution, would bankrupt the nation. It was, in fact, not to be expected nor calculated upon, that the best and first-rate talents of the country could or would be drawn out, in common and peaceable times, by any salary which might be offered; far less by such an annual stipend as that proposed. In moments of great crisis—on occasions of imminent danger and national exigency—the amor patriæ—the genial impulse of great minds would force such men to come forward and take a part in the public councils. But, to expect such a sacrifice of private pursuits, and individual enjoyment and emolument on their part, in ordinary times, was out of the question. He more than doubted, indeed, whether any salary, the most sanguine friends of the bill could prevail on themselves to propose, would insure a more respectable representation than that which composed the present Congress.

The point at issue, then, it would seem, between the gentleman and himself, was, that they proposed to remunerate members for their services and sacrifices; whilst he, according to the principle heretofore acted upon, thought it most expedient to confine the pay to such an amount as would defray their necessary and reasonable expenses, coming to, attending on, and returning from, the National Legislature. Take either horn of the dilemma, and he was equally opposed to the bill. He contended that it was perfectly farcical to talk of drawing out the first-rate talents and characters by such a salary as fifteen hundred dollars. On the contrary, this sum, when fixed and certain, was about sufficient to tempt the cupidity and excite the avarice of the second or third rate county court lawyer, the idle and noisy demagogue, or the lowest grade of political brawlers, who haunted the taverns and tippling houses, and stunned the ears of the peaceable citizens with their devotion to republicanism, their love of the people, and their exclusive patriotism.

Here the question presented itself, and he would examine whether the old per diem of six dollars was or was not sufficient to meet the reasonable and necessary expenses of a member whilst attending to his official duties. He would candidly acknowledge that money had depreciated; that living was (nominally at least) higher; that the pecuniary resources of a member, arising from his pay, were not as great or as favorable to him as they had been in former and better times. But this was not to last forever. In the meantime, it was equally felt by all those in any way connected or concerned with the General Government—the public creditor, the old soldier, the disbanded officer—indeed, by every portion of the community, even in their private concerns and capacity. He saw no reason, therefore, why the members of Congress should separate themselves from all other classes of that community, and make use of their official station to escape from the pressure of an evil common to all, and one for which it would better become them, and it was their bounden duty, to endeavor to find an efficient remedy. He moreover contended, the depreciation notwithstanding, that a member could live conveniently, comfortably, abundantly—ay, and like a gentleman, too, if this was to be the criterion, upon the present per diem. He could prove it, he thought, beyond all contradiction, by figures. Take, for example, the expenditure of a week in Washington, at the highest rate, and for what he should presume to be an ample establishment, even for a gentleman: boarding and lodging, (the highest charge he had heard of,) fifteen dollars, a servant four, two horses eight. He did not include the two dogs of the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts, as this necessary appendage to the dignity of a member was unknown to himself or either of his colleagues, and must belong, he presumed, exclusively to Virginia and the other large States. The above three items amount to twenty-seven dollars, which, deducted from twelve dollars, the gross amount of a week's pay, at six dollars per diem, would leave a balance of fifteen dollars per week for extra expenses, including Madeira, which the veteran member from Maryland (Mr. WRIGHT) seemed to think had likewise become indispensable to the dignity of a gentleman who had in these days a seat in Congress. And on this point, at least, he candidly acknowledged, and was happy to find, that his feelings were somewhat in unison with his old Congressional friend and acquaintance; though he had, nevertheless, some doubts whether the member who had made a late dinner or his supper with brown bread and a tumbler of genuine cider, would not find himself on the following morning fully as adequate to perform the duties of a legislator, as the one who had feasted sumptuously with the best white loaf, or enjoyed his bottle, even of the deservedly far-famed old lath of Alexandria.

The gentleman from Virginia (Mr. RANDOLPH) had said it was immoral, contra bonos mores, to oblige members to live, for the want of means, so many months separated from their families. There was point and pith in this, as there usually were in the remarks of that gentleman. He perfectly acquiesced in the truth and justice of it; but, before it could have any weight with him in making up his mind on the present question, he must be convinced that the proposed augmentation would remedy, or at least have a considerable tendency to remedy, the evil. From his own knowledge, he was convinced it could and would not. He was confident that the contemplated addition to the old per diem would not enable gentlemen, who had not other and private means of their own, to bring their wives and children with them; nor did he believe that one additional family would spend their Winter at Washington in consequence of it. The only effect of this increased compensation would be, that the expensive habits and inclinations of one portion of the members would be encouraged and excited, whilst others, who were more saving and economical, would carry heavier purses home with them.

Another argument had been advanced, which likewise carried with it some appearance of plausibility. It was said this addition of pay would lessen the anxiety and necessity for Executive favors and appointments, and that Executive influence and control in and over that body would be thereby diminished. He was convinced, however, it would have a contrary tendency. The moment a seat in Congress was regarded as a money job, or members were induced to change their habits, and live beyond their regular means, by a temporary addition to them, they would imbibed expensive notions and inclinations. Their wants would increase; their families, as well as themselves, would be disposed to ape the follies and extravagances of the rich contractor, unprincipled speculator, and every other description of moneyed men, or of men without money, who lived by means of their wits, and at the expense of the industrious classes of the community. Dependence must be the natural and unavoidable consequence. An overweening anxiety and irresistible necessity of obtaining Executive favors and patronage, per fas aut nefas, must as certainly follow. Moderation, frugality, and economy were the only safeguards to the independence and integrity of men in public life. It was not only in direct opposition to the most sacred maxim of morality, thus to lead them into temptation; but the doctrine of the present day, and that preached up on the present occasion, which went to persuade members that it was necessary to live in a style beyond what was decent, respectable, and comfortable, and to entice them into expenses and a kind of living beyond what they were accustomed to, or had the private means of keeping up at home, was contrary to the soundest dictates of common sense, and dangerous in the extreme. By doing so, they must become needy and craving, and be placed precisely in that situation most likely to render them subservient to, and then perhaps reluctant, yet not less implicit tools of, that branch of the Government which could alone supply their immediate and most pressing wants, and hold out to them in expectation a rich harvest and ample share of the loaves and fishes at its disposal.

But it was contended by the chairman of the committee, that this increase of pay, and change of the per diem into a salary, would shorten the sessions of Congress, put an end to long speeches—in a word, be the panacea or cure-all to every evil. Such might be the case in part, particularly as relates to the shortening of the sessions of that body. He more than doubted, nevertheless, if it was so, whether such an alternative was altogether desirable. The honorable chairman appeared to him not to have examined, with his usual sagacity, both sides before he had made up his mind on the question. Upon his own data, it would seem evident, on the one hand, that an augmentation of pay could not be necessary; for his arguments went to show, that the present six dollars per diem tempted members to make long speeches, and spin out the session—to the end that they might reap the greater emolument by remaining here and obtaining a greater number of days' pay. It followed, of necessity, that the old and present allowance was found experimentally to be not only sufficient, but highly desirable. On the other hand, if the per diem was changed into a salary, and that salary increased, in order to shorten the sessions and put down long speeches, might there not (deducing the same probable effects from the same efficient causes) be with justice serious apprehensions entertained lest the members should, in time to come, be induced to shorten the sessions too much, and hurry over the public business somewhat unadvisedly, and before it was properly and sufficiently matured? This was perhaps too often the case, even at this time, and under existing circumstances.

What, then, was to be expected, according to the data given, from a measure the necessary operation of which was to place the interest of the individual in direct opposition to his duty, and to render his emolument greater or less, in exact proportion to the shortness of the period he devoted to his public duties, and remained in this, as it was said, most expensive city. Now, though he was by no means fond of too much regulation, yet he confessed he saw no very great inconvenience or danger likely to accrue to the Republic from too much discussion. For his own part, he would rather be condemned to listen to fifty long and tedious speeches than contribute, sub silentio, to the passage of one bad law, or be obliged to vote for a measure he had not heard explained or did not comprehend.

There was another aspect in which this subject presented itself to him as of vital importance, and as affording cause for serious alarm. He was perfectly satisfied, in his own mind, that no measure could be devised which would increase, so enormously and fearfully, the influence of the executive over the legislative branch of the Government, or throw the latter so completely under the control of the former as this salary system. Not only the sessions would thereby be injuriously shortened, but business would be hurried through any how and every how. Congress would meet for little else than to lay taxes and make appropriations. Laws would be passed as they were sent ready drawn up from the several departments, and measures, kindly and previously matured by the industry and superior wisdom of the Executive, would be adopted, right or wrong, with little if any discussion. He entreated gentlemen to take this view of the subject, before they made up their minds on the question, and to postpone the bill at least till the next session, and until they had gone home and consulted with their constituents in regard to it. He could not, for his own part at least, but regard this change of the per diem into a salary, or gross sum, as a dangerous innovation, and one likely to be attended with the worst consequences.

Our Government had been described with some humor, and not less justice, perhaps, as a species of logocracy. It was in fact and in essence very much of one. It could not get along without considerable discussion. The people ought and would know, what were the motives which led to this or that measure, or why one law was passed, and another rejected. Now, he knew of no mode by which this information could be obtained by them more conveniently or satisfactorily, than through the debates in Congress, and the speeches of their Representatives. He was disposed, therefore, to view this cacoethes loquendi, which some gentlemen (who possessed it in no trifling degree themselves) complained so much of, with some little indulgence. There was, indeed, at times, irksome, tedious and most ridiculous speeches made in that House. But gentlemen enjoyed a privilege which they had very generally, and not very unfrequently availed themselves of during the present session—the privilege of not listening to such speeches; whilst the good people abroad read them, or read them not, according as the subject, or speaker, or any other circumstance, excited their curiosity, or attracted their attention.

These few observations, he hoped, would tend to reconcile the worthy gentleman from Kentucky, a little, to the inconvenience of long speeches, and would also, he trusted, plead in some measure his own apology for the length of time he had encroached upon their patience. He should not have indulged himself to such an extent, but that the active opposition to the bill appeared to devolve almost exclusively upon himself, whilst the first talents in the House had been brought forward in support of it. He would further observe that in the ground he had taken, he thought himself supported by the spirit, if not the letter of that article of the Constitution, which prohibited a Senator or Representative from being appointed to any civil office under the United States, that had been created, or the emoluments of which were increased during the time for which he had been elected. Certain he was that in South Carolina, his native State, and the one he had the honor, in part, to represent, no act to increase the compensation of the members of the Legislature could take effect till after a new election; nor did the provisions of any such act go into operation, except in favor of those who were chosen to serve in a succeeding Legislature. He had long, therefore, been accustomed to regard this as the true and the most decorous, as well as the most correct principle, and he should not, he trusted, be accused of presumption if he ventured to recommend it to that House, as a precedent which it would well become them to imitate.

Before he sat down, Mr. H. said he would add, that he was perfectly aware, the stand he had made in opposition to an increase and change of the per diem into a salary, (indeed it had been more than insinuated in the course of the debate,) would be attributed to a desire of obtaining popularity, and an anticipation of the popular edict it would probably have out of doors. He would not say that such feelings might not have had some influence on his mind and conduct; for he pretended not to be less fallible than those around him. But he could with justice, and in sober truth aver, that he was opposed upon principle to the measure, and more especially to the change of the per diem into a fixed salary; a system that, he was perfectly satisfied, would augment most enormously the power of Executive influence, which no one, he believed, would deny had increased, was increasing, and would be, if it was not already, placed by this new system beyond all control. Besides, convenient as he acknowledged such an addition to his pay would be to himself, at the present time, as well as to other gentlemen, yet when he recalled to mind the heavy taxes which had been or must be laid; the exorbitant tariff of duties on foreign importations, likely to be adopted; the large and unprecedented (at least in time of profound peace) appropriations they were called upon to make; the number of veterans who had lately been disbanded, and thrown penniless upon the world; the debt which had been incurred, and partially funded; the large outstanding demands not yet liquidated—in a word, when he passed in review these and similar matters, it did seem to him that the proposed measure was wrong, and most obviously ill-timed. He at least could not reconcile it to himself; and, though sneered and laughed at by more than one honorable gentleman, for so expressing himself, he would repeat, he should be ashamed to return home and acknowledge that, under such circumstances, and at the close of so bloody and expensive a war, he had voted for, or even neglected to oppose an increase of pay to himself and to those who, like himself, represented the good people of these United States on that floor, and consequently held the purse-strings of the nation at their disposal.

Mr. H. concluded by repeating, he did not think the sessions long. The House was sometimes vexed with the cacoethes loquendi, but the consequence was, that measures had a fair and deliberate consideration. It was necessary, he thought, the community should rightly understand the acts of Congress; and one of the advantages of this speechification, was, that the people would be well informed, and our measures be well matured. Long speaking, he contended, was no such great evil as had been asserted; he would rather have ten days speaking than one law; for many laws were an evil. Mr. H. said that the Abbe Sicard, so celebrated for teaching the deaf and dumb, had lately published that there was a nation in North America who had no language at all, but did everything by signs. He was friendly to debate because he himself felt its good effects, for he now entertained very different opinions on some subjects from those he brought here. Ours, he said, was a logocracy; it was in vain to deny it, and we ought to act in the spirit of the Government, &c. Mr. H. adverted to the charge of folding newspapers, &c., and said it was no worse than the practice of lounging about the House as some did. He concluded by declaring it his opinion that instead of diminishing the sessions, he thought it would be better to make them longer; and as to the pay, he thought the honor of the station was sufficient to bring gentlemen to Congress, without any influence from pecuniary considerations.

Mr. RANDOLPH said, in reply to Mr. HUGER, that he agreed with him in just one half of one of his propositions, which was that speeches did no harm. In his opinion they were like old women's physic, they did neither good nor harm. The gentleman (Mr. HUGER) thought no pay ought to be allowed, because gentlemen ought to come here for honor; if that is the case, many, said Mr. R., come for what they do not get. Many of the clerks, it had been said, received more than the members of Congress—yet, Mr. R. said, there was no clerk who ever drudged harder than he did; in proof of which, he briefly detailed the course of labor and study he imposed on himself whilst here in the public service. Mr. R. denied that the members could live comfortably on six dollars a day now, whatever might have been the case when the pay was first fixed. He adverted also to the salaries of some other officers of the Government, particularly the Chief Justice, who was put off with a scanty pittance. The pay at first fixed for those officers was something like a decent compensation, but now pitiful and disgraceful. The gentleman (Mr. HUGER) must pardon me, said Mr. R., if I think his arguments are better calculated for what is called on this side of the river stump, than for this Committee, &c.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, said he wished this measure correctly and properly understood, that the people might judge of its merits. He never concealed from his constituents his sentiments on political subjects, and although it was a measure in which every member was concerned individually, he never, on any occasion, consulted more the honor, the happiness, the rights, the independence of his constituents and his country, than in proposing a change in the mode of compensation to members of Congress.

He had been a member of Congress for eight years, in times of trial and difficulty, when the rights of the nation had been violated, when storms menaced its peace and tranquillity, and when a severe and sanguinary war threatened the very basis of our independence. During all this period, he had discovered imminent danger to the Republic in the councils of the nation, in the very councils to which the American people looked for wisdom and direction—the Congress of the United States. We wanted energy and decision of character to take wise and strong measures. The people called for despatch of business, and we answered them with long speeches. We were many times upon the point of taking the most important questions; and when it was expected that some great measure would be decided, a motion for adjournment was carried. In this way, from day to day, from week to week, and from month to month, a long session was spun out, the six dollars per day pocketted, and little or nothing done to relieve our distresses. When, under this state of things, the people, driven almost to despair, poured upon us their anathemas, every member could go home and tell his constituents that he himself was innocent, and that the fault of indecision and delay rested entirely with others. It was impossible for the people to ascertain who attended to his duty or who neglected it. The members, in this respect, evaded their responsibility, because invisible to their constituents. Although we might patrol the streets, or vote for an adjournment at three o'clock, or even at an earlier hour, the people remained ignorant of our delinquency.

Mr. J. said he wished every man to be responsible for his conduct to the people, the legitimate fountain of power and authority. He said he wished his constituents were collected, and after hearing the subject discussed, could decide on this occasion. They were a wise people, a patriotic people, a well-judging people, who valued independence, liberty, and honor more than a few cents, or dollars, or pounds. Although he did not wish to say anything of his own attendance, it was known to his friends that he lost no time during sessions of Congress, and he never voted to adjourn when the House could progress with business. So much for the change of the mode of compensation. But one objection has been made, which was that Congress might hurry business, and not well mature it. There was no danger of any such thing. Business of importance would always be thoroughly investigated; and as to matters of less difficulty, of course, they would be easily understood; and not only so, but the mode of doing business precluded the idea of too much despatch. What was that mode? A subject was introduced by resolution or by communication from the President, or head of a department, or, by petition. In either case, the subject was referred to a committee of seven members, who investigated and reported, for or against the measure; the report was committed to the whole House of 182 members in committee, printed, and taken up at some future day, when it was read twice over, discussed by sections, and then reported to the House. If, after this investigation, it was approved by the House, it was ordered to a third reading, and engrossed, subject to the inspection of an engrossing committee. It was then read over a third time to the House before it was finally decided. If it passed the House, it was sent to the Senate, where the same routine was pursued, after which it was enrolled and inspected by a joint committee of both Houses, and ultimately examined and approved by the President. So much as to the only objection made to the mode.

Let us now attend to the other branch of the argument, the amount of compensation. On this subject Mr. J. said he felt much less anxious than on the other. He wanted a certain sum given for the year, whether it amounted to one dollar per day, or to ten; and, as to himself individually, he did not care whether the sum was one thousand five hundred dollars, or half that sum; that was with the House to determine. He was aiming at a reform in the proceedings of Congress—a reform which must take place now or at some other period, or the country would one day be endangered, and the rights of the people invaded. Every member who has voted against this measure has declared the present compensation inadequate. Some of them have said we should have nine, others ten, and others twelve dollars per day. Mr. J. said he would not vote for one cent in addition to the per diem. It would be an inducement to protract the sessions, till they would become perpetual, and that would be the final result of raising the wages by the day. But if members would vote for the change, and thereby shorten the sessions, and not only shorten the sessions, but despatch and transact all the public business, then, he said, he was willing to vote for a liberal compensation—a compensation which would induce members to remain in their seats, which would, in some degree, indemnify them for the sacrifices of happiness and property, which any man of business must make, who serves his country as a Representative.

Mr. J. said he would vote for no sum which, in his opinion, would ultimately cost the people of the United States one cent more than the present system. He asked, then, whether the sum proposed would be too great? and whether such a sum would ultimately cost the Government more? Mr. J. said he had looked back into the various sessions since the beginning of the Government—at the various contingent expenses of each session, and he had no doubt but that under the proposed compensation money would be saved to the nation. In this pecuniary point of view, the nation would be the gainer. 1st. By dispensing with extra sessions of Congress, which never ought to take place in the United States, but which are becoming common. Every extra session would cost the Government at least from $120,000 to $150,000 more than the per diem in mileage and contingencies. But let it be recollected that in case of an extra session, which we may suppose necessary in some extreme case, no member will have anything more in consequence of it. It may be asked, what would you do in any emergencies, such as those which have produced extra sessions? In such cases, the call of Congress some four or five weeks previous to the time of adjournment, would always answer the purpose, as in the case of the attack upon the Chesapeake.

Connected with the whole system of expense, therefore, the public will save money; and if that be the case, no patriot will think the compensation too great to be paid for the representative of his choice.

But let us confine our view to the compensation, abstracted from the foregoing considerations. Members cannot consider this as a great augmentation. Indeed none can think so, compared with what we get. Nine months sessions will give each member, at six dollars per day, one thousand six hundred and twenty dollars. Mr. J. said, he had himself received at one session, one thousand five hundred dollars at six dollars per day; and he was convinced, that in a very little time, the wealthy would unite with another class of men, and have either perpetual sessions, or sessions that would bring to each member at least one thousand five hundred dollars. This, he said, demonstrated the propriety of having a fixed sum, beyond which we could not go; that if we wasted our time, it would be at our own expense. Suppose, said he, we were to continue our eight months sessions, what enormous contingent expenses should we incur? At our last session, our contingent expenses amounted to $50,000, or thereabout. Despatch of business would prevent this. In a session of three months, the contingent expenses ought not, nor would they be, more than about $20,000, a saving of $30,000 in each session of six months. Indeed, with the rules of reform which this measure must introduce, instead of $50,000, the amount heretofore expended for printing, stationery, fuel, attendants, and other contingencies, the whole ought not to exceed $15,000 for the contingent expenses of a session. But Congress have not only had a session which gave each member $1,500; it is in our power, (and I fear the time is not far distant when we shall avail ourselves of it,) to remain in session till each member will draw $2,000 from the Treasury. In this point of view, it is necessary to limit that power. But there are many other weighty reasons why this compensation is not too great.

1st. It will unite patriotism and interest to secure the attendance and industry of members.

2d. It will enable a man of merit, though poor, as well as the man of wealth, to come to Congress, if elected by the people, which is no trifling consideration. This is the only free and happy Government on the earth. Other nations are groaning under the yoke of despotism. Privileged orders are established—a nobility to riot upon the spoils of the people. Here all are on an equality, and eligible to office. The people, on the day of election, look to merit, not to riches. They ask for the qualities of the candidates. They inquire into their political sentiments, their personal integrity and talents, and they decide accordingly. These persons may have families to support, dependent upon their business or profession, which, if neglected, will subject them to suffering. It is then the duty of the people to afford them such compensation as will justify their engagement to serve them, that the country may not be subject to the dominion of the idle and profligate, or of such as are born to princely fortunes, while the most meritorious are driven, by a sense of that duty which they owe to their families, from public employment. Mr. J. said, he advocated the amount, not on his own individual account. In his present situation, he felt little interest as to the amount. He was, nevertheless, willing to receive it, because he did not think it too great. It was after all a poor compensation. His main object was, to shorten sessions, and despatch business, for he would rather serve three months for nothing, than six months in each year for six dollars per day. The sacrifice was, in breaking in upon all the avocations of the farmer, the mechanic, the lawyer, the merchant, &c., which began generally, and always demanded special attention, in the Spring.

3d. The rights and honor of the nation will be preserved by a despatch of public business, and by acting with more promptness upon petitions and other claims during the session in which they are presented, and not continue them from session to session for ten years, as has been done in many cases of just claims, when the amount has been exhausted by the expenses of attendance. Such a course is incompatible with the dignity of a magnanimous nation—there must be a reform.

But admit for a moment, that the United States would be charged with a few thousand dollars more, what is that compared with the effects of such a measure? No more than a grain of sand upon the seashore to a mountain. It is well known that six dollars a day was given twenty-five years ago, which was more, compared with expenses now, than three times the amount would be at present. This compensation may so remain for twenty years to come, because many are afraid to do right upon a subject of so much delicacy, for fear the wicked may misrepresent, and the motives of members may be misunderstood. But, delicate as this subject is, it ought to be borne in mind, that no other branch of the Government has power to touch it. Members may be accused of sordid views and selfish motives—but, Mr. J. said, he was willing to be judged by his constituents as to motives and views. He was not afraid on this point—they would not judge him harshly. They were a different people, they would take the whole of his conduct together, and he considered he had never served his country more than by advocating the measure now under debate.

Mr. CLAY took the opportunity afforded him by the Committee of the Whole, to yield his support to the bill, and at once to commit himself in its favor. As to the amendment to defer the commencement of its operation until the next Congress, he would remark, that, in his judgment, there was more propriety in the law ending than in beginning there. It was more respectful to our successors to leave them free to determine what was the just measure of indemnity for their expenses than for us to prescribe the rule for them. We can best judge for ourselves. With regard to the supposed indelicacy of our fixing upon our own compensations, let the Constitution, let the necessity of the case, be reproached for that, not us. Mr. C. said his own personal experience determined him in voting for the bill. He had attended Congress, sometimes without his family, and at others with a part of it; and although his compensation, while he had enjoyed the honor of presiding in this House, was double that of other members, he declared, with the utmost sincerity, that he had never been able to make both ends meet at the termination of Congress.

The honorable gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. HUGEN) tells us he was born to opulence. He ought to recollect that few in this House have had the same good fortune. Would he reserve the seats here for the well born and the rich alone? And yet they must be confined to them, unless such an allowance is made as will enable the poor and the middling classes to come here. Mr. C. thought the rate of compensation ought to be such at least as that ruin should not attend a long service in this House. And yet how many are driven out of it by their inability to sustain the expenses and losses incident to the situation! This had been particularly the case from the State to which he had the honor of belonging. And he regretted to find that this cause was still operating, and was about to deprive the House and the country of the valuable services of several of his colleagues. Mr. C. thought the compensation ought to effect more; it ought to guaranty the independence of the members of this House against the influence of the Executive branch. How was the fact in another country? There the members of the Legislature received no stipend; and the consequence was, that it was filled with pensioners, placemen, and the creatures of the Ministry. The laborer is worthy of his hire; and if you do not give him the wages of honesty, it is to be apprehended the wages of corruption may, in process of time, come to be sought. He should give his most decided vote for the bill.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Virginia, said, he should vote for the amendment—not from any motive of popularity—he disclaimed so unworthy an influence. Adverting to the reason advanced by the mover of the amendment, Mr. J. said he generally found, that those who attributed improper motives to others, would, if they took a glance at the mirror, find those motives reflected from their own bosoms. He admitted the pay was too low, and ought to be augmented; the pitiful sum of six dollars might induce a lounging lout to come here, but he was convinced it would be inadequate of itself to bring any gentleman here. Although this was his opinion, he thought the amendment proper, and should vote for it.

Mr. ROBERTSON said a few words in support of the bill, which he thought was proper, simply because the present pay was not enough; and as to popularity, he knew his vote would arrive at home about the time of his election, and he wished to give his constituents the opportunity of deciding on his conduct.

Mr. BARBOUR said that he should vote for the amendment, and disclaimed any influence but that which was correct and proper. The six dollars now allowed, if taken as a salary, he said, was not enough; but, if as an allowance to support members of Congress while here on the public business, was insufficient for many, though he himself could live comfortably on that sum. He disclaimed any concealments, and was the last to impute an impure motive to others. He supposed, therefore, gentlemen were governed by correct motives in supporting this bill, and claimed for himself the same allowance. He knew it was a delicate matter to act for self; there was an inextinguishable feeling in such a case, which nature had implanted in us, and he was aware that in acting on it, the greatest purity could not escape suspicion. Like Cæsar's wife, not wishing even to be suspected of improper views in this case, he should vote for the amendment. He avowed his desire of that popularity which attended good actions—not that which was got without merit, and lost without a fault. He should, therefore, vote for the motion.

Mr. JACKSON said, it was unnecessary to say anything with regard to the real object of the bill; that was unquestionable; and he was extremely pleased that there was no diversity on the subject, because he did not wish to see the time when the places here should be filled solely by men of fortune; neither did he desire to witness the reverse, when members of this House should be liable to Executive influence on account of their needy circumstances. With regard to discrimination, Congress had heretofore passed laws giving themselves compensation, as well while here as for mileage, travelling expenses; to prove which, he quoted the acts of Congress of 1795. The amendment, Mr. J. said, was useless, because one branch of the Legislature was indissoluble, and to postpone the act until it would cease to affect any of the present members, might be to put it off for fifty years. If it be right in relation to ourselves, said Mr. J., it must be right in relation to the Senate also; and if not so to them, cannot be to us. Mr. J. said, he was not deterred from supporting this measure by any fear of the effect it would produce at home. The people had once before borne him out in a similar course, when he had voted for an increase of compensation in the Legislature of Virginia, and he was not afraid to encounter the same responsibility now.

Mr. HUGER entered into some explanations in reply to Mr. RANDOLPH, and added a few more remarks in opposition to the bill.

Mr. PICKERING said, if the present compensation was inadequate, let it be augmented. He was in favor of the bill for many reasons. It would certainly despatch the public business and save the public money. The depreciation of money had been more than fifty, some thought seventy-five per cent.; and if, as had been said, the compensation was originally fixed on democratic principles, it ought now to be increased to what would equal the value of what six dollars were when that sum was fixed. If the change is proper, said Mr. P., shall we adopt a self-denying ordinance, and say we will not give to ourselves what we are willing to give to our successors? After some remarks on an alteration in the mode of doing business which Mr. P. thought would be useful, if the bill passed, he concluded by saying that, as to that rascally prudence which had been mentioned on a former day by Mr. RANDOLPH, he was as destitute of it as anybody. He had never in his life taken time to think whether an act would make him popular or otherwise, and he should disregard such a consideration on this occasion.

Mr. RANDOLPH declared that he had such an aversion to the bare name of self-denying ordinances, that since his motion had been so denominated, he was induced to withdraw it; which he did accordingly.

Mr. STANFORD then said that there were some in this House who had believed that the Constitution prohibited Congress from increasing its own pay; and, as he was averse to augmenting it, he renewed the motion just withdrawn by Mr. RANDOLPH, to refer the operation of the act to the next session of Congress.

The question was then taken on the motion, and negatived by a large majority.

The Committee of the Whole having risen and reported the bill to the House—

Mr. STANFORD renewed the motion just rejected, and made a subsequent motion to leave the sum in the bill blank; both of which were successively negatived.

Mr. BURNSIDE moved to reduce the proposed salary to one thousand one hundred dollars; which was also lost.

Mr. TAYLOR, of New York, then moved to strike out "one thousand five hundred," and insert "one thousand dollars," as the salary.

Mr. ROOT rose to express his opinion of the scheme, as it might be called, proposed by the bill. It was intended, he was informed, to cure a great evil, and that evil was the length of the sessions; and as it was wrong to apply the previous question, the evil must be cured by an annual salary. This object, he said, bore no relation to the present compensation; and, therefore, it was to advance the pay in disguise. It was argued that the pay was inadequate, and that the members staid here to increase it, thereby protracting the sessions; and that an annual salary must be allowed to remedy this evil. These reasons were inexplicable to him. He had no objection that members of Congress should receive an adequate compensation for their services; but that would depend on their mode of living. If six dollars were not enough, meet the question fairly, and not in this disguised manner. He believed the increased privilege of franking and continuing the mileage allowance, would virtually make the proposed compensation twelve dollars per day. Mr. R. said he was bred a democrat, and never could tolerate anything like aristocracy. He, therefore, rejected the distinctions which had been claimed for members of Congress on account of the dignity of their stations, and their not being day-laborers, &c. Some of them, he said, might be more honest than day-laborers, but take mankind in the gross, and you will find honesty and intrinsic merit pretty generally distributed through the different classes of society.

The bill was then ordered to a third reading by a large majority.

FRIDAY, March 8.

Mr. CREIGHTON presented a resolution of the General Assembly of the State of Ohio, requesting that power may be vested in that State to sell as much of reserved land in the county of Jackson, in said State, as may be necessary for laying out a town thereon.—Referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a bill, "relative to settlers on the lands of the United States;" also, a bill in "addition to an act, entitled 'An act in relation to the Navy Pension Fund;'" in which bills they ask the concurrence of this House.

Mr. YANCEY made a report on the petition of Joseph Wilson, which was read; when Mr. Y. reported a bill for the relief of Joseph Wilson; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. YANCEY also made a report on the petition of Gustavus Loomis, which was read; when Mr. Y. reported a bill for the relief of Gustavus Loomis, which was read twice, and ordered to be engrossed and read a third time to-morrow.

Mr. YANCEY also made a report on the petition of Paul D. Butler, which was read; when Mr. Y. reported a bill for the relief of Paul D. Butler, which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. ROBERTSON, from the Committee on the Public Lands, made a report on the petition of Gabriel Winter, which was read; when Mr. R. reported a bill confirming certain lands in the county of Arkansas, in the Missouri Territory; to the heirs of Elisha Winter, deceased, to the heirs of William Winter, deceased, and to Gabriel Winter, which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

The bill from the Senate "relating to settlers on the lands of the United States," was read twice, and referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

INCREASE OF THE RATES OF PENSION.

Mr. CHAPPELL, from the Committee on Pensions and Revolutionary Claims, who were instructed by a resolution of the 28th of December last to inquire into the expediency of increasing certain pensions, made a report thereon, which was read; when Mr. C. reported a bill to increase the pensions of invalids in certain cases, for the relief of invalids of the militia, and for the appointment of pension agents in those States and Territories in which there is no commissioner of loans; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole. The report is as follows:

The Committee on Pensions and Revolutionary Claims, to whom was referred the resolution of the House of Representatives of the 28th of December last, directing an inquiry into the expediency of increasing the rate of pensions to officers and soldiers disabled in the service of the United States during the late war with Great Britain; and also into the expediency of amending the law relative to the proof required from officers and privates in the militia to establish their claim to a pension, report:

That the pension now allowed to a non-commissioned officer or soldier for the greatest disability is five dollars per month, and to the commissioned officers the half of their monthly pay; making the highest pension, per month,

Of an ensign amount to -	-	-	-	$10 00
Of a third lieutenant -	-	-	-	11 50
Of a second lieutenant -	-	-	-	12 50
Of a first lieutenant -	-	-	-	15 00
Of a captain -	-	-	-	20 00
Of a major -	-	-	-	25 00
Of a lieutenant colonel -	-	-	-	30 00

That for all disabilities less than total, the pension is proportionably less; and that the half-pay of a lieutenant colonel is the highest pension which any officer can receive.

In the investigation of this subject the committee have been necessarily led to consider the time when the present rates of pensions were established, and to contrast the then prices of the articles which constitute the necessities of life with the present. The difference is manifest; and the result is, that what was then considered a competent provision now falls far short of the object. Sixty dollars per annum is the pension allowed a soldier for the greatest disability. This, under the change which has taken place in the prices of articles, the committee deem insufficient to enable him to support himself plentifully and comfortably. They think that whatever sum the Government may allow, should have, at least, this end in view. It seems to be the object of all Governments—it is certainly the peculiar duty of this, dictated alike by a just regard to sound policy and the injunctions of humanity.

The same absolute necessity may not exist to increase the pensions of the officers, because it is possible they may, with the present rates, live free from actual want; but as there is a difference in their grade and responsibility, in their pay whilst in service, and the pensions which have been allowed, not only in this, but in other Governments, the committee deem it improper to depart from these rules; they think some regard should be paid to the conditions of men, and that, as far as can, consistently with policy, they should be placed in circumstances of relative ease and comfort.

The resolution instructs them to inquire into the expediency of increasing the pensions of the officers and soldiers disabled in the late war with Great Britain only. In doing this, they have unavoidably been obliged to consider the cases of all persons who have been disabled whilst in the military service of this Government, and they have not been able to discover any difference in their claims. They think no distinction should be allowed to exist, but that whatever provisions are made should relate equally to all invalids.

The committee are in favor of a partial increase of pensions; but as it may be satisfactory to the House to see the effect of this increase on the Treasury, they have ascertained the number of pensioners now on the list, what number are officers, and what privates, distinguishing those of both denominations who were of the Revolutionary army, and the amount of pensions at present paid, and find there is paid annually the sum of $119,624 05 for that object; that there are 185 officers, and 1,572 non-commissioned officers and soldiers of the Revolutionary army, and 52 officers, and 391 non-commissioned officers and soldiers who have become disabled since the Revolution, making an aggregate of 237 officers and 1,963 non-commissioned officers and privates, and a total of 2,200 pensioners.

The above statement extends to as late a date as the 4th of January last. Since that time it is probable many applications have been made to the War Department for pensions; and there are, also, from the best judgment the committee can form from the papers now before them, from 80 to 100 cases which will be added to the number during the present session. What number springing out of the late war remains to be presented cannot be stated. The committee, however, deem it proper to observe that the Revolutionary cases, compose the great mass of those already on the list which, from the course of nature, cannot very long remain a charge on the Government. The very circumstance of the advanced age of most of the pensioners, and the consequent diminution of their ability to add much by their personal exertions to their own support, seems to strengthen their claim to an increase of pensions. The pensions now allowed to captains, and those above that rank, the committee think are sufficient to discharge the obligations of gratitude and duty which the Government owe them, and to place them not only above actual want, but in tolerable comfort. They, therefore, do not deem it necessary to increase their pensions; but as this is not the case with the other officers and soldiers, they deem it proper to recommend to the House to increase their pensions so as to allow to them the following sums, per month, in lieu of those to which they are now entitled, viz:

To a first lieutenant	-	-	-	$17 00
To a second lieutenant	-	-	-	15 00
To a third lieutenant	-	-	-	14 00
To an ensign	-	-	-	13 00
To each private	-	-	-	8 00

For the highest degree of disability, and for all less degrees, a sum proportionably less. The effect of this would be an increase of sixty per cent. on the pensions of the soldiers, and about an average increase of twenty-one per cent. on the pensions of the officers, and would require about the sum of $200,000 per annum.

The committee do not deem it necessary to recommend any alterations in the laws relating to the proof necessary to place the officers and soldiers of the militia on the pension list, other than to put them on the same footing in that regard with the officers and soldiers of the regular army. The rules at present prescribed for that purpose are not more rigid than is necessary to guard with sufficient care against frauds on the Government, and, as these rules have been long established, they are known to the public in some degree, and will be acted on; whereas, if new ones were established, they would, perhaps, only tend to confuse without benefitting the applicant. To effect the above object, they report a bill.

COMPENSATION OF MEMBERS.

The engrossed bill to change the mode of compensation to the members of Congress, was read the third time, and the question stated, "Shall the bill pass?"

Mr. WRIGHT said, intending to vote for the increase of the compensation to members, I shall vote for this bill to effect that object, so necessary to preserve a republican representation in Congress of honest, independent, and honorable men; and, although I might prefer the mere increase of the daily wages, without converting it into an annual compensation, yet, sir, I am satisfied with the act of a majority in the change, and bound to admit that the strong reasons assigned by the friends of that measure are entitled to great weight, and satisfactorily justified by the provision of the bill to deduct a rateable proportion of the salary for every day's absence from Congress, during its sessions. Sir, the denunciation in the public prints of the dilatory proceedings of Congress, and the long speeches of its members, for the purpose of prolonging the sessions, and increasing the compensation of its members, was as devoid of truth, as it was offensive to the honorable feelings of the Representatives of the people. And it is a well-known fact, that many of the most valuable members of Congress, balancing between the painful separation from their families and the great expense beyond the means of men of moderate fortunes to sustain, had retired, and many more had contemplated it. It may not be extraordinary to find men of wealth, such as the honorable gentleman, (Mr. HUGER,) opposed to the increase of the compensation. It is by such means, Mr. Speaker, that the men of wealth, who alone possess the funds to support them here, will by this indirectly work out men of moderate fortunes, and thereby lead to the most dangerous consequences; as the Government, once in the hands exclusively of the wealthy, would render insecure the rights of the common people, and endanger the happiness of the Republic. Sir, the devotion of Congress to their duty at the last session—having omitted to sit but one Saturday during the session, and having sat every day till near night; and, sir, the like conduct during this session, having practised the same assiduity when sitting on the six-dollar compensation—must satisfy every one of the wickedness of the said denunciation, so offensive to us all; and that, when our time is our own, and the compensation graduated by our diligence, that it will insure it by the strongest ties—the interest of the individuals—and that the public business will more expeditiously be performed, and the other expenses of the session decreased equal to the augmentation of the compensation to the members; so that the public will profit by the change. Sir, I, as a Representative of Maryland, feel no difficulty as to my vote on this subject. Indeed, sir, I feel in a certain degree instructed on the subject. Sir, prior to the adoption of the present Constitution, under the Confederation, the States fixed the compensation of their respective members of Congress, and paid their own members. Then, sir, the State of Maryland, gave her members of Congress eight dollars per day for their services, and paid the same in gold or silver. So that Congress, from the establishment of the present compensation, were in the receipt of two dollars per day less than the State of Maryland by her law gave her members for the same services upwards of thirty years ago, and when that compensation would purchase double what it would at this time of any of the articles necessary for the comfort or accommodation of the members. Again, sir, the compensation of a member of the Legislature of Maryland, at the time eight dollars was allowed to a member of Congress, was not more than two dollars; but now, sir, the sum of four dollars is the compensation allowed by the State of Maryland to the members of the State Legislature, as I understand. Thus sir, I show what was the former compensation to the members of Congress, and to the members of the State Legislature; and I show that that Legislature has doubled the compensation to its members, which I might surely consider as instruction to increase the compensation of members of Congress in the same ratio, which would greatly exceed the compensation proposed by the bill now under consideration to be given to the members, and I have no doubt would justify me with my constituents, who know the sacrifices I have made on the altar of the Republic; many of whom, I am sure, would be glad to see me in official receipt of twenty-five thousand dollars, and can never be induced to find fault with my vote. I, sir, shall not be governed by popular motives in opposing this measure, as the purest principles of distributive justice command it; nor shall I suffer the affectation of delicacy to overrule my judgment, in this case, because I am interested. If it is right, it ought to be done; if it ought to be done, it must be done by Congress, who alone can do it. Nor, sir, can I feel a propriety in giving it a prospective operation, in exclusion of the present Congress. If it is proper as to them, it is surely proper as to ourselves; and a moment's reflection shows that most of the same members will be re-elected, so that the veil of delicacy would be too thin to conceal the views of members to provide for themselves, though in future.

Sir, what would be the feelings of honorable men towards the highly honorable mover of this bill, (Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky,) who slew Tecumseh with his own hands; who came up here covered with wounds and glory, with his favorite war-horse, and his more favorite servant—his attendant in the army, his nurse and necessary assistant;—being unable to do anything for himself at the close of the session; being obliged to sell his war-horse or his servant to close his accounts, or to have recourse to his private funds to clear him out? That this may not be considered an exaggerated account, let any gentleman with two horses and a servant try the case by one week's residence at Crawford's at Georgetown, where many members reside, or Mr. Gadsby's in Baltimore, and live in the style of a gentleman, and he will give unequivocal proof of the reality of such an alternative.

Sir, if we go back to those times when the Legislature of Maryland fixed the compensation of eight dollars to members of Congress, and two dollars to the State Legislature, you will find them halcyon days, when for that compensation they lived like gentlemen, and enjoyed a glass of generous wine, which cannot be afforded at this time for the present compensation.

Mr. Speaker, I hope this bill will pass, and that honorable gentlemen who consider it unjust to put their hands into the public Treasury for themselves will be excused from taking this increased compensation, particularly when it might subject them to the unkind remark that the receiver was as bad as the thief.

Mr. HUGER again rose in opposition to the bill, and argued to prove that the proposed change was in effect an increase of compensation of one hundred and fifty per cent., which, under the present circumstances of the Government, while encumbered with an immense public debt, he decidedly condemned. Mr. H. closed a long speech, by moving to postpone the bill to December next, of course to reject it.

Mr. GROSVENOR replied to Mr. HUGER, and advocated the bill. The Constitution, he said, had provided that Congress should fix its own compensation, and he was opposed to postponement. He maintained that the pay was inadequate to the comfortable subsistence of the members; and it never was intended that they should come here to live on hominy and molasses in hovels, but to live like gentlemen. He wished not to put the seats in Congress up to the lowest bidder, but to induce those best qualified to fill them; and would make such a compensation as would enable the poorest man to come here. The reverse of this, he said, would be anti-republican, and tend to bring those only of wealth.

Mr. RANDOLPH said he was sorry to see the time and talents of his friend (Mr. GROSVENOR) misapplied, in answering the objections of the gentleman, (Mr. HUGER,) and was surprised at the gentleman (Mr. HUGER) persisting in his course, after the good advice he had taken the liberty of giving him yesterday, though he could not say that he had followed it himself. Mr. R. said he now began to desecry, through the fog of debate, the latitude of the gentleman's arguments—the speeches were perhaps intended to meet his constituents. He scouted the idea of plastering over a vote for the taxes by saving this miserable pepper corn to the Treasury. The gentleman had advised us to go home and consult our constituents. Consult them for what? For four-pence-half-penny? Instead of receiving instructions from his constituents on this subject, Mr. R. said he should instruct them. He was an enemy, he said, to that self-denying principle which had given rise to the great military usurpation in England, which in the revolution was one of the chief agents in the hands of that hypocritical demagogue—a man whose talents almost redeemed his vices—commonly called Oliver Cromwell. Mr. R. adverted to the salaries of other officers of our Government, of whom even many clerks and doorkeepers received more than the members of Congress, and said that Congress was the only branch of the Government whose compensation had not been increased; so that they could at least say they had not began with themselves. This, said he, we have let alone until the gentleman from Kentucky, (Mr. JOHNSON,) with a gallantry that belongs to him, flung himself into the breach to repair it or perish in it. Another argument in favor of a liberal salary was, that it is the only way to counteract Executive influence in this House—not the necessary and proper influence—by placing every member above the temptation of office, &c. Mr. R. said his only objection to the bill was that it had not made the compensation $2,500, instead of $1,500; then a man might come here with a prospect of something like the comforts of home. At present all the charities of life were broken by it; wife, children, and family were all abandoned. He would also advert, though it was a subject of some delicacy, to the demoralizing effect of being separated from home for six months in the year. Nullius in verba magistri; he hoped the gentleman (Mr. HUGER) would pardon him for quoting Latin in that House. Mr. R. concluded by saying that the honorable gentleman (Mr. HUGER) had greatly mistaken the powers of his logic and eloquence if he supposed the bill could be overturned by them.

Mr. CALHOUN said, so far as this bill proposed to increase the compensation to members, he was in favor of it, because he thought the present pay very inadequate to the dignity of the station, and far short of the time, labor, and sacrifice required. He thought $1,500 would be found not sufficient, and would prefer, on the ground of a due compensation, as well as regard to principle, $2,500. He said on principle, for in the fixing the pay of members heretofore, it had not been sufficiently attended to. Our extent, population, and wealth made a strong Executive necessary; and we accordingly find the framers of our Constitution have made that the preponderating part of our Government. It constitutes a branch of the Legislature, and has besides the whole patronage of Government, while the other branches have naked power only, without patronage or influence. He did not complain of any undue influence of Executive power now; he wished not to be so understood, as he was speaking solely in relation to the Constitutional powers of the President. The best and wisest men in this country have always thought his power so great as to render it ultimately dangerous. What then is to be done? To weaken it, would be to weaken the country; perhaps to endanger it. The only safe control is in the character, experience, and intelligence of this House. Whenever this House is properly composed, when it contains a sufficient number of men of ability, experience, and integrity, it of necessity will give direction to public affairs; but a weak and inexperienced House necessarily falls under Executive control. The increased pay is calculated to draw men of abilities into this House; and, what is of equal importance, to keep them here until they are matured by experience. What is the usual fact? Young men of genius, without property, for in four instances in five, such is the case with genius, are elected; being tempted into public service by the honorable desire of acquiring distinction in the service of the country; they remain here until they have acquired some experience, and begin to be useful to the country; but are finally compelled to return to private life from the inadequacy of the pay. It is a great public misfortune; it is highly injurious to the proceedings of this House. Ever since he had known the body, there had been no want of talent; but the want of experience had often been felt. If we are wise, we will, as far as possible, attract and secure ability and integrity in the public service. Providence intended them, as the best gift to the nation, for that purpose; and any people, as they use or neglect them, flourish or decay. Another view of this subject, connected with the great extent of our Republic, made it expedient. A majority of the members come from three to eight hundred miles. In serving the country, they are not only obliged to be absent a great part of the year from their families; but what is almost equally distressing, to be absent a great distance. We serve at the expense of the best sympathies of our nature; we are far removed from the centre of that system of social feelings, which at once constitutes the solace and ornament of our nature. The best dispositions are the most sensible to this sacrifice; and are by it most likely to be driven out of the councils of the nation. This state of things ought to be counteracted as far as possible; the condition of a member ought to be made more desirable than at present; he ought at least to be able to have his family about him, which he cannot, at the present pay, without ruin, unless he be a man of property. For these reasons he thought the measure a wise one, and to be highly republican. It had for a long time been felt to be necessary. It was worthy of the disinterested gallantry of the member who had introduced it.

Mr. KING, of Massachusetts, was in favor of the bill, because it would shorten the sessions of Congress. If the measure was necessary at all, he asked if it was not as necessary for the present as a future Congress? For one, he was not afraid to trust himself in making compensation; besides, he said, the country had extended and increased many millions in population; and the weight and responsibility of the members had increased in proportion; those of the Speaker in a double proportion. Mr. K. said he knew not the sentiments of his constituents on this subject, nor was he bound to know them; but he was not afraid to say, that they ought never to send a person to Congress who deserved not this sum; and if their present Representatives did not, they would have an opportunity to correct the procedure. He maintained that the Representative of thirty-five thousand high-minded people ought to have enough to live as such a man ought to live. Gentlemen had boasted of their wealth, and perhaps thought that a little cider and brown bread would do for such as had no resources beyond their pay. Mr. K. was in favor of the yeas and nays, that the gentleman might have an opportunity, if he believed he had not earned his pay, to put it on record, and let his constituents know it. Some of us, said Mr. K., are poor men; we cannot keep here, to follow us about, two or three servants, two or three horses, and two or three dogs; but we desire to live as befits our station, without loss, &c.

Mr. ROSS said, from the arguments of those in favor of the bill, it would appear, that it required more firmness to act on this than on any other question. Mr. R. defended himself from the opprobrious epithets which had been heaped on those who were too cowardly to vote for this bill. He was not satisfied that the bill would be attended with the beneficial effects predicted to this House, and to the public business. He could not expect more talents than were assembled in the present Congress, which had not been excelled since the first. They did not come here for pay; he whose mind ran on the grovelling idea of his pay, would here feel the same sordid sentiments, and would be looking for further promotion. Mr. R. thought the consequence of giving a large salary would be to prompt adventurers to get into this House, while the man of intelligence, worthy of serving, would find employment in his avocations at home. He, therefore, saw this measure in a very different light. As to the Speaker's salary, that was fixed higher, because of his duties in the House, and because it was supposed he ought to become better acquainted with the members, that he might know which were fit for the various situations, and to acquire that knowledge, it was necessary he should entertain them; but since Jupiter Tonans (alluding to the former Speaker, Mr. DAYTON,) took the Chair, the practice of giving dinners had ceased, it being thought that he could distinguish by intuition the qualifications of members. Mr. R. concluded some further remarks, by demanding the yeas and nays.

Mr. RANDOLPH rose to explain.—It might be inferred perhaps, from what he had said, that he thought the Speaker of the House and President of the Senate received enough. I should, said Mr. R., have liked the bill better if it had given them five thousand dollars each; they were great officers of the State; they might be President of the United States. The miserable creature who was generally appointed Vice President, was selected merely because he was totally unfit for the Presidency; but he begged pardon of the House, as the office was now vacant: but the Speaker of this House was much more proper for President of the United States than the character who was usually Vice President. The Speaker, he thought, ought be enabled to take a house and reside here, as a great officer should do. Mr. R. replied further to Mr. HUGER's arguments; and concluded by saying, he did not think those who opposed the bill so violently, ought to accept the additional compensation; for his part, he would as soon be caught with his hands in a gentleman's pocket, as receiving the pay after saying so much against it.

Mr. HOPKINSON thought the gentleman (Mr. JOHNSON) who had began this warfare, was entitled to the support of all who approved the bill, and for that it was he rose. The principle being conceded that the Representatives are entitled to compensation, the question was, what ought that compensation to be? On this question, Mr. H. said, he would meet gentlemen on fair grounds; not those of popularity. The rule proper in deciding this question was, justice to ourselves, not extravagance. If on the one hand, we do not come here to make money, how can the country expect us to come to make sacrifices? The truth is, we ought to be allowed to come here without any great sacrifice, and every one be enabled to live in the style that he does at home. He spoke what all hearts would acknowledge, that the comforts of home and family were superior to what could be found here. The intervals between the daily sessions were spent in gloomy and solitary meditation, or in dissipation. This, he said, would not be the case, if we were enabled to bring a part at least of our families with us. He thought men ought not to be driven from their seats here for want of suitable support. There were, at the present session, eighty new members in this House. Such great changes must produce a fluctuation of councils and of system. Legislation, said Mr. H., requires experience as well as any other avocation; as well might a man attempt the lawyer without reading or learning. He maintained, that the compensation, as fixed by the former Congress, was greater than what was now proposed. Six dollars a day was even then expected to be something more than sufficient for the expenses of the members. It was reasonable that their expenses should be less at that time than they are now. Mr. H. thought if they consulted what was strictly and justly due to themselves, the bill would and ought to pass.

Mr. TUCKER said, that as the yeas and nays were called on the passage of the bill, he felt it his duty to state, in a few words, the reasons which induced him to vote against it in committee and would lead him to adhere to that vote. He did so because he did not wish to shrink from a candid expression of his opinion. He believed with many others that the pay of members of Congress ought to be such as to enable, not the rich only, but men of merit, (however moderate their circumstances) to take a seat in this House. It was the true Republican principle; for otherwise the Government would degenerate into an aristocracy. But though such were his opinions on this subject, without deciding whether a per diem allowance or annual compensation were preferable, he could not vote for any bill which gave additional compensation to himself. He had been elected under the expectation of receiving six dollars per day for his services; he could not think himself justified in increasing it. Gentlemen had termed this a squeamish delicacy. He had from his childhood been taught on all occasions of this kind that it was safest to err on the side of delicacy. He should therefore vote in the negative, though he would have had no objection to an increase of the allowance to members if its operation were postponed to a future Congress.

Mr. GASTON opposed the bill, not because he thought the pay too high—he believed it not high enough—but because it contemplated a mode radically wrong. He thought the services of members ought to be paid for according to those services, and not by an annual salary. To enforce this opinion, Mr. G. used various arguments. He did not believe the country would be benefitted by facilitating legislation; even if it were true that the bill would produce that effect; which he did not believe; because no Congress, as a body, could ever have protracted the session, and remained here, for the sordid motive supposed. The comforts of home would hasten them away if nothing else. In North Carolina, said Mr. G., from an ill-judged parsimony, the members were not allowed sufficient compensation to defray their expenses, and the effect was that the public business was hurried through improperly. He denied that the compensation of members by an annual stipend would accord with the genius of our Government; and advocated the per diem mode, as preferable in every view which he could take of the subject.

Mr. YANCEY said he would vote with his colleague, (Mr. GASTON,) but for a very different reason. He thought the compensation, and had always thought it, inadequate. A member ought to have enough to compensate him for his services to his constituents and country. If the motion made yesterday to postpone the operation of the bill to the next Congress had prevailed, he would have been willing to vote for two thousand dollars instead of fifteen hundred. He was not afraid of despatching public business too fast, and he believed the proposed measure would produce that effect more than the previous question. Fix a salary, said he, and remove all obstacles to attention in the House, and business would be greatly facilitated. Mr. Y. repeated that, if not applied to the present Congress, he would support the bill, convinced that it was proper. He repelled the possible imputation of voting from an over-nice conscience—he imputed to none the desire to run after an unworthy popularity, and he should not incur such a suspicion himself.

Mr. CULPEPER said, that believing with his colleague (Mr. YANCEY) that the measure was right, he should vote for it now; because if not applied to the present Congress, he did not know that it would ever do any good. He thought its immediate operation was the best part of the plan, and he should therefore vote for it.

Mr. SHARPE wished publicly to express his gratitude to his friend and colleague (Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky) for bringing forward the proposition; and he was willing to go even further. The Constitution had provided that the compensation of Congress should be fixed by law, and if this measure was right, as had been conceded, was it proper to postpone its application to a succeeding Congress? One word, he said, as to the propriety of the compensation. If gentlemen wished to arrive at civilization it was not by imitating savage life. The American people ought to be known by another principle, and be distinguished as well for dignity of character, liberality, and civilization, as for the wisdom of their political institutions. The same solicitude ought to be felt in legislation to cherish talent, and to employ it, as in other branches of the Government.

The question was then put, on the passage of the bill, and decided in the affirmative—ayes 81, noes 67, as follows:

SATURDAY, March 9.

Mr. LOWNDES, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported a bill to repeal the act entitled "An act to provide additional revenues for defraying the expenses of Government and maintaining the public credit, by laying duties on household furniture, and on gold and silver watches;" which was read twice, and committed to the Committee of the Whole on the report of the Committee of Ways and Means upon the subject of revenue.

Mr. LOWNDES also reported a bill to abolish the existing duties on spirits distilled within the United States, and to lay other duties in lieu of those at present imposed on licenses to distillers of spirituous liquors; which was read twice and committed to the Committee of the Whole last mentioned.

On motion of Mr. INGHAM, the Secretary of the Treasury was directed to report to the next session of Congress whether any, and, if any, what alterations are necessary to equalize the duty on the capacity of stills, boilers, and other implements used in distillation.

On motion of Mr. LOWNDES, the Committee of Ways and Means were instructed to inquire into the expediency of exempting from the payment of duties, the carriage of His Excellency Mr. Gore, Governor of the British Province of Upper Canada, who landed at New York and passed through the State of New York, in the month of August or September last, on his way to his Government.

The bill from the Senate "in addition to the act entitled 'An act concerning the Navy Pension Fund,'" was read twice and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. JACKSON, from the committee to whom was referred the bill from the Senate "to extend certain privileges as therein mentioned to Bernard Edme Verjon," reported the same with amendments; which were read and agreed to, and ordered to be engrossed, and the bill read the third time on Monday next.

An engrossed bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Gustavus Loomis," was read the third time and passed.

NATIONAL BANK.

The intervening orders of the day were postponed, and the House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the National Bank bill.

Mr. CADY offered an amendment to prevent the establishment of more than one branch of the bank in any one State.

The motion was opposed by Messrs. CALHOUN, BRADBURY, and WRIGHT; and supported by Messrs. CADY and CULPEPER; and then negatived without a division.

After some unimportant amendment, and the bill having been gone through, the question was stated on the Committee's rising and reporting it to the House, when Mr. CLAY rose and delivered at length his sentiments in favor of the bill, its principle and details.

A desultory debate followed, between Mr. JACKSON, Mr. CLAY, and Mr. RANDOLPH, on one or two points of Mr. CLAY's arguments—Mr. RANDOLPH touching incidentally on the bill itself.

After which, the Committee rose and reported progress.

[The speech delivered on this occasion, by Mr. CLAY, appears not to have been reported, and, of course, cannot be inserted as uttered in the House; but, after the return of Mr. C. to Kentucky, he made an address to his constituents, in which he gave the substance of it, as follows:]

On one subject, that of the Bank of the United States, to which, at the late session of Congress, he gave his humble support, Mr. CLAY felt particularly anxious to explain the grounds on which he had acted. This explanation, if not due to his own character, the State and the district to which he belonged had a right to demand. It would have been unnecessary if his observations, addressed to the House of Representatives pending the measure, had been published; but they were not published, and why they were not published he was unadvised.

When he was a member of the Senate of the United States, he was induced to oppose the renewal of the charter to the old Bank of the United States, by three general considerations: The first was, that he was instructed to oppose it by the Legislature of the State. What were the reasons that operated with the Legislature, in giving the instruction, he did not know. He had understood from members of that body, at the time it was given, that a clause, declaring that Congress had no power to grant the charter, was stricken out; from which it might be inferred, either that the Legislature did not believe a bank to be unconstitutional, or that it had formed no opinion on that point. This inference derives additional strength from the fact, that, although the two late Senators from this State, as well as the present Senators, voted for a National Bank, the Legislature, which must have been well apprized that such a measure was in contemplation, did not again interpose, either to protest against the measure itself, or to censure the conduct of those Senators. From this silence, on the part of a body which has ever fixed a watchful eye upon the proceedings of the General Government, he had a right to believe that the Legislature of Kentucky saw, without dissatisfaction, the proposal to establish a National Bank; and that its opposition to the former one was upon grounds of expediency, applicable to that corporation alone, or no longer existing. But when, at the last session, the question came up as to the establishment of a National Bank, being a member of the House of Representatives, the point of inquiry with him was, not so much what was the opinion of the Legislature, although, undoubtedly, the opinion of a body so respectable would have great weight with him under any circumstances, as what were the sentiments of his immediate constituents. These he believed to be in favor of such an institution, from the following circumstances: In the first place, his predecessor (Mr. HAWKINS) voted for a National Bank, without the slightest murmur of discontent. Secondly, during the last Fall, when he was in his district, he conversed freely with many of his constituents upon that subject, then the most common topic of conversation, and all, without a single exception, as far as he recollected, agreed that it was a desirable, if not the only efficient remedy for the alarming evils in the currency of the country.

And, lastly, during the session he received many letters from his constituents, prior to the passage of the bill, all of which concurred, he believed, without a solitary exception, in advising the measure. So far, then, from being instructed by his district to oppose the bank, he had what was perhaps, tantamount to an instruction to support it—the acquiescence of his constituents in the vote of their former Representative, and the communications, oral and written, of the opinions of them in favor of a bank.

The next consideration which induced him to oppose the renewal of the old charter, was, that he believed the corporation had, during a portion of the period of its existence, abused its powers, and had sought to subserve the views of a political party. Instances of its oppression, for that purpose, were asserted to have occurred at Philadelphia and at Charleston; and, although denied in Congress by the friends of the institution, during the discussions on the application for the renewal of the charter, they were, in his judgment, satisfactorily made out. This oppression, indeed, was admitted in the House of Representatives, in the debate on the present bank, by a distinguished member of that party which had so warmly espoused the renewal of the old charter. It may be said, what security is there that the new bank will not imitate this example of oppression? He answered, the fate of the old bank—warning all similar institutions to shun politics, with which they ought not to have any concern; the existence of abundant competition, arising from the great multiplication of banks, and the precautions which are to be found in the details of the present bill.

A third consideration upon which he acted in 1811 was, that, as the power to create a corporation, such as was proposed to be continued, was not specifically granted in the Constitution, and did not then appear to him to be necessary to carry into effect any of the powers which were specifically granted, Congress was not authorized to continue the bank. The Constitution, he said, contained powers delegated and prohibitory—powers expressed and constructive. It vests in Congress all powers necessary to give effect to enumerated powers; all that may be necessary to put into motion and activity the machine of Government which it constructs. The powers that may be so necessary, are deducible by construction; they are not defined in the Constitution; they are, from their nature, indefinable. When the question is in relation to one of these powers, the point of inquiry should be, is its exertion necessary to carry into effect any of the enumerated powers and objects of the General Government? With regard to the degree of necessity, various rules have been, at different times, laid down; but, perhaps, at last there is no other than a sound and honest judgment exercised under the checks and control which belong to the Constitution and the people.

The constructive powers being auxiliary to the specifically granted powers, and depending for their sanction and existence upon a necessity to give effect to the latter, which necessity is to be sought for and ascertained by a sound and honest discretion, it is manifest that this necessity may not be perceived, at one time, under one state of things, when it is perceived, at another time, under a different state of things. The Constitution, it is true, never changes—it is always the same; but the force of circumstances, and the lights of experience, may evolve to the fallible persons charged with its administration, the fitness and necessity of a particular exercise of constructive power to-day, which they did not see at a former period.

Mr. C. proceeded to remark, that, when the application was made to renew the old charter of the Bank of the United States, such an institution did not appear to him to be so necessary to the fulfilment of many of the objects specifically enumerated in the Constitution, as to justify Congress in assuming, by construction, a power to establish it; it was supported mainly upon the ground that it was indispensable to the Treasury operations. But the local institutions in the several States were, at that time, in prosperous existence, confided in by the community, having a confidence in each other, and maintaining an intercourse and connexion the most intimate. Many of them were actually employed by the Treasury, to aid that Department in a part of its fiscal arrangements; and they appeared to him to be fully capable of affording to it all the facility that it ought to desire in all of them. They superseded, in his judgment, the necessity of a national institution. But how stood the case in 1816, when he was called upon again to examine the power of the General Government to incorporate a National Bank? A total change of circumstances was presented—events of the utmost magnitude had intervened.

A general suspension of specie payments had taken place, and this had led to a train of consequences of the most alarming nature. He beheld, dispersed over the immense extent of the United States, about three hundred banking institutions, enjoying, in different degrees, the confidence of the public, shaken as to them all, under no direct control of the General Government, and subject to no actual responsibility to the State authorities. These institutions were emitting the actual currency of the United States; a currency consisting of a paper, on which they neither paid interest nor principal, whilst it was exchanged for the paper of the community, on which both were paid. He saw these institutions, in fact, exercising, what had been considered at all times, and in all countries, one of the highest attributes of sovereignty—the regulation of the current medium of the country. They were no longer competent to assist the Treasury, in either of the great operations of collection, deposit, or distribution of the public revenues. In fact, the paper which they emitted, and which the Treasury, from the force of events, found itself constrained to receive, was constantly obstructing the operations of that Department; for it would accumulate where it was not wanted, and could not be used where it was wanted for the purposes of Government, without a ruinous and arbitrary brokerage. Every man who paid or received from the Government, paid or received as much less than he ought to have done, as was the difference between the medium in which the payment was effected and specie. Taxes were no longer uniform. In New England, where specie payments have not been suspended, the people were called upon to pay larger contributions than where they were suspended. In Kentucky, as much more was paid by the people in their taxes, than was paid, for example, in the State of Ohio, as Kentucky paper was worth more than Ohio paper.

It appeared to Mr. C. that, in this condition of things, the General Government could depend no longer upon these local institutions, multiplied and multiplying daily; coming into existence by the breath of eighteen State sovereignties, some of which, by a single act of volition, had created twenty or thirty at a time. Even if the resumption of specie payments could have been anticipated, the General Government remaining passive, it did not seem to him that the General Government ought longer to depend upon these local institutions exclusively for aid in its operations; but he did not believe it could be justly so anticipated. It was not the interest of all of them, that the renewal should take place of specie payments; and yet, without concert between all, or most of them, it could not be effected. With regard to those disposed to return to a regular state of things, great difficulties might arise as to the time of its commencement.

Considering, then, that the state of the currency was such, that no thinking man could contemplate it without the most serious alarm; that it threatened general distress, if it did not ultimately lead to convulsion and subversion of the Government, it appeared to him to be the duty of Congress to apply a remedy, if a remedy could be devised. A National Bank, with other auxiliary measures, was proposed as that remedy. Mr. C. said, he determined to examine the question, with as little prejudice as possible arising from his former opinion; he knew that the safest course to him, if he pursued a cold, calculating prudence, was to adhere to that opinion, right or wrong. He was perfectly aware that, if he changed, or seemed to change it, he should expose himself to some censure; but, looking at the subject with the light shed upon it by events happening since the commencement of the war, he could no longer doubt. A bank appeared to him not only necessary, but indispensably necessary, in connexion with another measure, to remedy the evils of which all were but too sensible. He preferred, to the suggestions of the pride of consistency, the evident interests of the community, and determined to throw himself upon their candor and justice. That which appeared to him, in 1811, under the state of things then existing, not to be necessary to the General Government, seemed now to be necessary, under the present state of things. Had he then foreseen what now exists, and no objection had laid against the renewal of the charter, other than that derived from the Constitution, he should have voted for the renewal.

Other provisions of the Constitution but little noticed, if noticed at all, on the discussions in Congress in 1811, would seem to urge that body to exert all its powers to restore to a sound state the money of the country. That instrument confers upon Congress the power to coin money, and to regulate the value of foreign coins; and the States are prohibited to coin money, to emit bills of credit, or to make anything but gold and silver coin a tender in payment of debts. The plain inference is, that the subject of the general currency was intended to be submitted exclusively to the General Government. In point of fact, however, the regulation of the general currency is in the hands of the State Governments, or, which is the same thing, of the banks created by them. Their paper has every quality of money, except that of being made a tender, and even this is imparted to it by some States, in the law, by which a creditor must receive it, or submit to a ruinous suspension of the payment of his debt. It was incumbent upon Congress to recover the control which it had lost over the general currency; the remedy called for was one of caution and moderation, but of firmness. Whether a remedy directly acting upon the banks, and their paper thrown into circulation, was in the power of the General Government or not, neither Congress nor the community were prepared for the application of such a remedy; an indirect remedy, of a milder character, seemed to be furnished by a National Bank. Going into operation with the powerful aid of the Treasury of the United States, he believed it would be highly instrumental in the renewal of specie payments. Coupled with the other measure adopted by Congress for that object, he believed the remedy effectual. The local banks must follow the example which the National Bank would set them, of redeeming their notes by the payment of specie, or their notes will be discredited and put down.

If the Constitution, then, warranted the establishment of a bank, other considerations besides those already mentioned strongly urged it. The want of a general medium is everywhere felt; exchange varies continually, not only between different parts of the Union, but between different parts of the same city. If the paper of a National Bank were not redeemed in specie, it would be much better than the current paper; since, although its value, in comparison with specie, might fluctuate, it would afford an uniform standard.

If political power be incidental to banking operations, there ought, perhaps, to be in the General Government some counterpoise to that which is exerted by the States. Such a counterpoise might not, indeed, be so necessary, if the States exercised the power to incorporate banks equally, or in proportion to their respective populations. But that is not the case. A single State has a banking capital equivalent, or nearly so, to one-fifth of the whole banking capital of the United States. Four States combined have the major part of the banking capital of the United States. In the event of any convulsion, in which the distribution of banking institutions might be important, it may be urged that the mischief would not be alleviated by the creation of a National Bank, since its location must be within one of the States. But, in this respect, the location of the bank is extremely favorable, being in one of the middle States, not likely, from its position, as well as its loyalty, to concur in any scheme for subverting the Government; and a sufficient security against such contingency is to be found in the distribution of branches in different States, acting and reacting upon the parent institution, and upon each other.

MONDAY, March 11.

On motion of Mr. WEBSTER,
Resolved, That it is expedient to provide by law for making the gold coins of England, France, Portugal, and Spain, and the crowns of France, parts of the legal currency of the United States, as rates corresponding with the intrinsic value of such coins, respectively, and that the Committee on the National Currency be instructed to prepare and report a bill accordingly.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a bill "further supplementary to the act, entitled 'An act providing for the indemnification of certain claimants of public lands in the Mississippi Territory.'"

The said bill was read twice, and committed to the Committee on Public Lands.

The SPEAKER laid before the House two communications from the President of the United States, one transmitting the amount of expenses incurred for public buildings, &c., in Washington; and the other a statement of the militia of the United States, according to the latest returns at the Naval Department.

The bill from the Senate "to extend certain privileges, as therein mentioned, to Bernard Edme Verjon," was read the third time as amended, and passed.

Mr. YANCEY, from the Committee of Claims made a report on the petition of Captain John T. Wirt, which was read; when Mr. Y. reported a bill for the relief of John T. Wirt; which was read twice, and ordered to be engrossed and read a third time to-morrow.

Mr. YANCEY also made a report on the petition of Richard Ridgely, Edward Pugh, and Charles W. Hanson, which was read; when Mr. Y. reported a bill for the relief of Richard Ridgely, and others; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. YANCEY also made a report in pursuance of the resolution of the House, of the 25th January, 1816, which was read; when Mr. Y. reported a bill authorizing payment for the county court-house of Hamilton in the State of Ohio; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

The report is as follows:

That, in the month of February, 1814, a detachment of the troops of the United States, under the command of Captain Thomas Ramsay, occupied as barracks the county court-house of Hamilton, in the town of Cincinnati, by permission of the sheriff of the county, there being at that time no other house which they could procure, and the weather being so cold and severe as to require good quarters. It satisfactorily appears to the committee, that, while the court-house was thus occupied, from some uncontrollable accident, fire was communicated to the house, and it was consumed.

The house having been thus in the occupation of the United States, and, in consequence of that, consumed by accident, which no one whose duty it might have been to take care of it could control, it is the opinion of the Committee that the damage sustained in consequence thereof should be paid to the county, to enable them to rebuild the house. They therefore report by bill.

PETITION OF THOMAS KEMP.

Mr. YANCEY also made a report on the petition of Thomas Kemp; which was read and ordered to lie on the table.

The report is as follows:

That, early in the year 1813, the petitioner entered into a contract with the Navy Department to build two sloops-of-war, "the Erie and Ontario," at Baltimore. The sum which was agreed, on the part of the Government, to be given for the vessels was then considered by the petitioner to be adequate to cover the expenses of materials and labor, and afford a sufficient compensation for the undertaking; but he states that, in consequence of the British naval force which soon after came into the Chesapeake, the materials out of which the vessels were built cost him a much larger sum than they otherwise would have done, and that he has sustained a loss of six thousand three hundred and twenty-three dollars, which he prays may be paid him.

In making this contract, there can be no doubt that the petitioner considered he had taken sufficient care of himself; and if it had turned out, upon the completion of the contract, that he had made, beyond a reasonable compensation for his labor, care, and expenses, the sum of money in question, it could not have been expected by the Government that he should have refunded that sum. The contract should be reciprocal. All that can be expected by the Government is, that it should fairly and honestly comply with its engagements. If it should be fortunate enough sometimes to make a profitable contract, it will only by that means supply a deficiency often produced by bad ones. The Committee are of opinion that the petitioner is not entitled to relief, and therefore recommend to the House the following resolution:

Resolved, That the prayer of the petitioner ought not to be granted.

MEMORIAL OF GENERAL HARRISON.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from General William H. Harrison, soliciting an inquiry into the expenditure of public money within the 8th military district, while under his command; which was read.

On a proposition of Mr. McLEAN to refer the letter to a select committee, a short discussion arose, in which Mr. HALL and Mr. WRIGHT supported the propriety of laying it on the table, on the ground that it would be impossible now for a committee to discharge such a duty faithfully; and Mr. McLEAN maintained his own motion. After which the letter was referred to the Committee on Public Expenditures. The letter is as follows:

NORTH BEND, (OHIO,) Dec. 20, 1815.

SIR: I should apologise for this intrusion upon the time of the House of Representatives, if I considered the subject upon which I address them exclusively of a private and personal nature. Although the investigation I solicit is of the utmost importance to myself, it will, I conceive, be readily admitted, that both the national honor and interests are deeply concerned in the result. My object is to obtain an inquiry into the expenditure of public money within the eighth military district whilst under my command, and particularly whatever relates to the supplies of provision by the special commissaries of the United States, and under the contract of Messrs. Orr and Greely. My reasons for making this application, and the particular claim I conceive myself to have upon the indulgence of the House of Representatives, are most respectfully submitted to them through you, sir, in the following statement:

Shortly after the adjournment of Congress, in 1814, I was informed that the honorable Mr. FISK, the chairman of a committee which had been appointed to inquire into some complaints of the army contractors, had declared to one of the Western delegation that documents had been submitted to that committee which were deeply injurious to my public character. I immediately addressed a letter to Mr. FISK, of Vermont, demanding an explanation of this declaration. From the answer of this gentleman, I learned that I had mistaken him for another of the same name, a representative from the State of New York, and who was the chairman of the committee alluded to. To the latter, at the commencement of the last session of Congress, a similar letter was sent. In his answer he denied having used the expressions concerning me which had been attributed to him, but admitted that he had formed an opinion not very favorable to me from the statements which had been made to the committee, supported by authentic documents, chiefly my own letters, all showing a wonderful inconsistency in the orders given to the contractors for supplying the Army with provisions. Being perfectly convinced that these documents were very artful mutilations of my letters to the contractors and the Secretary of War, I transmitted to Mr. FISK, through the honorable Mr. HAWKINS, of Kentucky, all the original letters and papers in my possession relating to the subject of the supplies I had demanded of Orr and Greely. These papers were accompanied by an explanatory statement from me, and a request to Mr. HAWKINS to bring the affair before Congress, should he deem it necessary to the vindication of my character. It was not until very late in the session that Mr. FISK could spare a moment from his public duties to devote to my affair. In the answer, however, with which he honored me, he was pleased to express much satisfaction at the information contained in my memoir, and to add, that "if the documents (which accompanied it) had been exhibited to the committee of investigation they would, he was persuaded, have made an impression upon the minds of that committee different from that produced by the imperfect information which was received." That a committee should have thought proper to investigate the conduct of a general officer commanding an army without his knowing it, and to suffer their minds to receive unfavorable impressions concerning him, upon the imperfect information furnished by his enemies, is, I am persuaded, a novel procedure with the Representatives of the people, who are the guardians of their rights and privileges. I am confident, however, that the committee acted from no previous hostility to me, and I attribute their conduct to inadvertency produced by the pressure of important business at that momentous period of our affairs. It is nevertheless certain, that these impressions of the committee have been communicated to others, and malice and hatred have given them currency in a considerable portion of the Union. To resist this torrent of calumny, I have no alternative but to solicit an investigation. If the granting of this favor is beyond the merits of an officer who has spent the greatest portion of his life in the service of the public, it will be accorded to the claims of the nation, and to the vindication of the honor and character of the country. The annals of the late war will not record the treachery of a second Arnold, but they will give to posterity an instance of military crime scarcely less detestable than that foul blot in our Revolutionary history. If another officer of high rank and trust can be truly charged with a crime so disgraceful as that of peculating upon the funds of his army, it will in the estimation of the world detract largely from the blaze of renown with which the achievements of Brown and Jackson have encircled the nation; and I humbly conceive, that no pains should be spared to ascertain the guilt or innocence of the individual accused. Under the circumstances in which the country was placed in the late war, the diversion of the public funds to individual purposes would have been equally fatal with treason, and merits punishment as severe. For myself, I was well aware that the Treasury could scarcely answer the weighty demands which were made upon it by the Military Department; and knowing, as I well did, the heroic valor of our countrymen, in common with every patriot, I believed that America had no cause of alarm but from the inadequacy of her fiscal arrangements. To some it may appear idle to speak of punishing a man for a military crime who no longer holds a military commission. The right of the Government to do this, however, is in my opinion incontrovertible. The principle being as well settled as any other in relation to the proceedings and jurisdiction of courts martial, which are derived from the "custom of war." It was the practice of all the ancient Republics, and in England, from whence we derive our military as well as our civil common law; the precedent was established in the case of Lord George Sackville, who, for alleged misconduct at the battle of Minden, was brought before a military tribunal and cashiered long after his resignation had been accepted. If, in the inquiry I solicit, anything should appear to create a doubt as to the purity of my conduct in the command of the army that was intrusted to me, let a court martial decide my fate. I promise most solemnly to admit its jurisdiction and abide its decision.

I make this application to the House of Representatives with the fullest confidence that it will not be rejected. It is the only reward I claim for a long course of laborious and faithful service. The greater the latitude which is given to the inquiry, the better shall I like it; and I most respectfully request that it may embrace the following points: Whether any supplies were ever demanded by me of the contractors, Orr and Greely, which were not called for by the state of the army, and warranted by the conditions of their contract. Whether any injustice was done to the said Orr and Greely, by any order given by me to the purchasing or special commissaries of the Army. Whether there is reason to believe that any sentiment of hostility existed in my mind towards the said contractors, and which operated injuriously to their interests, either by forcing them to do what was unnecessary, or withholding from them anything that they had a right to claim. Whether there is any reason to believe that any connexion (other than that which the relations of our commissions necessarily produced) existed between myself and any of the staff officers of the Army. And, generally, whatever relates to the expenditure of public money for the support of the Northwestern army, as far as I may have been concerned.

These points will embrace everything that any but a military tribunal is competent to decide. The inquiry will, I trust, produce a perfect conviction that the measures which were adopted were those alone by which the subsistence of the Army could have been ascertained.

I have forwarded to the Representative of the district in which I live, a number of original documents, with an explanatory statement. These, together with the testimony of Colonel Morrison, late quartermaster general, and Mr. Piatt, late purchasing commissary, both of whom will be at the Seat of Government, will furnish every information necessary to my vindication.

With the highest consideration, I have the honor to be, sir, your humble servant,

WM. HENRY HARRISON,

Late Major General in the U. S. Army.

Honorable SPEAKER of the House of Representatives.

ALLEGED DEFALCATION.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from William Simmons, late Accountant of the War Department, stating certain defalcations and misapplications of public moneys by Colonel James Thomas, late a Quartermaster General in the Army; also certain alleged improper reductions by the Treasury officers, of the amount due by Colonel Thomas to the Government; and a belief that all was not fair, which had prevented the prompt communication of the information called for by the House from the President on the tenth ultimo.

Mr. McKEE moved that the letter be referred to a select committee, with power to send for persons and papers.

This motion produced a debate of considerable scope and duration. Mr. FORSYTH moved that the letter be laid on the table, in which he was supported by Messrs. WRIGHT, SMITH of Maryland, and ALEXANDER; and opposed by Messrs. McKEE, SHEFFEY, STANFORD, GROSVENOR, PITKIN, and HULBERT.

The debate was confined chiefly to the character and motives of Mr. Simmons, the character of Colonel Thomas, &c. It was argued in favor of laying the letter on the table, that information on this subject had already been called for from the proper Department by a resolution of this House, which was hourly expected, and then could be properly acted on; that the letter itself was couched in indecorous and insolent terms, and was not entitled to any respect; that it was improper to countenance individuals in bringing their private quarrels and venting their spleen before Congress; that from the character of the writer his statement ought not to be received as true on his single evidence; and the reference to a committee of such statements so introduced would invite a repetition of such communications; and that the power to send for persons and papers was too great to be lightly granted, &c.

In favor of referring the letter to a select committee, for the purpose of inquiry, it was argued—that every person who came before the House on a public concern, was entitled to a hearing; that an inquiry at a former session had disclosed fraud in the individual accused by Mr. Simmons, and gave color to the charges now made in the letter; that everything calculated to awaken the attention of the House to a subject so important was salutary and ought to be listened to; that the letter contained nothing offensive to decorum; that the character of Mr. Simmons merited no disrespect, and that the character of Colonel Thomas himself required the reference, &c.

On these points the debate was very diffuse; and after it had continued about two hours,

On motion of Mr. McKEE, a resolution was agreed to, creating a committee of five members to inquire into the state of the accounts rendered and settled by James Thomas, late a Deputy Quartermaster, and also to examine all accounts connected therewith, and that said committee have power to send for persons and papers.

Mr. McKEE, Mr. SHEFFEY, Mr. HALL, Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH, and Mr. SAVAGE, were appointed the said committee.

NATIONAL BANK.

The House then resumed the consideration of the Bank bill.

The House successively concurred in the amendments of the Committee of the Whole, without objection, until it reached that which substituted the sum of fifteen dollars as the second cash instalment to the bank, instead of five.

Mr. CALHOUN repeated the objections that he made in the committee to this amendment, and moved that the House disagree thereto, with the view hereafter of making the sum ten dollars.

After a few remarks from Mr. SMITH of Maryland, in justification of the amendment; it was agreed to by the House.

The House then proceeded to that amendment of the committee which restrained the Government from appointing more than three of the directors from any one State.

This amendment was objected to in a few words by Mr. TELFAIR, and opposed also by Mr. ROBERTSON at some length, who wished the clause restored to its original state.

After a few remarks from Mr. SMITH of Maryland, in favor of the amendment, it was concurred in.

The next amendment considered, was that which added the word "native" to a clause of the bill, and thereby excluded from the direction naturalized citizens.

Mr. CALHOUN opposed the adoption of this amendment, on the ground formerly stated; and Mr. RANDOLPH again advocated it in a short speech; when

The decision of the committee was reversed, and the word "native" rejected—ayes 44, noes 67.

On motion of Mr. WEBSTER, the bill was then so amended, after a short discussion, in which Mr. SMITH of Maryland opposed the motion, as to make it equally compulsory and penal on the bank to pay its deposits in specie, as its notes or bills.

When the House arrived at the amendment providing sanctions for compelling the bank to perform its engagements—

Mr. WHICHR made a motion substantially to strike out the clause which makes the charter forfeitable, in case of the non-payment of specie, and thereby leave only the penalty of paying ten per cent. on their notes if not so paid.

A debate commenced on this motion, which continued until near 5 o'clock, without a decision, when the House adjourned.

TUESDAY, March 12.

Mr. CLOPTON presented a petition of sundry inhabitants of the city of Richmond, in Virginia, praying that, if the National Bank should be established, a branch thereof may be fixed in the said city.—Laid on the table.

Mr. LOWNDES, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported a bill to regulate the duties on imports and tonnage and to provide suitable buildings for transacting the business of the customs; which was read twice, and committed to the Committee upon the subject of Revenue.

Mr. ROBERTSON, from the Committee on Public Lands, reported the bill from the Senate, "relating to settlers on the public lands, without amendment;" and the bill was committed to a Committee of the Whole to-morrow.

On motion of Mr. TAYLOR, of New York, the Committee of Ways and Means were instructed to inquire into the expediency of making provision by law for the renewal of defaced Treasury notes.

On motion of Mr. COMSTOCK, the Committee on Pensions and Revolutionary Claims were instructed to inquire into the propriety of augmenting the pensions allowed by law to those private soldiers who have suffered the amputation of either of their arms or legs, by reason of wounds received in the service during the late war.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a report from the Secretary of War, in obedience to the resolution of the House, of the 21st ultimo, respecting the settlement of the claims of several of the States to reimbursement of moneys expended by them in calling out and supporting militia without the sanction of the General Government; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

An engrossed bill, entitled "An act for the relief of John T. Wirt," was read the third time and passed.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a bill "providing for the publication of the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States;" also a bill "concerning the Library of Congress;" in which bills they ask the concurrence of this House.

NATIONAL BANK.

The House proceeded to the order of the day, being the report of the Committee of the Whole, on the National Bank bill. The motion to strike out that part of an amendment reported by the Committee, which makes the charter forfeitable for non-payment of its notes in specie, being still under consideration—

Mr. CALHOUN supported the motion to amend the amendment. It was with much reluctance, Mr. C. said, that he opposed any provision which the House had deemed necessary to perfect the bill; but in the present instance he was compelled to make an objection. The fundamental character of this bank was, that it should pay its notes in gold or silver coin, and a sufficient penalty was provided to effect that end. It is a good rule in law, said Mr. C., that where you attach a separate penalty to a particular violation of a law, you weaken the general penalty; and, as he thought the general penalty would attach in the case without this special provision, which would, therefore, weaken the general sanctions of the bill, he hoped it would be stricken out.

The motion to amend the amendment was agreed to without a division.

Mr. RANDOLPH then moved to amend the amendment of the Committee, by making the interest demandable on the notes of the bank, in case of refusal to pay specie, twenty per cent. instead of ten.

Mr. CALHOUN repeated the reluctance with which he objected to any motion which, in the opinion of the gentleman who made it, would improve the bill; but he thought that even the propriety of ten per cent. contemplated by the bill was very questionable, as he doubted whether that provision might not produce combinations against the bank, which were so anxiously guarded against. Every man acquainted with the subject knows, that no bank can at all times possess the means of meeting a general run upon it; and he submitted it to the House, whether such a provision as was now proposed would not be dangerous to the institution, by inviting a run upon it, and thereby producing a suspension of payment. He admitted that it was all-important to the benefit anticipated from the bank, that it should pay its notes, at all times, in specie; and he thought that end already secured by other sanctions sufficiently guarded. This bank, said Mr. C., is no more than a part of the commercial community in which it is established, and any embarrassment of the bank must press also on the whole commercial community; that community would be the first to give way in such a case, and this would produce a run on the bank, and compel the stoppage of payment. If the amendment would produce a greater certainty of specie payments, it might be proper; but believing that it might defeat its own object, and produce that which it was intended to guard against, he thought it dangerous.

Mr. WARD, of Massachusetts, was in favor of the amendment. He thought Mr. CALHOUN had overrated the mischiefs which might possibly ensue from its adoption. Mr. W. believed that no person would resort to the penalty, unless where the bank might exceed a temporary refusal to pay its notes. If the bank declined payment for a short time only, there was no person who would peremptorily go to law for the penalty, and there was no danger of the combination predicted. It was his opinion that the provision would be beneficial to the bank, by the character it would give it as a specie bank, the superior consequence which it would of course possess throughout the country, and the great business it would consequently be enabled to do.

Mr. RANDOLPH said, the argument of the gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. CALHOUN,) was a very powerful objection to the principle of the bill, but none against the amendment; it was an argument which he had been keeping in reserve for another stage of the bill. He had no objection to take fifteen per cent. as the penalty, but he preferred twenty for another reason. The flagitious conduct of the banks for some time back, had proven that they could make ten per cent. more than their fair profits; and his object was to make the damages surpass any profits the bank could make by refusing to pay specie. We ought, he said, to remember certain surplusses which the banks on particular occasions distributed, in addition to the declared dividends, and it was proper in this case to guard against speculation of this kind. All banking institutions were alike in their desire to swell their profits to the greatest extent, howsoever correct and virtuous the directors might be in their private characters; and he would guard against every public robber of every grade, whether he be a Governor General of India or a Bagshot highwayman. He would put it out of the power of this bank to commit frauds on the community, without ruin to itself. Let the penalty be ample, said Mr. R.; make the bank a good one, and there is no danger of their being unable always to pay specie.

The question on making the penalty twenty instead of ten per cent. was then negatived.

The House then proceeded with the remaining amendments of the Committee of the Whole; the consideration and decision on which having been completed—

Mr. CALHOUN moved to amend the bill, by fixing the amount of the second cash payment at $10 instead of $5, as it stood in the bill. This being agreed to, and some other minor motions being disposed of—

Mr. WEBSTER moved to amend the clause which declares that the bank may sue and be sued "in all courts whatsoever," by designating the State courts.

Mr. HALL asked, if it would be not better, before this motion was acted on, to inquire a little whether Congress have the power to grant jurisdiction to the State courts, which, in some cases, they had refused to exercise, he thought properly, and the constitutionality of which was very doubtful.

Mr. WEBSTER said, the question was an important one; but this was not the first time Congress had legislated on it, though the courts of Virginia had resisted their jurisdiction. Without, however, discussing the question at present, Mr. W. said, the bill was just as objectionable as it stood, because it gave the bank the power to appear in "all courts whatsoever."

After some further discussion between Messrs. CALHOUN, WRIGHT, WILDE, and GROSVENOR, on the propriety of granting jurisdiction to the State courts specifically, the question was taken, and the amendment adopted.

Mr. ROOR then renewed the motion he had unsuccessfully made in Committee of the Whole, to reduce the rate at which six per cent. stock is to be received in subscriptions to the bank, from par to ninety per cent. Mr. R. repeated briefly his reasons for the motion, and Mr. CALHOUN his objections to it; when, after some remarks in support of it by Mr. ROSS, the question was taken, and decided in the negative—yeas 34, nays 106, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adgate, Baker, Bennett, Betts, Bird-sall, Brooks, Burnside, Caldwell, Chappell, Clopton, Comstock, Crawford, Crocheron, Darlington, Desha, Hahn, Hall, Hammond, Hawes, Lyle, Mayrant, McLean of Ohio, Root, Ross, Savage, Smith of Virginia, Southard, Stanford, Throop, Townsend, Wallace, Ward of New York, Whiteside, and Williams.

NAYS—Messrs. Alexander, Atherton, Baer, Barbour, Bassett, Blount, Boss, Bradbury, Breckenridge, Cady, Calhoun, Cannon, Champion, Cilley, Clarke of North Carolina, Clark of Kentucky, Clendennin, Condict, Conner, Cooper, Creighton, Culpeper, Cuthbert, Davenport, Edwards, Forney, Gaston, Gholson, Gold, Goldsborough, Griffin, Grosvenor, Hale, Hanson, Hardin, Henderson, Herbert, Hopkinson, Hulbert, Hungerford, Ingham, Irving of New York, Jewett, Johnson of Virginia, Kent, Kerr of Virginia, King of Massachusetts, King of North Carolina, Langdon, Law, Lewis, Love, Lovett, Lowndes, Lumpkin, Lyon, Marsh, Mason, McCoy, McKee, McLean of Kentucky, Middleton, Milnor, Moore, Moseley, Murfree, Nelson of Massachusetts, Newton, Noyes, Ormsby, Pickering, Piper, Pitkin, Reed, Robertson, Ruggles, Sergeant, Sharpe, Smith of Pennsylvania, Smith of Maryland, Stearns, Strong, Sturges, Taggart, Tallmadge, Tate, Taylor of New York, Taylor of South Carolina, Telfair, Thomas, Vose, Ward of Massachusetts, Webster, Wendover, Wheaton, Wilcox, Wilde, Wilkin, Thomas Wilson, William Wilson, Woodward, Wright, Yancey, and Yates.

Mr. HALL then moved a new section to the bill, the object of which was to apply the bonus arising to the Government from the incorporation of the bank to the internal improvement of the country; and to avoid any contention about the part of the country in which to commence the work, Mr. H. said he would leave that to the decision of a future Congress. The bonus, he thought, would afford from year to year as much as could be easily employed, and by the end of twenty years, when the charter would expire, the proceeds would have accomplished every object of improvement which would be proper for the General Government to attempt.

National Bank.

Mr. CALHOUN declared his approbation of the object, but feared the adoption of the amendment might drive off some who would otherwise support the bill. Unfortunately for us, he said, there was not a unanimous feeling in favor of internal improvement, some believing this not the proper time to commence that work; and such a provision might deprive the bill of some friends, which at present was the main object of his solicitude.

Mr. HALL thought this the most proper moment for commencing the great work of internal improvement; but if he thought his amendment would draw off any support from the bill, he would not urge it. He believed, however, it would produce a different effect, and would gain friends for the bill, who otherwise would not vote for it. His principal reason for wishing to provide for his object in this bill, was that it would then be sanctioned by a charter, and not revocable, &c.

Mr. GROSVENOR had no objection to the application of the bonus in the way proposed, but he disapproved of providing for the object in this bill. Government might hereafter wish, for various reasons, to get rid of its stock in the bank, but it would be precluded from doing so, if this amendment was adopted. There was no good reason for attaching it to this bill, because if a majority of the House were, as he hoped they were, friendly to internal improvements, they could act on the subject separately.

Mr. WRIGHT and Mr. WILDE successively offered some remarks in favor of the motion.

The amendment was rejected by a considerable majority.

Mr. CONNICT proposed to amend the bill by substituting "New York" for "Philadelphia," in the clause which fixed the location of the bank. It was, Mr. C. remarked, unnecessary to say anything as to the considerations which ought to prevail in fixing a bank for commercial purposes. He would merely remark, that in addition to the superior commerce of New York, the bank in that city would serve the financial purposes of the Government, as well as it could at Philadelphia. In the latter city he believed, moreover, there was already a plenty of bank capital.

Mr. CALHOUN observed that this was a question on which, he presumed, all had made up their minds; and it would be superfluous to say anything on it. He hoped, however, the motion would not prevail. The old Bank of the United States was established at Philadelphia, and he would prefer that city for the present institution.

Mr. ROBERTSON said that Mr. CALHOUN's reason for preferring Philadelphia, if it had any weight at all, operated against himself; for the old bank having been fixed in Philadelphia, was an argument for placing this bank in some other city, that the benefits might not be given to one place alone; besides, if the bank was taken from the Seat of Government, to place it in a more commercial situation, it ought to be fixed in that city which was most commercial. But he had another objection in this case to Philadelphia, and, with him, the strongest one; this was, the hostility of the Representatives of that city to the bank itself. He would not consent to impose upon a place an institution which was so odious to them. &c.

Mr. WRIGHT also spoke in favor of the motion, and incidentally urged the high claims of Baltimore and of Washington city.

Mr. COMSTOCK argued in favor of New York, as possessing superior commercial advantages, and the propriety of selecting that city for a bank intended to aid commercial activity.

The motion to strike out Philadelphia and insert New York was then decided in the affirmative: For the motion 70, against it 64.

Mr. ATHERTON, with a view to restrain attempts to speculate in the stock of the bank, by persons subscribing for more than they could pay for, and selling it afterwards at an advanced price, and to make all the subscriptions bona fide ones, moved substantially to amend the bill by providing that in apportioning the shares, no subscription should be reduced as long as there was on the list a larger subscription.

After a few words from Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, who thought the provision would be ineffectual and was unnecessary, the amendment was adopted—ayes 67, noes 43.

Mr. MAYRANT offered a new section to the bill, the object of which was to allow the five directors appointed by the Government each a salary of — dollars, and to prevent their obtaining any loan or accommodation from the bank.

In support of his proposition, Mr. M. spoke at some length. He adverted to the immense funds of the Government which would pass through this bank, amounting annually to the sum of twenty-five millions, exclusive of the stock owned therein by the Government. We were entering into partnership, he said, with persons unknown to us, and about to place in their hands the immense revenues of the country. It was indispensable, therefore, that the Government should not only have a strong influence in the bank, but its directors ought to be made independent, and, as far as possible, placed beyond the temptation of betraying their trusts; he would make them indeed as independent as the judges. Mr. M. quoted examples from many countries in Europe to prove the necessity of giving the Government greater influence in the bank, which, in none of the instances he cited, had ever been injurious to the prosperity of those institutions.

Mr. CALHOUN replied that his colleague's object could not be effected by his amendment; because, if the directors were precluded from borrowing from the bank, directly, they could borrow in the name and through the medium of some friend. Mr. C. remarked, further, that the salary offered must be very large to induce a commercial man of any standing to forego the benefits of the bank.

Mr. MAYRANT thought a salary of three thousand dollars would be a sufficient inducement to men well qualified for the direction, to relinquish the privilege of borrowing from the bank. After some further observations, in answer to Mr. CALHOUN,

Mr. MAYRANT's motion to amend the bill was negatived, without a division.

The only remaining motion, meriting particular notice, was by Mr. ATHERTON, who moved that the rate at which the 3 per cent. stock shall be received for subscription, shall be reduced from 65 to 50 per cent.

Some debate ensued on this motion, which had not concluded, when the House adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, March 13.

Mr. CHAPPELL, from the Committee on Pensions and Revolutionary Claims, made a report on the petition of Sarah Easton and Dorothy Storer, which was read; when Mr. C. reported a bill for the relief of Sarah Easton and Dorothy Storer; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. SERGEANT, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported a bill further to extend the judicial system of the United States; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

The bill from the Senate, "concerning the Library of Congress," was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

The bill from the Senate, "providing for the publication of the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States," was read twice, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a bill "for the relief of George Rossier, and others," in which they ask the concurrence of this House.

NATIONAL BANK.

The House took up the National Bank bill. Mr. ATHERTON's motion to make the rate of subscribing the three per cent. stock "fifty" instead of "sixty-five," per cent. being still under consideration, this motion was negatived; and Mr. A. subsequently moved to receive the three per cent. at "sixty" instead of "sixty-five" per cent., which was also negatived—88 to 55.

Mr. CLENDENNIN moved to reconsider the vote of yesterday, which fixed the principal bank at the city of New York. This motion produced a debate of some length and considerable animation. Messrs. SMITH, of Maryland, and WRIGHT spoke in favor of the reconsideration, and incidentally urged the claims of Baltimore to the possession of the mother bank. Messrs. HOPKINSON, SERGEANT, CALHOUN, PICKERING, ROSS, and INGHAM, likewise advocated the reconsideration, and the claims of Philadelphia; those who spoke against the reconsideration, and of course in favor of New York, were Messrs. CONDUCT, SOUTHARD, ROOT, TAYLOR, of New York, ROBERTSON, GROSVENOR, GOLD, and HULBERT.

The question was finally decided in the affirmative—yeas 81, nays 65, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Baer, Baker, Barbour, Bassett, Bateman, Blount, Breckenridge, Burnside, Calhoun, Chappell, Cilley, Clayton, Clendennin, Cooper, Crawford, Creighton, Cuthbert, Darlington, Desha, Forney, Forsyth, Gholson, Goldsborough, Goodwyn, Griffin, Hahn, Hale, Hanson, Hawes, Herbert, Hopkinson, Huger, Hungerford, Ingham, Jewett, Kerr of Virginia, King of North Carolina, Lewis, Love, Lowndes, Lumpkin, Lyle, Maclay, Mayrant, McCoy, McKee, McLean of Kentucky, McLean of Ohio, Middleton, Milnor, Moore, Nelson of Va., Newton, Pickens, Pickering, Pinkney, Piper, Randolph, Ross, Sergeant, Sharpe, Smith of Pennsylvania, Smith of Maryland, Smith of Va., Stanford, Taggart, Tate, Taul, Taylor of South Carolina, Telfair, Tucker, Vose, Wallace, Whiteside, Wilcox, Wilde, Thomas Wilson, William Wilson, Woodward, Wright, and Yancey.

NAYS—Messrs. Adgate, Atherton, Betts, Birdsall, Boss, Bradbury, Brown, Cady, Caldwell, Cannon, Champion, Clarke of North Carolina, Clark of Kentucky, Clopton, Comstock, Conduct, Conner, Crocheron, Culpeper, Davenport, Edwards, Gaston, Gold, Grosvenor, Hammond, Hardin, Henderson, Hulbert, Irving of New York, Johnson of Virginia, Kent, Langdon, Law, Lovett, Lyon, Marsh, Mason, Moseley, Murfree, Nelson of Massachusetts, Noyes, Ormsby, Pitkin, Reed, Robertson, Root, Ruggles, Savage, Southard, Stearns, Strong, Sturges, Tallmadge, Taylor of New York, Thomas, Throop, Townsend, Ward of Massachusetts, Ward of New York, Wendover, Wheaton, Wilkin, Williams, Willoughby, and Yates.

Mr. WRIGHT made an unsuccessful motion to substitute Baltimore. And the House then struck out "New York" and replaced "Philadelphia."

Mr. ROOT, after observing that the State of New York possessed a considerable portion of United States three per cent. stock, and wishing, as the Legislature of that State was now in session, if so disposed, to subscribe that stock in the bank, moved to insert the word "States," in the clause permitting companies or corporations to subscribe; which motion was agreed to.

Mr. WRIGHT moved to restore to Congress the power of increasing the capital of the bank to forty-five millions—[the clause which granted to Congress the power of increasing the capital to fifty millions was stricken out, it will be recollected, in Committee of the Whole.] Mr. W. supported his motion with a variety of remarks on the impropriety of tying up the hands of the Government for twenty years, and prohibiting it by charter from legislating according to the growth of our population, the wants of the country, &c. He concluded by requiring the yeas and nays, which were refused; and then his proposition to amend the bill was rejected, only nine or ten rising in its favor.

Some other motions, not requiring particular mention, being disposed of—

Mr. McLEAN, of Kentucky, rose to renew a motion which he had made without success in Committee of the Whole, and which he should not again offer, if he did not conceive that his former attempt was decided under an incorrect view of the subject. Mr. McL. then moved a clause to the bill to prohibit the establishment of a branch of the bank in any State, unless such branch should be accepted by a law of the State. Mr. McL. supported his proposition at some length; showing, by facts, the injury which might result to some States extensively interested in their own banks, by forcing a branch of the National Bank upon them. This was the case in Kentucky, where the State owned a great portion of the stock of the State Bank, which was very prosperous, and its stocks very profitable; and, Mr. McL. said, he was unwilling to put it in the power of any twenty-five men to impose upon that State, without its consent, an institution which might be extremely prejudicial to its interests.

MARCH, 1816.

National Bank.

H. OF R.

Mr. CALHOUN replied briefly, that this motion appeared to involve an inquiry into the Constitutional power of Congress to establish banks in the States. This was a question which he had wished to avoid on the present occasion, and he should decline saying anything on it. When the necessity arose for discussing the question, he should be prepared to meet it.

Mr. McLEAN's motion was negatived.

Mr. PITKIN then proposed to amend the bill, by striking out entirely the provision which gives the President and Senate the power of appointing five of the directors, and thereby leaving the whole direction to be chosen by the corporation.

Mr. P. went into a general investigation of this question, the arguments on which were so fully given when before the Committee. In support of his motion he said, that, with all the interest of the Government in the old Bank of the United States, it appointed none of the directors, yet there was no complaint ever heard of the public concerns being mismanaged by that bank. If there was no necessity for exercising the power in that bank, he argued there was none for it in the present one. Neither the safekeeping of its deposits, nor the care of its interest in the bank, required the Government to possess the power, because there would necessarily always be a close connexion between the bank and the Government, produced by the strongest of motives—interest. If the power, then, was not necessary for any useful purpose, he would not willingly risk any danger from the possibility of the power being converted into an engine of oppression in the hands of the Government. He argued, that it was probable but few directors would be appointed in Philadelphia by the stockholders; that seven being sufficient to do business, and the Government directors being always on the spot, they might frequently constitute a majority of the board, and be able to wield the bank as they pleased. No man, he was confident, would embark his money in a banking concern when one of the partners had the absolute appointment of one-fifth of the directors. Mr. P. concluded by declaring that, if the provision objected to was not stricken out, he should be compelled to vote against the bill.

Mr. CALHOUN rose, not to argue the motion, because it had been fully discussed in Committee, but only to express his regret at the determination declared by Mr. PITKIN. He was aware that great difference of opinion existed on this subject, and that great difficulties must be encountered in maturing its details; but he had begun to hope, from the concessions which had been made, that gentlemen would reconcile their various views, and that the bill would survive the conflicting opinions under which it started. It was, therefore, he regretted to hear Mr. PITKIN declare the direction a sine qua non with him.

After a few words by Mr. PITKIN, stating that he had invariably declared in conversation that this feature was with him a sine qua non, the question was decided in the negative—yeas 54, nays 91, as follows:

Mr. PITKIN then made a motion to reduce the capital of the bank from thirty-five to twenty millions of dollars.

This motion was decided, without debate, in the negative.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH, after a few remarks, moved an amendment to provide that if the Government should at any time sell or relinquish its stock in the bank, it should then cease to have the appointment of any part of the directors; which motion was also negatived.

After rejecting various other propositions to amend the bill, among which was the motion of Mr. WEBSTER to increase the value of the shares to four hundred dollars, and diminish the number to 87,500, the question was taken on ordering the bill to be engrossed, and read a third time, and decided in the affirmative—yeas 82, nays 61, as follows :

The SPEAKER laid before the House two Messages from the President of the United States, one enclosing the documents respecting the public accounts of Colonel James Thomas, called for by the House; and the other a report respecting the Cumberland road; which being severally referred, the House adjourned.

THURSDAY, March 14.

Mr. McLEAN, of Ohio, presented a resolution of the General Assembly of the State of Ohio, requesting that measures may be taken for defining the legal exposition of the conflicting claims to an exclusive use of the late improvements on steamboat navigation, and whether recent improvements made to a discovery that has long been in use can entitle the discoverer to the benefit of a patent agreeably to the Constitution of the United States.—Referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. CREIGHTON, from the Committee on the Public Lands, reported a bill for the relief of William Crawford and Frederick Bates; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole to-morrow.

Mr. SERGEANT, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported a bill for altering the times of holding the circuit and district courts of the district of Vermont; which was read twice, and ordered to be engrossed, and read a third time to-morrow.

Mr. MIDDLETON, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported the bill from the Senate "in addition to an act in relation to the navy pension fund," without amendment; and the bill was committed to a Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a supplemental report of the Secretary of War, in relation to invalid pensions; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions and Revolutionary Claims.

The bill from the Senate "for the relief of George Rossier, and others," was read twice, and committed to the Committee of Ways and Means.

MONUMENT TO WASHINGTON.

Mr. HUGER, from the joint committee appointed on the 16th ultimo, respecting the remains of the late General GEORGE WASHINGTON, made a report containing joint resolutions providing for the erection of a monument to commemorate the virtues of GEORGE WASHINGTON; which were read, and referred to a Committee of the whole House on Saturday next. The report is as follows :

That they have carefully and attentively examined into the subject referred to them, and submit to the consideration of their respective Houses the following resolutions :

Resolved, by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That, in pursuance of the resolution of Congress of the 24th of December, 1799, a marble monument be erected by the United States to commemorate the military, political, and private virtues of GEORGE WASHINGTON.

That the receptacle for his remains be prepared in the foundation of the Capitol, and that the monument be placed over the same, and in the centre of the great hall of the Capitol.

That, on the four sides of the monument, he be represented—

As the defender of his country against the French and Indians in the war before the Revolution.

As the protector of her rights against British invasion, and the Captain of her Armies in the war of independence.

As the first President of the United States wisely administering the public affairs during eight years of peace, other nations being engaged in war.

As a private citizen voluntarily retired from public office, and engaged in the employments of agriculture.

And be it further resolved, That the President of the United States be, and is hereby, authorized to take measures to carry the foregoing resolution into execution.

NATIONAL BANK.

The bill to incorporate the subscribers to the Bank of the United States, was read a third time; and the question stated on the passage of the bill.

Mr. WEBSTER rose to oppose it, declaring that he had long held, and still continued to hold, the opinion that a bank formed upon proper principles would be good for the country, and as a proof of his sincerity, he expressed his wish that the House, by agreeing to strike out the objectionable part of the bill, would justify him in agreeing to the present one. He said, he had two objections to the bill, the first, the unnecessary magnitude of the capital; the other, the vesting Government with the appointment of five of the directors. Of the first, he said, that it was unprecedented; such a capital had never in any country been given to any bank, and he considered that alone as sufficient cause for rejecting the bill, unless its advocates could demonstrate that it was necessary. Besides, the object of the bill being to restore the currency of the country to a proper condition, the remedy necessary was not one to work far hence; it must be speedy, for which this capital would not answer, as it was to come in, only in reversion; it was unalienable, either this year or in the next: and he challenged gentlemen to show that the magnitude of the capital had any necessary connexion with the great object of the bill. Besides, he contended that great danger was to be apprehended from a large capital. He reminded the House that the very gentlemen who were the advocates of this capital, were the same who opposed the old United States Bank, upon the grounds that it would introduce great foreign influence; and insisted that Jay's Treaty was carried by it. Yet the capital of that bank was ten millions only—how then could they now insist upon a capital of thirty-five millions? If then there was danger in one, there was, of course, great danger in the other. The worst feature in this capital he considered to be its connexion with the influence given to Government over the direction of the bank; and to throw a light upon his intention, he said, that if any means could be adopted to take security against that undue influence, he would even now vote for the bill. That, to be useful, a bank must be independent of Government, had long been a maxim—in our own country that maxim was first established by the report of Hamilton, and was ratified by Washington, and the existence and conduct of the United States Bank for twenty-five years confirmed and proved the correctness of the opinion. What, he asked, could be the object of the provision? Gentlemen said it was not to control the bank—and in saying so, he contended that they gave up the argument; for, as to all necessary knowledge of the transactions of the bank that was sufficiently provided for by another provision of the bill. But if not for the purpose of exercising an undue influence in Government over the directors, he asked, what could they want it for. Mr. W. spoke at considerable length.

Mr. GROSVENOR supported the bill, and insisted that the power of appointing directors could not give to Government the influence which Mr. WEBSTER apprehended. Whatever influence those directors created could only be exercised by being backed with the deposits of Government—take away those deposits and the directors were nothing—for they had no control but by the influence of the deposits. As to the amount of capital he never thought it an objection; for, in order to encounter the obnoxious banks, it would be necessary for the National Bank to have a proud and commanding capital; and if it were true, as Mr. WEBSTER himself had said, that more of active capital than seven millions could not be brought into use, the rest would be inoperative and harmless. For his own part Mr. G. should not be afraid of a capital of a hundred millions; for he should deprecate as much as Mr. WEBSTER a real Government bank, because it would not answer the object for which this was intended—for which purpose it must be entirely independent; and he endeavored to prove, by the state of the New York banks, that the Government having a share in the direction was perfectly innocuous.

Mr. HULBERT spoke in favor of the bill.

Mr. CADY spoke as follows:

Mr. Speaker: It has been said, that the greatest evil with which our country is now afflicted, arises from the conduct of the State banks in refusing to pay their debts; and that the hope of gain will deter them for ever resuming a correct course of conduct, unless the Government shall compel them to redeem their bills in specie. And sir, the friends of the bill upon your table insist that it will furnish a remedy for the evil which threatens ruin to our country; that it is absolutely necessary that that bill should become a law in order to enable the Government to coerce the State banks to alter their conduct. But, sir, what security have we that this great National Bank with a capital of thirty-five millions of dollars will, if incorporated, be an engine in the hands of the Government, by which the State banks can be chastised for their past transgressions, and hereafter be constrained to pursue a different course? What security have we that the National Bank will not pursue the same conduct of which we complain in the State banks? It has been truly said, that they are governed by motives of interest, and will never voluntarily redeem their bills. Will not the National Bank be governed by the same motives; will it not pursue that course which promises the greatest profit? Can you hope sir, that the magnitude of its capital will make it honest? It would be as reasonable to calculate that the ferocity of a lion would be decreased as his size was increased. What, sir, are the provisions incorporated in that bill, by which the instinct of the National Bank is to be controlled and the bank compelled to pay its notes? There is but one single provision calculated to have that effect, but what may be found in the charter of every bank in the Union; and that provision, considering the city in which the bank is to be placed, furnishes no security that the National Bank will be more punctual in paying its debts than the State banks. The provision to which I allude is this, that the bank is made liable to pay an interest of twelve per cent. per annum on such of its bills as shall be presented for payment, and payment be refused. What, sir, would be thought of this provision, had it also provided that any person who should prosecute the bank should pay his own costs, which will amount to more than the interest of twelve per cent.? Sir, the provision would be considered useless, it would be deemed a mockery. Yet such is the provision in effect; because this bank can only be sued in the State of Pennsylvania, where the plaintiff must pay all, or nearly all, his own costs. Had the bank been placed in New York, where defendants are obliged to pay the costs of compelling them to do justice, the amount of such costs, and the twelve per cent. interest, would have some influence in inducing the bank to pay its debts. But being placed in Philadelphia the bank will feel protected against its creditors; it will know that no one of its creditors, for any ordinary sum, can prosecute without submitting to a loss. Sir, the bills of this bank are to be circulated in every part of the United States, and no person who resides out of the State of Pennsylvania would think of prosecuting the bank, while he could dispose of its bills for any reasonable discount. We have then no security that the National Bank, if incorporated, will pay its notes, but the probability is, that it will at once adopt the practice of the State banks, and thus render the evils of which we complain almost incurable.

The Secretary of the Treasury in his annual report to us, expressly states in relation to a national currency, as follows: "It is nevertheless 'with the State banks that the measure for restoring the national currency, of gold and silver, must originate; for, until their issues of paper be reduced, their specie capitals be reinstated, and their specie operations be commenced, there will be neither room, nor employment, nor safety for the introduction of the precious metals.'"

It is then the avowed and deliberate opinion of the Secretary of the Treasury, who controls the financial concerns of this country, that this National Bank cannot go into operation and circulate the precious metals with safety, till the State banks resume specie payments. And yet gentlemen on this floor tell us that this National Bank can and must go into operation in order to compel the State banks to pay specie. How can the opinion of the learned Secretary and the declarations of these honorable gentlemen be reconciled? His opinion is, that the diseased state of the national currency must be cured before the National Bank can safely go into operation. They insist that it must go into operation in order to produce that cure. How, sir, is this National Bank either to flatter or compel the State banks to pay specie? To be of any service in this great work of reformation, it must, contrary to the opinion of the Secretary of the Treasury, go into operation surrounded by banks which do not and will not pay specie. It must be able to issue its bills and redeem them with specie. But, sir, from whence is this National Bank to obtain its specie capital of seven millions of dollars? We have been told that in June last all the banks in the United States had but fifteen millions of dollars in specie. From whence, I again ask, is the National Bank to get its specie capital? Can it draw that capital from South America or from Europe? No, sir; its specie capital must be drawn from the vaults of the existing banks, or from the pockets of its individuals. If the vaults of the State banks are to be drained to supply the National Bank with its specie capital, how is that measure to enable them to redeem their bills in specie? If the patient be debilitated and bled to fainting, would you not suspect the sanity of the physician who should insist that more bleeding was necessary, and was the only means of restoring to the patient a full pulse and strength? Sir, the directors of the State banks have wisdom enough to perceive that this great national engine, created to chastise them, will not soon be able to inflict a blow, unless they impart to it strength by giving it their specie. Pass the bill, then, upon your table, and you furnish the State banks with an apology for keeping their vaults shut, to prevent their specie from giving strength to the National Bank. There is, therefore, no hope that the banks which have hitherto refused to pay specie will soon resume such payments. No; self-preservation will dictate to them a different course. But, sir, there are other grounds on which I object to the bill under consideration. This bill gives to the National Bank a power to establish branches, without limit as to number, in every part of the United States. This appears to me an unnecessary and dangerous power. If we at first give to this bank the power to establish one branch in each State, it is enough to answer all the purposes of Government in the collection and distribution of its revenue. If experience shall show that the interests of the country require that this bank should have the power to establish more than one branch in any one State, Congress can hereafter grant to banks that power; but to grant to the bank at this time the power to establish as many branches as its interests may within twenty years dictate, is extremely unwise. No man can foresee the changes which may take place, and the improvements which may be made in this country in the next twenty years. Should this bank ever sell the Government stock, which at first is to form three-fourths of its capital, so as to have in its vaults a specie capital of thirty-five millions of dollars, it will then be able to control all the moneyed operations in this country; its interests and its avarice will dictate to it the establishment of branches in every commercial town in the United States, where banking capital can be used to advantage. I am unwilling this or any other bank should have this power over the State of New York; that State once had the misfortune to have within its bosom a bank claiming such a power. That State, sir, contains many commercial towns in which banking may be carried on profitably; and towns of that character will probably be very much increased, both in number and importance, during the time this bank is to exist; and I will not aid in giving to any class of men who already have accumulated sufficient wealth to become the proprietors of the National Bank, the power for the succeeding twenty years to establish a bank in every commercial town in the State of New York. No, sir, the citizens of that State ought to enjoy all the profits of all the banks within it, other than such as may be necessary to answer the fair purposes of the General Government. When the General Government claims more than this for its favorite bankers, the claim is unreasonable and ought not to be sanctioned.

There is another provision in this bill to which I am opposed. It is that, sir, which gives to the President and Senate of the United States power to appoint five of the directors of the bank. The effect of that provision will be to deter prudent, cautious capitalists from investing their funds in this bank; such men choose to manage their own business in their own way, or to have it managed by agents chosen by themselves, and will not very willingly subject their money to the control or interference of governmental agents. Suppose, sir, we were passing a law to sell a valuable tobacco plantation, but should reserve to the Government the right of appointing the overseer of that plantation: What prudent, cautious capitalist would purchase the plantation thus offered for sale? No man in his senses would make the purchase. Would it be said that the President of the United States, with the aid of the Senate, could not appoint a fit overseer for a tobacco plantation? Certainly, for he is as competent to make such appointment as to appoint the directors of a bank. Yet, sir, no prudent planter would purchase your plantation, unless he was at liberty to appoint the overseer. So, few cautious men will purchase stock in a bank in which the Government are, in any manner, to have an influence in the direction. Men, however, of daring enterprise, who are now loaded with Government stock, may take stock in the proposed bank, under an expectation that they can sell bank stock to more profit than they can sell the stock they now have. In the hands of such men, I do not believe a National Bank will be a national blessing.

Mr. CLORPON said, that he did not intend to detain the House; it was utterly out of his power to do so, if he were ever so willing; the situation of his health would not admit of it; but that he rose merely to enter his protest, in as solemn a manner as he was able, against the doctrine advanced by the gentleman from Maryland (Mr. WRIGHT)—a doctrine which, he believed, had diffused itself extensively among members of this House—that is, that acts of Congress, and the execution of them, determined and settled the Constitutional question as to the right of future legislation upon the objects of those acts, so that when the subject-matter of any former act, which had been regularly executed, should be proposed to this Legislature as the object of a new act, the question whether it be Constitutional or not, was precluded from any further examination, and the Legislature bound to consider the act as authorized by the Constitution. This doctrine he abhorred, and took this occasion to enter his most solemn protest against it.

Sir, said Mr. C., I have been long a member of the House of Representatives. I was a member of it at the gloomiest period of Federal times, and have been during the whole course of the Republican Administration since; and I must say that of all the pernicious doctrines I have ever heard advanced, this, in my view, is one of the most pernicious.

Are gentlemen, said he, whose fancies are tickled with this new idea, apprized of what may be the consequence of deciding and settling Constitutional questions by this standard? Do they not see that a few acts of Congress, affecting the great essential principles of personal liberty and personal property, might destroy everything valuable in the Constitution? We have, said he, already witnessed evil times, and evil times may again occur (I wish they may not be fast approaching) when such acts may be passed. According to this doctrine, the freedom of the press is already gone, for, by this doctrine, you declare that you have a right to revive the Sedition act whenever you please. That act had all the public recognitions spoken of as sanctioning and confirming the validity of the bank act. It was enacted in due form of legislation, carried fully into execution, as a valid law of the land, by judges and by juries, on many grievous and oppressive prosecutions; some of its victims heavily fined, and subjected to long and severe imprisonment; while the whole community submitted to the progress of its operation; and, though a large proportion of the people in some sections of the Union denounced it with expressions of abhorrence, at the same time as large a proportion, perhaps, in some other sections, made no objection to it. Thus it continued in force and operation until the expiration of the term for which it was enacted.

I have said, sir, observed Mr. C., and I feel myself justified in making the declaration, that, according to this doctrine, the freedom of the press is already gone; for, if this doctrine be correct, the Constitutional authority of Congress to revive the Sedition act, or pass a similar one, is established, and the free use of the press is every moment at the mercy of the Legislature. The right no longer exists, if the use can be taken away or restrained, ad libitum, by an act of the Legislature, and if that act is authorized by the Constitution. But, sir, continued he, the doctrine is not correct—it is grossly incorrect—it is an horrible political heresy. It is equally incorrect, equally heretical, applied to this bill.

The consequence of the establishment of such a doctrine as this, said Mr. C., would be that the Constitution itself, the supreme rule, by which all Legislatures acting under it should be governed, and which they are sworn to support, in making their laws, would, in a process of time, be superseded and rendered altogether a dead letter by a series of the acts of those Legislatures; nor would it require that the series be a very long one. What a monstrous doctrine! he exclaimed. He felt himself totally unable to denounce it in terms any way adequate to its enormity. He lamented this inability, this want of physical power to expose it in such a manner as, he believed, it ought to be exposed. Still more did he lament his unfortunate situation, from the circumstance that it had prevented him from entering into a general argument against the bill before them. He had wished to present to the House his views, extensively, on this important subject; but he found himself unable to sustain the fatigue of going through one-twentieth part of the remarks he wished to make; the few he had made in protesting against the shocking, destructive doctrine, just alluded to, had almost entirely exhausted him, and nearly deprived him of the power of respiration.

Messrs. STANFORD, HANSON, and PICKERING, also spoke against the bill, and Mr. CALHOUN concluded the debate by a few remarks in favor of it.

The question was loudly called for during the latter part of the sitting; and, being taken at a late hour, the vote on the passage of the bill was—yeas 80, nays 71, as follows:

FRIDAY, March 15.

Mr. LOWNDES, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported a bill making appropriations for the support of Government for the year 1816; which was read twice, and committed to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. YANCEY, from the Committee of Claims, made a report on the petition of R. S. Reed and D. Dobbins; which was read; when Mr. Y. reported a bill for the relief of Rufus S. Reed and Daniel Dobbins; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. NEWTON, from the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, reported a bill for the relief of David Coffin, Samuel and William Rodman, and Samuel Rodman, junior; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

An engrossed bill, entitled "An act to alter the times of holding the circuit courts of the United States for the district of Vermont," was read the third time, and passed.

The House took up the resolution submitted on the 28th ultimo, by Mr. CONDUCT, and the amendment proposed thereto by Mr. NELSON, of Virginia; whereupon, Mr. NELSON withdrew his said amendment.

Mr. CONDUCT then modified his said resolution so as to read—

"Resolved, That for the residue of the session the stated hour of meeting of this House shall be ten o'clock in the morning."

On the question to agree to the resolution, it was determined in the negative.

The bill for the relief of John Delafield occupied much time in Committee of the Whole, and the Committee having risen, was refused leave to sit again. The bill lies on the table.

The bill making further provision for settling the claims to lands in the Territory of Illinois, was considered, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The bill for the relief of certain claimants to lands in the district of Vincennes, was also considered, and engrossed for a third reading.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill for the relief of John T. David. The bill was reported without amendment, and ordered to lie on the table.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill for the relief of Erastus Loomis. The bill was reported without amendment, and ordered to be engrossed, and read a third time to-morrow.

SATURDAY, March 16.

On motion of Mr. FORNEY, a select committee of five members was appointed to inquire into the expediency of increasing the salary of the Clerk of the House of Representatives. Messrs. FORNEY, PITKIN, CLARK of Kentucky, GASTON, and JACKSON, were appointed the said committee.

An engrossed bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Erastus Loomis," was read the third time, and passed.

An engrossed bill, entitled "An act making further provision for settling claims to land in the Territory of Illinois," was read a third time, and ordered to lie on the table.

An engrossed bill, entitled "An act for the relief of certain claimants to lands in the district of Vincennes," was read the third time, and passed.

The House took up the bill from the Senate "relative to evidence in cases of naturalization." Whereupon the said bill was again read as amended, and passed by the House.

MISSISSIPPI LAND CLAIMS.

The House then went into Committee of the Whole on the bill providing for quieting and adjusting certain claims in the Mississippi Territory.

A motion made by Mr. STRONG, to strike out the first section, produced a good deal of debate on the merits of the bill; from which we extract the following substantial view of the question. After the Treaty of 1783, that is, in 1795, when the United States took possession of the Mississippi country, they found certain settlers on lands who had settled under Spanish grants, issued when Spain was possessed of the country—the United States, without demanding any equivalent therefor, relinquished to those settlers all the right acquired by the Treaty of 1783, but without warranting them in the title; subsequently, however, certain persons holding patents under the British Government set up a claim to these lands, as having the elder title; and the actual settlers, those holding under the Spanish grants, petitioned the United States to examine and decide the claims of the British grantees, and if it be adjudged that they have the stronger title, that their claims may be satisfied by an equivalent grant of public land elsewhere. The bill reported by the Committee on the Public Lands, to whom the petition was referred, and now under consideration, provides that the Secretary of State, the Attorney General, and the Commissioner of the General Land Office be authorized, to examine the disputed claims, and decide thereon according to law, as soon as the claims to 140,000 acres have been filed for decision; that if the claim of the British grantee should in any case be confirmed, the Commissioner of the Land Office shall issue his certificate for the amount thereof, which certificate shall be a final satisfaction of his claim, and shall be received in payment for any of the public lands of the United States, at the rate of two dollars per acre for every acre of the certificate; that no claim shall be filed under this act which has been barred by any former law; and that the decision of the Commissioners shall be final and conclusive.

The motion to strike out the first section being a vital one, gave rise to the debate above mentioned, in which Messrs. STRONG, WRIGHT, FORSYTH, JACKSON, and ROSS, supported the motion, and of course opposed the bill; and Messrs. ROBERTSON, McKEE, JOHNSON, CLARK of Kentucky, PICKERING, LATTIMORE, and HOPKINSON, spoke against striking out the section; Mr. CLAY, also, on a subsequent question, advocated the bill.

The question was finally determined against striking out the section; and, after some further unsuccessful attempts to amend the bill, the Committee rose, reported progress, and the House adjourned.

MONDAY, March 18.

Mr. LOWNDES, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported a bill supplementary to the act to provide additional revenues for defraying the expenses of Government and maintaining the public credit, by laying a direct tax upon the United States, and to provide for assessing and collecting the same; which was read twice, and committed to the Committee of the Whole upon the subject of revenue.

Mr. LOWNDES, from the same committee, also reported a bill for the distribution of $100,000 among the captors of the Algerine vessels captured and restored to the Dey of Algiers; which was read twice, and committed to the Committee of the Whole on the bill for the relief of Edward Hallowell.

Mr. NEWTON, from the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, reported a bill authorizing the Comptroller of the Treasury to cancel certain export bonds executed by Casper C. Schutt; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. NELSON, of Virginia, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported the bill from the Senate "providing for the publication of the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States," without amendment, and the bill was committed to a Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting statements of the valuation of lands, dwelling houses, and slaves, in the State of Maryland, in obedience to the resolution of the House of the fifth instant; which were ordered to lie on the table.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a bill "respecting the late officers and crew of the sloop-of-war Wasp," and a bill "to limit the right of appeal from the circuit court of the United States for the District of Columbia," in which they ask the concurrence of this House.

MISSISSIPPI LAND CLAIMS.

The House then again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill for quieting and adjusting certain claims to lands in the Mississippi Territory.

After some time spent in discussing various amendments to the details, and, incidentally, the principle of the bill, the Committee rose, and reported it to the House.

The debate was resumed in the House, as well on the object of the bill as its details, in which Messrs. CALHOUN, JACKSON, ROSS, and STEARNS, spoke in opposition, and Messrs. ROBERTSON, JOHNSON of Kentucky, LATTIMORE, McKEE, and EASTON, in favor of it.

In the course of the debate, on motion of Mr. JACKSON, an amendment was adopted to confine the certificates, in case the titles of the claimants be established, to the purchase of lands in the Mississippi Territory; in other words, to exclude the claimants from purchasing, with their certificates, public lands in any other than the Mississippi Territory.

The question was then taken on engrossing the bill for a third reading, and decided in the negative—yeas 43, nays 84, as follows:

TAX ON STILLs.

The House then, on motion of Mr. LOWNDES, resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill to abolish the existing duties on spirits distilled within the United States, and to lay other duties on distillation in lieu thereof.

The bill proposes to change the duty from a tax on the product to a tax on the capacity of the still, and to reduce the existing duties fifty per cent. The principle of the bill, the amount of duty, &c., were discussed at large, and fully reported, when the subject was before the House in the shape of a resolution, reported by the Committee of Ways and Means.

On motion of Mr. LOWNDES, the bill was so amended as to defer the expiration of the existing duties to the 30th of June next, instead of the 30th of March, as proposed by the bill.

After accepting some amendments to conform the bill to the preceding, and adopting some others of an unimportant character—

Mr. LOWNDES proposed an amendment to the bill, the object of which was to add one hundred per cent. to the amount of the present duty on the capacity of the still on licenses for one year, and to make the price of licenses for short periods bear the same proportion as the duty imposed on the license for a year.

This motion produced considerable discussion, in which Messrs. LOWNDES and TAYLOR, of New York, supported the amendment, and Messrs. HARDIN, JOHNSON of Kentucky, TUCKER, and ROSS opposed it. It was finally agreed to—ayes 64, noes 54.

On motion of Mr. ROSS, the bill was amended, by striking out the proviso which remitted to stills wholly employed in distilling from roots, half the duties to which they would otherwise be subjected.

After some further amendment, not affecting any principle, the Committee rose, reported progress, and obtained leave to sit again.

TUESDAY, March 19.

Mr. ROBERTSON presented a petition of the Legislature of the State of Louisiana, praying that a light-house may be erected at the mouth of the Mississippi river.—Referred to the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures.

Mr. ROBERTSON, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to whom the subject was referred, reported that it is inexpedient so to alter the existing laws, as to authorize the acceptance of soldiers' warrants in payment for lands purchased at the respective land offices of the United States; which was read and agreed to by the House.

Mr. ROBERTSON, from the same committee, reported a bill providing for the sale of certain lands in the State of Ohio, formerly set apart for refugees from Canada and Nova Scotia; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

On motion of Mr. BASSETT, a committee was appointed by this House to join such committee as may be appointed by the Senate, to consider and report what business will demand the attention of Congress prior to an adjournment; and also when such adjournment may probably take place.

The bill from the Senate "to limit the right of appeal from the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Columbia," was read twice, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The bill from the Senate "respecting the late officers and crew of the sloop-of-war Wasp," was read twice, and committed to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The House took into consideration the engrossed bill entitled "An act making further provision for settling claims to land in the Territory of Illinois," and the said bill having been read the third time, the question was taken, "Shall the bill pass?" and determined in the affirmative.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill "to authorize the payment for property lost, captured, or destroyed, while in the military service of the United States," with amendments. They have also passed a bill "further extending the time for issuing and locating military land warrants, and for other purposes." In which amendments and bill they ask the concurrence of this House.

TAX ON STILLs.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, Mr. BRECKENRIDGE in the Chair, on the bill to change the existing duties on distillation.

Mr. HARDIN, after adverting to the distance of many parts of the country from market, particularly the people of Kentucky, who were obliged generally to carry the product of their stills to Natchez and New Orleans, and the considerable time which must consequently elapse before they could receive any returns to enable them to discharge the duties imposed on their manufacture, moved to extend to eight months the credit of six months allowed by the bill to those whose license exceeds twenty dollars.

MARCH, 1816.

Tax on Stills.

H. OF R.

Mr. CLAY said, he was in favor of the motion. He avowed himself decidedly friendly to a duty on distillation, so long as any part of the existing public debt remained unpaid; but, in imposing this duty, he wished to see every proper indulgence extended to those on whom the tax was laid. To show the necessity of the proposed amendment, he adduced an instance in one of his own constituents, who had paid in duties to the Government the sum of $3,000, before he had received a single cent in return from the sale of his manufacture. The situation of the Western distillers, he said, demanded an extension of the proposed credit; they were obliged to seek a market at Natchez or New Orleans, and thence, perhaps, to ascend the Red and other rivers to Natchitoches or elsewhere. Sound policy and justice to those concerned required, therefore, the alteration proposed by his colleague; from whom he differed only in the extension of the credit moved for. Mr. C. said he would prefer twelve months, believing that term to be necessary to meet the cases already stated. A credit of two years was allowed in the duties on the India trade, and the voyages performed by the Western people in seeking a market, almost equalled those to the Indies. Mr. C. then (Mr. HARDIN having previously withdrawn his motion) moved to insert twelve instead of six months.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, concurred in the views of the gentleman who supported the proposed alteration, but he would prefer nine months, conceiving that term sufficient for every fair purpose. He thought every facility and encouragement ought to be given to distillation, which he believed would, in time, become a very great source of revenue, as the farmers would find it more and more their interest to carry their surplus grain to the great distilleries, and barter it for whiskey, &c. He wished also to encourage the manufacturer of that article, because he believed it the least pernicious of the ardent spirits generally used.

Mr. LOWNDES rose to state the motives which influenced the Committee of Ways and Means in fixing the period of credit at six months. It was deemed by the committee a sufficient time to allow the manufacturer to receive his returns, yet not enough to endanger the public revenue by too long a credit. But whilst he stated these views of the committee, he was obliged to concur in the arguments which had been advanced in favor of an extension of the term. He thought, however, that twelve months was rather a longer credit than necessary, and that nine months would be enough to enable the most remote manufacturers to make payment from the proceeds of their manufacture, and still not endanger the revenue by too long a credit.

After a few words from Mr. HARDIN in support of the motion, the question was taken thereon, and carried—yeas 76.

Mr. H. moved to strike out the clause which prohibits the collector from entering a distillery except in the day time; which motion was also agreed to.

The bill contained a provision that all persons taking out a license on which the duty should amount to $20, should be required to pay the same down, and should be allowed a discount thereon, at the rate of eight per cent. per annum. This discount Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, moved to increase to ten per cent.; which motion, after some discussion, was negatived.

After some other unsuccessful motions—

Mr. TAUL moved to strike out, entirely, the provision which required all duties for license under $20 to be paid down in money; which motion he supported by a few remarks.

The motion was opposed by Mr. LOWNDES, who said it was very questionable whether the sum required by the bill to be paid down, was not too small. The motion was negatived.

Mr. CONDIOT then offered the following proviso to the 4th section:

"That stills employed solely in distilling fruit, shall not be subjected to the payment of more than three-fourths of the duties required in other cases; and in those cases where the pomace is fermented and distilled, without having been first separated from the liquor by the press, not more than two-thirds shall be exacted."

This motion produced some desultory debate, and was finally negatived.

Mr. PICKENS, after a few remarks in support of the motion, moved a new section to the bill, providing that the owner or user of any still employed wholly in distilling from fruit, have the option of taking out license, either on the capacity agreeably to this act, or on the product at — cents per gallon.

Mr. P. offered this amendment principally on account of the short time which those who distilled only from fruit were able to use their stills, which he thought entitled them to the privilege he proposed.

His motion was, however, negatived without a division.

The Committee then rose and reported the bill and amendments, and the House proceeded to consider the report.

The House agreed successively, without objection, to the several amendments reported by the Committee, until it came to that adopted yesterday, on motion of Mr. LOWNDES, to increase the duty on licenses for one year one hundred per cent., and to graduate the price of licenses for shorter periods in proportion to these for one year.

On concurring in this amendment the yeas and nays were demanded, and the question decided—yeas 66, nays 62, as follows:

NAYS—Messrs. Alexander, Baer, Baker, Bennett, Betts, Blount, Breckenridge, Bryan, Burwell, Caldwell, Cannon, Clarke of North Carolina, Clark of Kentucky, Clendennin, Comstock, Crawford, Creighton, Culpeper, Desha, Edwards, Goldsborough, Hahn, Hardin, Henderson, Hungerford, Jackson, Johnson of Virginia, Johnson of Kentucky, Kerr of Virginia, King of North Carolina, Love, Lyle, Maclay, McCoy, McKee, McLean of Kentucky, Moore, Murfree, Newton, Ormsby, Parris, Pickens, Piper, Powell, Reynolds, Roane, Root, Ross, Savage, Sharpe, Sheffey, Smith of Virginia, Southard, Stanford, Taul, Taylor of North Carolina, Thomas, Throop, Wallace, Ward of New York, Whiteside, and William Wilson.

Mr. PARRIS then moved to restore the proviso in the fourth section, which had yesterday been stricken out in Committee of the Whole, and which was in the following words, viz: "Provided, That there shall be paid upon each still employed wholly in the distillation of roots, but one-half the rates of duties abovementioned, according to the capacity of such still."

Mr. P. stated that, upon retaining this provision, would entirely depend whether the distillers in the District of Maine could work their stills. He assured the House that his constituents were materially interested in having it retained, for without it distillation from roots, particularly in that section of the country, must be entirely suspended; that it was the only liquor distilled in his district, and he believed nearly the only liquor consumed; with the farmers he was sure it was.

The question was then taken on concurring with the Committee in striking out the proviso, and decided against concurrence, by the casting vote of the Speaker. So the proviso was retained.

Mr. CONDIOT renewed the motion he made this day in Committee, with some modifications, and supported it with zeal; but his exertions were ineffectual.

Mr. PICKENS then moved to add a new section to the bill; the object of which was to retain the option allowed in the last act in case of small distillers, whereby a duty might be paid of — cents on the spirits distilled, or the proposed tax on the capacity, at the option of the owner.

This varied from the motion he had made in Committee of the Whole, as that extended the alternative to all stills used in distillation from fruit only. Embracing in some measure the same principle as his former motion, he would not, he said, consume time in repeating his former arguments. The option proposed would afford great convenience to the farmers of the interior country, many of whom owned small distilleries, which it was only an object for them to use occasionally, and which would in many cases not be used at all, if compelled to be entered for a given period. The returns of the duties since the last act went into operation, prove how much preference had been given, in the State he represented, to paying the duty on the spirit; as he had before observed, nearly ten times as much was collected in that State under this alternative, as that on the capacity-tax. He had heard of no evasions of the law in that case, and thought it wise to consult the convenience and the habits of the people in the mode of levying burdens when there could be no public loss.

The motion was then negatived.

Mr. P. felt a reluctance in further troubling the House after the unwelcome reception of his former motions for amendment; he, however, thought it his duty to make another essay to attain in some proportion the objects of his former amendment.

He then moved the same amendment as the last, limiting it to the distillation of fruits.

This motion was also negatived.

No other amendment being offered, the bill was ordered to be engrossed, as amended, and read a third time.

WEDNESDAY, March 20.

Mr. TUCKER, from the Committee for the District of Columbia, reported a bill to prevent the circulation of unchartered bank notes, in the District of Columbia; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

[This bill does not operate on the notes of any unchartered bank already established, and the penalties for circulating the notes prohibited are not to attach to the passer of the notes, but to the institution which shall issue them.]

Mr. TUCKER also reported a bill making an appropriation for completing the centre building of the Capitol; which was read twice, and committed to the Committee of the Whole on the bill making an appropriation for enclosing and improving the Capitol square.

Mr. TUCKER also reported a bill to appropriate the marriage license tax within Washington county in the District of Columbia; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. WARD, of New Jersey, from a select committee, made a report on the petition of Andrew Law; which was read: when, Mr. W. reported a bill to extend the patent granted to Andrew Law for an improvement in the mode of printing music; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. MIDDLETON, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, made a report on the petition of Samuel Travis, and others, which was read; when, Mr. R. reported a bill allowing pay to certain persons made prisoners with the revenue cutter Surveyor; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

The amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill "to authorize the payment for property lost, captured, or destroyed, by the enemy, while in the service of the United States," were read, and referred to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. CLARK, of Kentucky, from the Committee on the Classification and Organization of the Militia, reported a bill for organizing, classing, and arming the militia, and for calling them forth to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrections, and repel invasions, and to repeal the laws heretofore passed for those purposes; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. STEARNS submitted the following resolution to amend the rules and orders of the House; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table:

Resolved, That the following be added to the standing rules of the House, viz:

There shall be a standing committee, consisting of — members, to be called "the Committee of the Revision of Bills."

It shall be the duty of the said committee carefully to examine all bills which may be reported, before they are introduced into the House, to make verbal or technical alterations, or take the same into a new draught, if they shall think proper. But they shall not change the principles or provisions of any bill without the consent of the committee who shall have reported the same.

The bill from the Senate "further extending the time for issuing and locating military land warrants, and for other purposes," was read twice, and committed to the Committee on the Public Lands.

NATIONAL CURRENCY.

Mr. CALHOUN, from the Committee on National Currency, reported a bill to regulate the currency within the United States of the gold coins of Great Britain, Portugal, France, and Spain, and the crowns of France and five franc pieces of Napoleon; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. CALHOUN also laid before the House the following letter from the Secretary of the Treasury:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, March 19, 1816.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter dated the 15th instant, making the following inquiries on behalf of the Committee on the National Currency:

1st. "Is it practicable or expedient, at present, to collect the dues of Government in gold, silver, and copper coins, Treasury notes, and notes of such banks as pay specie for their bills?"

2d. "If this be not practicable or expedient, at present, when ought an act directing the dues of Government to be so paid, to go into effect, and what ought to be the provisions of such an act?"

3d. "Would it be expedient, after the 1st of November next, or at any other time, to increase the duties on stamps on the notes of such banks as do not pay in specie?"

4th. "Are there any other measures that it would be expedient to resort to for that purpose?"

As a brief consideration of the general subject of your letter will afford the best foundation for specific answers to the questions which have been proposed, I pray the indulgence of the committee in the adoption of that course.

When the banks, during the Summer of 1814, suspended the payment of their notes in coin, the Treasury notes which had been issued, were manifestly incompetent, both in amount and credit, to constitute a substitute for the metallic currency. A declaration, therefore, at that time, that the Government would only accept, in payment of the revenue, gold and silver, Treasury notes or bank notes payable on demand in coin, would have been equivalent to a denial of the means for paying the duties and taxes, at the very crisis that rendered indispensable a strict enforcement of the obligation to pay them. Nor could such a declaration have been properly applied to the loans which the necessities of the Treasury required. A subscription in coin was not to be expected; a subscription in Treasury notes could not yield any active aid for general purposes; and consequently a subscription in the local currencies of the several States must have been contemplated as the chief resource for procuring the public supplies, as well as for discharging the public engagements. Under a sense, therefore, of the necessity which seems, for a time, to have reconciled the whole nation to the suspension of payments in coin, the Treasury continued to receive bank notes, in satisfaction of every public claim and demand; and Congress, after a session of six months, adjourned on the 3d of March, 1815, without intimating any objection, or making any provision, upon the subject.

The same state of things continued throughout the year 1815. In the annual estimates communicated to Congress, at the commencement of the present session, it was stated, that the aggregate amount which would probably be realized and received at the Treasury during 1815, from revenue and loans, might be placed at the sum of about $30,400,000. But the gross amount of Treasury notes issued and unredeemed in 1815, could not be averaged higher than $16,000,000; and the amount in actual circulation must be taken at a much less sum; for, whenever and wherever the Treasury notes rose to par, and above par, they were, for obvious reasons, withheld from the ordinary uses in exchange. Nor was it in the power of the Treasury to augment the issue of Treasury notes beyond the immediate demand for fiscal purposes. Treasury notes have not hitherto been regarded by the law as a substitute for the national currency, and the authority to issue them is only granted, as an auxiliary for supplying the occasional deficiencies of the revenue. In the New England States alone, the banks still professed to pay their notes upon demand in gold and silver; but, in fact, the issues of bank notes in that quarter have proved inadequate to meet the wants of the community; and the revenue is almost entirely collected in Treasury notes, which have been purchased at a considerable discount. It is certain, therefore, that neither Treasury notes, nor circulating coin, nor the notes of banks paying in coin, could furnish, in 1815, a sufficient medium, to satisfy the amount of the duties, taxes, and loans, for the year. But, it is important here to add, that while the interior of the country was as destitute of a currency of coin, as the cities and towns upon the Atlantic, the Treasury note medium was, in effect, monopolized by the commercial cities; and the local banks furnished all the means which the planter or the farmer could collect for the payment of his rent or his tax.

During the year 1815, the effects of the late war upon public and private credit were still felt; and the extraordinary event, which involved Europe in a new conflict, threatened a continuance of the drain upon our gold and silver; to be augmented, according to a general apprehension, by the force of an unfavorable balance of trade. Under such circumstances, the restoration of the national currency of coin could not cease to be desirable; but it must become more difficult in the accomplishment. The alternative issue of the measure deserved, therefore, the most serious consideration; and it was to be determined, not only upon views of fiscal interest and accommodation, but upon principles of national policy and justice. The consequence of rejecting bank notes, which were not paid on demand in coin, (if such payments were not thereby rendered general) must have been to put at hazard the collection of the revenue, in point of time and in point of product; to deteriorate (if not to destroy) the only adequate medium of exchange, adopted by the common consent of the nation, in a case of extreme necessity; and, in short, to shake the very foundations of private property. The powers of the Treasury Department were granted, for purposes contemplated by the Legislature in making the grant; but it is not believed, that a case attended with circumstances so extraordinary, embracing interests so extensive, and involving consequences so important, was at any time anticipated by the Legislature; or that it could be properly subjected to any other than the legislative agency. Having, therefore, made several ineffectual attempts to relieve the public embarrassments, it was deemed the duty of the department to repose, with confidence, upon the wisdom and authority of Congress, for the application of a remedy suited to the malady of the times.

The period has arrived when such a remedy may be safely and surely applied. The opinion expressed in the Treasury report of the 6th of December last, is still however entertained, that the currency in coin cannot at once be restored; that it can only be restored through a gradual reduction of the amount, attended by an amelioration of the value of the existing paper medium, and that the measure of reform must originate with the State banks. It has been said, indeed, that those institutions have already begun the salutary work; that the amount of their discounts has been reduced; that the issues of their paper have been restricted; and that preparations are made for converting their capital of public stock into the mere legitimate capital of gold and silver. Public confidence must naturally follow these just and judicious arrangements; but the interposition of the Government will still be required, to secure a successful result.

It must at all times be a delicate task to exact the payment of duties and taxes in gold and silver, before the Treasury is prepared, independent of any contingency, to give an assurance that the public creditors shall be paid in the same or an equivalent medium. If, however, a National Bank be now established, this assurance may be confidently given; and it is believed that the apprehension will prove unfounded, which suggests that the issue of bank paper will be increased, and consequently will depreciate by the operation of such an institution. A demand for the paper of the National Bank may diminish the demand for the paper of the State banks, but, after the restoration of the currency in coin, the whole issue of bank paper will be regulated by the whole demand; and the proportion of the issue to be enjoyed by the National Bank and the State banks, respectively, will be the subject of a fair competition, without affecting the public interests or convenience. If, therefore, the State banks have resumed the payment of their notes in coin, before the National Bank shall be organized, there will be no hazard of disappointment in promising a similar payment to the public creditors; but even if that be not the case, the hazard will be slight, considering all the legislative precautions which it is proposed to adopt. Added to the metallic capital of the National Bank, the deposits of the revenue, collected in gold and silver, must be a sufficient basis for a circulation of coin; as the uses for the paper of the bank, extending throughout the nation, will be constant as well as uniform.

Under these general impressions I have the honor to submit the specific answers to your inquiries, in the following form:

1. That it be made by law the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to give public notice that, from and after the 31st day of December next, it will not be lawful to receive in payment to the United States, anything but gold, silver, and copper coins, constituting the lawful national currency; provided, that the Secretary of the Treasury may, as heretofore, authorize and allow the receipt of the notes of such banks as may pay their notes, on demand, in the lawful money of the United States.

2. That, from and after the same day, it shall not be lawful for the Secretary of the Treasury to authorize or allow deposits of the revenue to be made, or to be continued, in any bank which shall not pay its notes, when demanded, in the lawful money of the United States.

3. That, from and after the same day, it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to take legal measures for obtaining payment, in the lawful money of the United States, of all notes or sums on deposit, belonging to the United States, issued by, or deposited in, any bank which shall not then pay its notes and deposits, on demand, in the lawful money of the United States.

4. That, from and after the same day, the notes of banks and bankers shall be charged with a graduated stamp duty, advanced at least two hundred per cent. upon the present duty, without the privilege of commutation; saving, in that respect, all existing contracts: Provided, That if any banks or bankers shall, on or before the 1st day of November next, notify the Secretary of the Treasury that their notes will be paid in coin, upon demand, after the 31st of December; and if it be proved to his satisfaction that, after that day, payment was so made, then, with respect to such banks or bankers, the rate of duty and the privilege of commutation shall remain as now established by law.

Although the success of these measures is not in any degree doubted, it may be proper to add, that if it ever shall become necessary to increase their force, provision might be made, under the Constitutional power of Congress, to subject all banks and bankers, failing to pay their notes, according to the terms of the contract, to a seizure of their estates and effects, for the benefit of their creditors, as in a case of legal bankruptcy.

I cannot conclude this letter, without an expression of some solicitude, at the present situation of the Treasury. The State banks have ceased to afford any accommodation for the transfer of its funds. The revenue is paid (as already stated) in Treasury notes, where Treasury notes are below par; and the public engagements can only be satisfactorily discharged in Treasury notes, which are immediately funded at seven per cent. Where Treasury notes are above par, the local accumulation of bank credits is beyond the local demands, and the excess cannot be used elsewhere. Discontent and speculation are abroad; and all the estimates of the amount of the funded debt, created since the commencement of the late war, will probably fail, unless the wisdom of Congress shall effectually provide for the early restoration of an uniform National Currency.

TAX ON STILLLS.

An engrossed bill, entitled "An act to abolish the existing duties on spirits distilled within the United States, and to lay other duties in lieu of those at present imposed on licenses to distillers of spirituous liquors" was read the third time; and on the question, Shall this bill pass? it passed in the affirmative—yeas 118, nays 13, as follows:

LIQUIDATION OF CLAIMS.

The bill to provide for the adjustment of certain accounts, in which papers or vouchers have been lost, was withdrawn from the Committee of the Whole, to whom it had been referred; and the House proceeded to consider the bill.

After a good deal of discussion on the princi-ple as well as the details of the bill (to which sun-dry amendments were offered)—in which Messrs. JOHNSON of Kentucky, LOWNDES, PARRIS, GOLD, and others, supported the bill; and Messrs. PIT-KIN, HUGER, HOPKINSON, and others, opposed it—the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The House then, on motion of Mr. LOWNDES, went into a Committee of the Whole on the bill to repeal the duties on household furniture, and on gold and silver watches; to which no amend-ment being offered, the Committee proceeded to take up the bill to regulate which, having been read through, and taken up by sections—

Mr. STRONG proposed to amend the bill by strik-ing out the clause which imposes a duty of 25 per cent. ad valorem on imported woollen and cotton manufactures of all descriptions, and to substi-tute a provision imposing a tax of 33½ per cent. on manufactures of cotton, and 28 per cent. on those of wool.

This motion involving the question to what extent domestic fabrics shall be encouraged by protecting duties on foreign manufactures—

Mr. STRONG supported his motion, and the expediency of making the duty on the imported articles higher than was proposed by the bill.

Mr. LOWNDES rose and replied to Mr. STRONG on the question of extending the duty, taking a clear and comprehensive view of the subject of protecting duties generally; supporting the sys-tem proposed by the bill, and stating the motives which induced the Committee of Ways and Means to report a smaller duty on the articles named, than was recommended by the Secretary of the Treasury, &c.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, commenced some remarks on the subject, but not anticipating that the question would be put to-day, and wishing to refer to some notes not by him, he moved that the Committee rise.

The Committee then rose, reported the bill to repeal the tax on furniture and watches—which was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading—and obtained leave to sit again on the bill to regu-late the tariff of duties.

THE MILITARY STAFF.

The House, on motion of Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill to organize a general staff for the Army.

Mr. JOHNSON then entered into a detailed com-parative view of the staff proposed by the bill with that which existed during the war, to show that the Military Committee had not recom-mended an extravagant staff, or one greater in proportion to the number of men retained on the Peace Establishment than was allowed and found necessary during the war.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, followed Mr. JOHN-son in support of the general object of the bill, but regretted there was not a greater proportion of officers allowed for the Quartermaster's de-partment, the value and necessity of whose ser-vices he enforced by a few remarks.

The Committee then proceeded in the consid-eration of the bill, and adopted several minor amendments at the suggestion of Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky.

A motion was made by Mr. TAYLOR, of New York, to strike from the bill the clause which provides for the retention of certain staff officers who had been provisionally retained by the Pres-ident of the United States since the time of re-ducing the Army to the Peace Establishment. Mr. T. thought this clause interfered with the Constitutional power of the President and Senate to fill offices. Although the officers alluded to had been in the service, and had been passed on by the President and Senate, they were now to all intents private citizens, and this bill would legislate them into office again without allowing the President to act in the case. Mr. T. declared that his motion arose from no want of respect for the characters of the gentlemen referred to in the bill.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, said he thought, instead of the bill legislating those persons into office, the motion would legislate them out of office, and he was opposed to the latter legislation as much as to the former. He denied that they were reduced to the rank of private citizens, and asserted that they had been constantly in service. After some further remarks by Mr. J. to prove the impropriety of carrying those officers again before the Senate, and to establish the propriety of the clause as it stood in the bill—

Mr. HULBERT said he would not sanction the clause if he thought it susceptible of the construction given to it by Mr. TAYLOR; but the President and Senate had already done their duty, and as those officers were now in office, and had been so ever since their appointment, he could see no reason for going through the process again, or troubling the Senate to repeat its former decision, &c.

After a few words from Mr. PICKERING against the proposition—

Mr. TAYLOR's motion was decided in the negative.

The Committee having gone through the Staff bill, proceeded, on motion of Mr. JOHNSON, to take up the bill to establish an additional military academy; which having been read—

Mr. PICKERING said it had occurred to him that provisions might be incorporated into this bill which would make it much more useful, by extending it to naval as well as military young men; and as West Point would, in his opinion, be a proper situation for the instruction of both, he had prepared a substitute for the present bill, which with permission he would read.

Mr. P. then offered, as an amendment to the bill, a substitute, embracing in detail the view substantially stated by him; which was received without objection, and subsequently the House ordered it to be printed.

No other motion being made, the Committee rose, and reported the bills with their several amendments; and

The House proceeded to consider the amendments to the general staff bill; which were successively agreed to.

An ineffectual motion was made by Mr. BETTS to reduce the number of judge advocates proposed from three to one.

Mr. JOHNSON had made an unsuccessful motion, in Committee, to add a section to the bill authorizing the President of the United States to employ five thousand dollars in the purchase of certain military charts and surveys owned by William Tatham.

Mr. NELSON, of Virginia, now renewed this motion, which he supported with zeal and feeling, on the ground of the Revolutionary services of Colonel Tatham, and the value of the charts and maps which it was proposed to purchase for the use of the nation.

The motion was supported also by Mr. CONDUCT, and opposed by Mr. HALL, and carried—yeas 48, nays 44.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed, and the House adjourned.

THURSDAY, March 21.

Mr. ROBERTSON, from the Committee on the Public Lands, made a report; which was read, and the resolution therein contained was concurred in by the House, as follows:

Resolved, That it is inexpedient at this time to establish a land office for the sale of public lands at the town of Arkansas, in the Territory of Missouri, or at the town of Jackson, in the county of Cape Girardeau, in the same Territory.

Mr. NELSON, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported the bill from the Senate "to limit the right of appeal from the circuit court of the United States for the District of Columbia," with an amendment; which was read, and agreed to by the House; and the said amendment was ordered to be engrossed, and the bill read a third time to-morrow.

On motion of Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, the Secretary of War was directed to inform this House what course has been pursued by the War Department as to the payment of interest in cases where bills have been drawn on the Department for money actually received by a public agent, and which bills it was not in the power of the Secretary to pay for want of funds.

On motion of Mr. FORSYTH, the Committee of Ways and Means were instructed to inquire into the expediency of increasing the annual allowance to Ministers of the United States to foreign nations, and of allowing annual salaries to the Consuls of the United States at foreign ports.

An engrossed bill, entitled "An act to repeal the act entitled 'An act to provide additional revenues for defraying the expenses of Government and maintaining the public credit, by laying duties on household furniture and on gold and silver watches,'" was read the third time, and passed.

An engrossed bill, entitled "An act for the liquidation of certain claims, and for other purposes," was read a third time, and passed.

MILITARY STAFF.

The engrossed bill to organize a general staff for the Army, was read the third time.

Mr. TAYLOR, of New York, after repeating his objections to that clause of the bill which provides for retaining certain officers (deemed by him not to be in service) without the further sanction of the President and Senate, and the necessity he was therefore under of voting against a bill whose objects he approved, if the clause was not modified—and for the purpose of having the bill made conformable to his views on this point, he moved that it be recommitted to the Military Committee.

Messrs. HALL, ROOT, and HARDIN, respectively supported the recommitment on the ground of objection to the section of the bill, yesterday adopted, to appropriate five thousand dollars for the purchase of military maps and charts.

Mr. NELSON, of Virginia, opposed the recommitment, and supported that provision of the bill which was the ground of the latter objection, which turned entirely on the merits of Colonel Tatham, the owner of the maps which it was contemplated to purchase, and the value of the charts, &c.

The motion to recommit the bill was agreed to.

THE TARIFF.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill to regulate the duties on imports, &c.

Mr. STRONG withdrew the motion he made yesterday to increase the duty on imported cottons and woollens; and

Mr. CLAY then moved to amend the bill by increasing the duty on imported cottons from twenty-five to thirty-three and a third per cent. Mr. C. made this motion, he said, to try the sense of the House as to the extent to which it was willing to go in protecting domestic manufactures—assuming that there was no difference of opinion on the propriety of such protection, but only on the degree to which encouragement should be carried. He proceeded to advocate a thorough and decided protection by ample duties, and supported his motion at some length.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, replied to Mr. CLAY, and argued against increasing the duty beyond the amount recommended in the bill. Mr. S. took a very wide view of the subject; discussing separately and fully the effect which would be produced by the proposed duties on commerce, on manufactures, on agriculture, and on the revenue, and stating incidentally some objections to the bill, and to the recommendations of the Secretary of the Treasury. He was in favor of protecting domestic fabrics, but differed from Mr. CLAY as to the extent of that protection.

Mr. LOWNDES followed in reply to Mr. CLAY, and in reply also to Mr. SMITH's objections to the report of the Committee of Ways and Means. He entered into an ample and particular defence of the system reported on the subject by the committee; when the question on Mr. CLAY's motion was decided in the negative—ayes 51, nays 43.

Mr. PICKERING then, with the view of substituting an ad valorem duty, moved to strike out that clause of the first section which provides that all cotton cloths, (except nankeens,) the original cost of which at the place whence imported shall be less than twenty-five cents per square yard, shall be taken to have cost twenty-five cents per square yard, and shall be charged with duty accordingly.

This motion gave rise to further debate, in which the expediency of protecting duties and their extent were discussed at much length. It was supported by the mover, and opposed by Messrs. LOWNDES, STRONG, and TAYLOR, and negatived—only eight or ten rising in its favor.

Mr. CLAY then renewed his motion in a modified shape, by proposing to extend the duty on cotton goods to thirty per cent. in lieu of twenty-five.

Mr. C. advocated this motion still more at length than the first—replying to many of Mr. SMITH's arguments, and entering largely into the general question of the expediency of affording protection to our own manufactures.

Mr. ROBERTSON replied to Mr. CLAY, and answered generally the objections which had been urged by Mr. C. and others to the report of the Committee of Ways and Means, which he defended as proposing a just and ample protection to domestic manufactures.

After Mr. R. concluded, the Committee rose, obtained leave to sit again, and the House adjourned.

FRIDAY, March 22.

Mr. BASSETT submitted the following resolutions:

Resolved, That a Naval Academy be established at Washington, to consist of — professors and teachers, at which all the midshipmen in the service of the United States shall be instructed, when not in actual service. That the Secretary of the Navy be required to adjust a proper plan, to select a proper site, to cause a just estimate of the expense, and report thereon in the first week of the next session of Congress.

Resolved, That an able teacher be provided for each seventy-four and forty-four in commission, whose salary shall be — dollars. There shall be allotted to each ship, as above, a double portion at least of midshipmen, and their time shall be equally divided between ship duty and study. No midshipman shall be allotted to any of the smaller vessels until he has been two years at least in service.

Resolved, That — number of apprentices be entered annually to the United States, to be maintained, and instructed in naval architecture, draughting, drawing, all the branches of mathematics, geometry, and navigation. Their instruction to close with two years service at sea, as carpenter, in a vessel of the United States.

After a few remarks from Mr. BASSETT, in which he quoted the examples of various European countries, in support of his motion, the resolutions were agreed to.

On motion of Mr. ORMSBY, the Committee of Ways and Means were instructed to inquire into the expediency of increasing the compensation now allowed by law to the collectors of the internal revenue of the United States.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a report of the Secretary of the Treasury, respecting the valuation of lands, lots, dwelling-house, and slaves, in Pennsylvania, made in obedience to the resolution of the House of the 7th instant, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. BURWELL, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported a bill making appropriations for the support of the Military Establishment of the United States, for the year 1816; which was read and committed to the Committee of the Whole upon the subject of revenue.

Mr. NELSON, of Virginia, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported a bill concerning John P. Maxwell and Hugh H. Maxwell; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, from the Military Committee, reported the bill organizing a general staff, with an amendment [striking out the last section, containing the appropriation of five thousand dollars for the purchase of military charts, &c.]

After a short discussion on the propriety of the amendment, and the supposed value of the charts referred to, &c., the amendment was agreed to by the House, and the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The House, on motion of Mr. FORSYTH, resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill concerning settlers on the public lands, which passed through the Committee, was reported to the House without amendment, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The bill from the Senate, to limit the right of appeal from the Circuit Court of the District of Columbia, was read a third time, and passed.

The bill authorizing a subscription to a second edition of the public documents by T. B. Wait & Co., passed through a Committee of the Whole, and was ordered for a third reading.

THE TARIFF.

The House then again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill to regulate the tariff of duties—Mr. CLAY'S motion to increase the duty on imported cotton cloths to thirty per cent. being still under consideration.

Mr. INGHAM said, he had risen yesterday for the purpose of replying to some observations that were made by the gentleman from Louisiana. (Mr. ROBERTSON.) and also the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, (Mr. LOWNOES)—he had not intended then to occupy much of the time of the Committee, and he should not abuse the indulgence he had received by doing it now. Having been a member of the committee who reported the bill, and having had the misfortune to be in the minority when some very important principles had been decided by that committee, which he hoped would not now be the case, he thought it his duty to submit some of the views that had occurred to him in the course of the discussion.

It was not his intention to go at large into the discussion of the policy of the Government, in encouraging manufactures, but he should endeavor to confine himself to a consideration of the objections that had been urged against the motion before the House, which he had understood, by the general course of the arguments, to be—

1st. That the amount of duty proposed was incompatible with the fiscal policy of the Government.

2d. That the high duties on imported cotton and woollen goods will injure the navigating interests of the United States.

3d. That we ought to confine our protection of manufactures exclusively to articles of indispensable necessity in time of war, and to articles of first necessity in time of peace.

As respects the revenue question, Mr. I. said, he had not expected to have seen the discussion assume this direction, because the great principle involved in this bill was not a revenue proposition. Congress had already provided by law for all the revenues demanded by the exigencies of the Government, and the only relation this bill could have to the revenue was, the general limit of the aggregate of the duties to be imposed. Its great primary object was to make such a modification of duties upon the various articles of importation, as would give the necessary and proper protection and support to the agriculture, manufactures, and commerce of the country. The revenue is only an incidental consideration, and it ought not to have any influence in the decision upon the proposition before the Committee. With a view then, to these great objects, is it not most obviously the policy of the Government to insure to its agriculture the advantage of a home market, that cannot be affected by the caprice and vexatious impositions of foreign nations? The principal raw materials used in our manufactories have become great staples of the country, the value of which would be greatly increased by a demand for them at home, as well as many other articles, that cannot now find a market anywhere else. Mr. I. said, he did not intend to pursue the argument on this part of the subject; it was only necessary to mention it, the intelligence of the House would supply the omission. But the manufacturing interests are vitally concerned in the fate of this bill and its details. It is believed that not less than $100,000,000 have been invested in manufactures, in the course of the last eight or ten years, and these furnish, in times of prosperity, profitable employment to many thousands of persons who could procure subsistence in no other way; they consume vast quantities of the products of the country, and create a demand for raw materials which are imported from abroad, to an extent not easily believed by those who have no practical acquaintance with the facts; they supply substantial and valuable fabrics for the convenience and comfort of the people, which they can pay for with their surplus products, and contribute to the completion of by their own labor. The revenue question must, therefore, be regarded as a minor consideration, even if it had been shown (which it has not) that the proposed duty would yield either too much or too little revenue. Mr. I. said, he considered this bill as involving a great principle of national policy; not a mere contrivance to collect taxes from the people in the easiest way, without their knowing it, but a measure intended and calculated to increase their comfort, happiness, and wealth, and of course their disposition and ability to pay whatsoever the exigencies of the Government may require, and as a necessary consequence to increase and perpetuate the security, the peace, and especially the independence of the nation. Mr. I. said, he felt himself

The Tariff.

H. OF R.

altogether incompetent to do anything like justice to this great and interesting subject; but he regretted this the less, because he knew it would be discussed by those who could not be indulged with a similar excuse. But it has been said, that the promotion of manufactures would tend to injure our navigation and commerce, though he had not heard any attempt to prove the allegation. What, said Mr. I., was the present condition of our navigation? Totally excluded from the British West Indies, and the carrying trade we formerly had divided among the Powers of Europe—this must continue as long as they remain at peace. In addition to this, it may be remarked that, but for the late treaty, we could not have carried our own cotton to its principal market. Many of the products of the Middle States can find no market abroad. And do gentlemen suppose that our navigation can be preserved by encouraging the importation of cotton and woollen goods, which, in many States, we have not the means of paying for, the balance of trade being already most decidedly against us. This employment for our navigation has already failed, and it is worse than illusory to rely upon it. We must seek for some more certain employment for our shipping, that cannot be affected by the navigation acts of other nations. This can only be found in our coasting trade, which must increase with our population, and will be especially promoted by every pursuit that increases the intercourse between the States on our maritime frontier; and it is the only trade exclusively our own. Do not manufactures, in an especial manner, contribute to this object; particularly that of cotton, the raw material being produced in one extreme, and the fabrics made in the other; tending also to bind the States by the indissoluble bonds of interest and mutual dependence? Another source of employment for our navigation is the trade with South America, which must essentially depend upon the success of our manufactures. We shall require from thence a great variety of raw materials, and the profit we make by working them will enable us to purchase European goods with which to pay for them. Many articles that we make, have already found a vent in that country, and this trade must increase with the increase of American manufactures, and will depend almost exclusively upon their success. But it has been said the East India trade will be destroyed, and hence our navigation diminished in that branch of our commerce. The honorable gentleman from Maryland, (to whom, Mr. I. said, he always listened with pleasure, and never without receiving valuable instruction,) had assumed rather too strongly the fact that the East India trade would be destroyed by the proposed duty on cotton goods. Although he had no hesitation to say that, if we must be reduced to the alternative of abandoning our manufactures or the East India trade, the latter ought to give way, because it is the least valuable to the nation; for if, according to the gentleman's estimate, forty ships are employed in it, and its continuance depends upon the importation of muslins for domestic consumption, we shall find the trade rather an unprofitable one in the present state of the world. The average cargo of an India ship is one thousand bales of eighteen hundred yards each—one million eight hundred thousand yards for each ship, and seventy-two million yards for forty ships. These goods will require eighteen million pounds of cotton, which are exclusively of foreign growth, and the cost of the goods, at nine cents a yard, will be $6,480,000, which we cannot pay for in the products of the country. Such is the state of that trade, and unless some protection is afforded against the introduction of these fabrics, our manufactures must sink. There is no nation in Europe that pretends to compete with the manufacturers of India; and their goods are often sold in the United States, by regular sale, for less than they could be woven for here. Where cotton can be bought for four pence a pound, and men work for four pence a day, it is in vain for us to think of rivalling them in the cheapness of their fabrics. The protection asked for, is not, therefore, an unreasonable one, nor will it destroy the India trade. We import various other articles from India; silks, spices, drugs, dyes, &c.; and the China trade is not affected by the bill. Besides, the re-exportation of the India goods can be effected as well as heretofore, and no part of the trade can be sensibly affected by the minimum price fixed for the charge of duties, except that which is employed in importing coarse muslins for consumption. But the trade to India is almost exclusively a cash trade, and can only be carried on by the profit of our trade with other countries. Commerce between nations resembles traffic between individuals, and by this assimilation many of its supposed mysteries will vanish. A farmer who barter with a merchant, and furnishes him no more products than the amount of merchandise received, will have neither cash nor credits with which to make purchases from a cash merchant, however cheap he may offer his goods; we must, therefore, trade, in the first instance, with nations who will purchase our products, and it is not very material what the price is, provided it bears the same relation to the goods sold and bought. If we derive a profit from this trade, the balance can be employed in purchasing merchandise from India; but we have no such balance now in our favor, nor is it likely that we shall have, until we determine to buy up and manufacture more for ourselves. But it is urged that our encouragement to domestic manufactures ought to be confined to fabrics of necessity, in time of war, and especially articles of the first necessity.

Mr. I. said, this doctrine had always appeared to him as a plausible theory, not founded in sound policy; nor did he think it would bear the test of reason and experience. As to articles of necessity in time of war, it would not be possible for any two persons in the nation entirely to agree what were, and what were not, articles of necessity in time of war; almost everything we import from abroad was esteemed in some degree necessary to our comfort; but it would not be pretended that we ought to impose heavy duties to encourage the growth of products or the manufacturing of fabrics, which neither our climate nor the pursuits of the people had given any indications of our abilities to produce; for instance, it will not avail us to lay a heavy duty on coffee, when our climate will not permit the propagation of the plant; nor would it be policy to impose heavy duties on fabrics which the people of the United States have neither indicated the ability nor the disposition to manufacture. The rule laid down by the honorable gentleman then fails, and this proves that our policy ought not to be governed by it. But there is another principle that will not fail, viz: That we ought to promote every species of internal industry which the inclinations, the habits, and interest of the people, as well as the soil, climate, and general conditions of the country indicate, as likely to succeed, and most especially those pursuits which experience has shown we can succeed in. And as to articles of first necessity, the same difficulty exists. The great object of the Government ought to be to promote the prosperity and happiness of the people, because it surely promotes in some degree its own prosperity and durability. Its policy in relation to manufactures, must be a great national policy—it ought not to be limited by any fastidious calculations of sheer necessity. It cannot be an adequate object for this Government to provide, by protecting duties, for the manufacturing of a few coarse goods to cover mendicants; but if the doctrine be, that we ought to secure the domestic manufacture of clothing for the poor generally, and that therefore high duties should be imposed on coarse muslins, &c., Mr. I. said, he could see no reason why a poor man should be taxed, in order to induce him to wear a home-made shirt, that did not apply with more force to justify a duty that would induce a rich man to wear a home-made coat. But this doctrine about first necessity is fallacious; its design seems to be to limit the manufacturing industry of this country by an artificial distinction that has no existence in reality; the only rule that admits of no exception, is that which has been already laid down. It is the province and almost an essential quality of arbitrary and despotic Governments, to force industry out of its natural and proper channels, or to cramp it by monopolies; but it is the duty of a Republican Government, having a due regard to the interest and happiness of the people, to encourage every pursuit (not morally wrong) in which the conditions of the country and the inclinations and capacity of the people may authorize a reasonable prospect of success. Mr. I. said, he could not be driven from this policy by the denunciations of gentlemen against (what they have been pleased to call) regulation. The word had often been used before in this House for the same purpose, but it appeared to him that it had lost its original signification, and had become a cabalistic term, that was always at hand to oppose every measure against which other more cogent arguments could not be found. Do gentlemen mean that there shall be no regulation? If they do, why not avow their doctrine in its extent, and propose at once to unloose the bonds of the social compact, which are but regulations? Unfetter men from the regulations of Government, resolve society into its primitive elements, and let us mingle with the savage of the forest—this would be the effect of yielding to this cabalistic denunciation of regulation. But they do not mean to carry their doctrine thus far—and therefore the only question to be considered is: Do we propose to regulate too much? Their doctrine is to let industry pursue its natural channels; ours is to follow and support the industry of the country, and to straighten and clear away the obstructions from the channels it has chosen to flow in—we would be justified in doing much more, but the bill before us is based upon this principle. When a farmer desires to irrigate his grounds, he diverts a stream of water from its natural channel, and by continued regulation spreads its fertilizing influence over the most sterile spots; and so also the manufacturer—he throws a dam across a stream and diverts it by a new channel to his factory, which is put in motion by its power; this is also regulation—and surely none will pretend that it would be better to permit these valuable streams to find their way through zigzag natural channels to the ocean, than to be thus employed for the comfort and happiness of man. This cabalistic denunciation might as well be directed against such purposes as against manufactures. It is evident that these facts require a long series of practical operation before the experience and skill necessary to enable our workmen to compete with those of the Old World can be attained. The circumstances of the country for several years past, have given a new direction to a great portion of our capital and our industry—much skill has been acquired; our manufacturers have demonstrated, that they can succeed with a little aid from the Government to protect them against extraordinary pressure; they desire to have some advantages over foreigners in the home market, and this policy, which has become an axiom with all other Governments, is denounced as a ruinous regulation.

H. OF R.

The Tariff.

MARCH, 1816.

The honorable gentleman from Louisiana has also complained of the partiality of the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, and the bill under consideration—that it is calculated to favor the manufactures of the Northern and Middle States more than those of the South. But he has not given any instance of this partiality, except that of the proposed duty on sugar; and it would not be difficult to show that he had been most unfortunate in the selection of this case. The Secretary of the Treasury had proposed two and a half cents a pound on brown sugar, which is not less than 36 per cent. ad valorem upon the average cost of the article in the West Indies—in the East Indies, much more. The gentleman complains of 30 per cent. on cotton goods as exorbitant and partial, while 36 per cent. on sugar is considered by him no protection at all; but, in order to escape from the dilemma, he says that two and a half cents was the old duty, and that it was laid for revenue. If he can prove that a duty imposed for revenue has no effect in encouraging the domestic production of sugar, his argument is entitled to some weight; but, until then, he will permit us to deny the partiality of the report to the Northern section of the Union, in this particular. But, what says the bill, which he also complains of? It proposes a duty of four cents a pound on sugar, which is more than 36 per cent. ad valorem on the cost of the article; and yet it is complained of by the gentleman from Louisiana as partial. It is indeed partial, but the partiality is in his favor; and it was extremely unfortunate for him, at least, to object to the proposed duty on cotton goods upon this ground. Mr. I said, he had no objection to give a liberal encouragement to the production of sugar; he rejoiced to find that it could be produced in such quantities, and would give employment to a very considerable tonnage in its transportation; but, unless there was some disposition for reciprocity, it could not be expected that so high a duty would be voted for.

The Tariff.

H. OF R.

There is, said Mr. I., another circumstance in this case which ought to be understood. The chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means had informed the House that the increased specific duties, in consequence of the alteration made by the committee on sugars, from two and a half to four cents, would require but 20 per cent. on cottons and woollens to make up the necessary revenue required. He did not, however, take into his account the various reductions made by the committee on coffee, copper sheets, &c., which there was very little doubt would be quite equal to the increased duty on sugar. Suppose it to be, however, as the gentleman has stated, then the Committee of Ways and Means have granted a protecting duty of 56 per cent. on sugar, and procuring therefrom the necessary revenue, they used this as a pretext to reduce cottons and woollens to 20 per cent. Mr. I. said he was present in the Committee of Ways and Means when this argument was used, but he was struck dumb with astonishment when the motion succeeded. It was, however, too glaringly inconsistent and palpably wrong to be persisted in, and therefore it was that the Committee of Ways and Means, upon reconsideration, substituted the 25 per cent., which was reported in the bill. But he did not think the 25 per cent. sufficient protection, nor that it would be the cheapest production for American manufactures. The higher duties you impose, the more powerful the stimulus, and the sooner we have a supply and a competition at home. This ought to be our object, and the effect would more than compensate for all the difference of price for a few years, which was no more than as a dust in the balance, if we consider the great national objects to be attained by fostering and promoting internal industry and skill in domestic manufactures. But, Mr. I. said, he would not enter into that part of the discussion—the field was unlimited—but he would admonish gentlemen not to be too parsimonious in their encouragement to their great interests. He had heard a demand from various quarters for estimates and calculations to show the precise amount of duty that would enable the American manufacturer to come into the market upon equal terms with the importer. Such demands are in their nature unreasonable and unfair, because it must be obvious that they could not be answered with any kind of certainty; but, more especially, because the amount that would be sufficient to protect an establishment in the best perfection, with the best skill of the country, and the most perfect system of economy, would be utterly inadequate to protect the establishments that are in their infancy, which constitute by far the greatest portion of manufactures in the United States. But there are difficulties, independently of mere cost, to be overcome by the American manufacturer. The European fabrics made of the same material have the advantage in appearance, though not in durability, which gain them a preference; and the prejudice of the country against domestic fabrics—yes, the prejudice of the country—the same kind of prejudice that pervades a portion of this House—pervades a portion of the United States. It was a fact, said Mr. I., that the paper used by the members of this House to enclose their newspapers in, had the water-mark of the British Crown upon it, though the paper was made in the District of Columbia! The manufacturer could not have done this to gratify any attachment to Crowns—he found it his interest thus to disguise his paper. Similar artifices had been practised in other branches, particularly the manufacture of powder. The best powder made in the United States—or perhaps the world—could not a few years ago be sold without the British mark upon the kegs. These deceptions had succeeded, because prejudice and ignorance are mostly, if not always, associated; but they prove the power of this pernicious prejudice, and he thought it was the bounden duty of Congress to protect the industry of the country from such discouragements. If there be a great portion of people in this country who prefer to have everything that is foreign, when they cannot tell the difference but from the mark, they ought to pay for it; and the American artisan has a strong claim upon his Government for protection against this unnatural prejudice.

Mr. I. said he had trespassed upon the patience of the Committee longer than he had intended; he would only add, we had now acquired a degree of skill in many of the arts, that, if cherished and improved, would be a source of inexhaustible wealth to the nation; neglect it, and it is lost for centuries—perhaps forever. The success of this bill determines this great question. The history of Europe, especially of Spain and France, in the early part of the last century, sufficiently proves the fact, that, when the arts fall by the folly or negligence of the Government, they are not easily revived.—“There is a tide in the affairs” of nations as well as “of men, which, taken at the flood, leads on to fortune.” This is that critical moment: permit it but to pass by, and a similar opportunity to perpetuate the prosperity and happiness of this country may not, and probably will not, present again for ages to come.

The Tariff.

MARCH, 1816.

Mr. LOWNDES again entered into a particular defence of the report of the committee, and the degree of encouragement which the bill proposed giving to our manufacturing establishments, and replied, in detail, to the arguments of Messrs. INGHAM and CLAY.

Mr. CLAY followed in support of his motion, and in reply to the gentlemen who had spoken in opposition to it.

Messrs. GOLD and HULBERT also successively advocated the amendment, and the expediency of extending an indubitable encouragement and security to our manufacturing citizens.

The question was then taken on Mr. CLAY's motion, to increase the duty on cottons to thirty per cent. and carried—ayes 68, noes 61.

Mr. CLAY then moved so to amend the bill as to class hempen and sail cloths (including cotton bagging) with those of woollen, so that if the duty on the latter should be hereafter increased, as he wished, to twenty-eight per cent, it would be also on the former articles, and if not, the duty thereon would still be raised to twenty-five per cent., the same as the duty on woollens.

After some remarks explanatory of his motives for offering the amendment, Mr. CLAY withdrew it, at the request of Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, who said he had intended to propose a specific increased duty on a certain species of imported hempen cloth, and would co-operate in Mr. C.'s object, if allowed to vary it in some degree.

Mr. SMITH then proceeded with some additional remarks on particular features of the bill, involving commercial questions, which he discussed in that minute and technical manner which his practical acquaintance with the subject renders peculiar to him.

In the course of his remarks, Mr. S. submitted the following statements:

British Goods.

One yard cotton, valued at	-	-	-	-	25 cts.
Add ten per cent.	-	-	-	-	2.50c.

27.50c.

Duty of 25 per cent. on 27.50 is	-	-	-	-	7c.
Insurance, freight, transport to Liverpool, pack-of cotton, low-priced goods	-	-	-	-	1½c.

Average gain to the importer of twelve and a half per cent. on a cost of twenty cents	-	-	-	-	2½c.

On a cost of twenty cents	-	-	-	-	11c.
---------------------------	---	---	---	---	------

The manufacturer will then have an advantage over the importer of eleven cents per yard on an article which costs in England only twenty cents, and of course he will have that bounty given to him.

At 33½ per cent. the duty alone will be nine cents and a fraction, on cotton goods, which, on an average, cost twenty cents per yard in Manchester, and will cost the retailer thirteen cents per yard in addition to the prime cost.

An assortment of India goods, such as generally compose the cargoes imported into the United States, cost on an average nine cents per yard.

Cotton goods (cost what they will less) are charged in the bill as if they cost per yard twenty-five cents.

Add twenty per cent. to make the supposed value on arrival in the United States, five cents duty per yard.

The duty of twenty-five per cent. is charged on thirty cents, which, at twenty-five per cent. is	-	7½c.

Suppose a trunk of cotton goods to cost in Great Britain	-	-	-	-	£100 00

					£110 00

The duty of 25 per ct. ad valorem is charged on £110, and will be	-	-	-	-	27 10

Average gain expected by the importer	-	-	-	-	12 10
					£147 10

Every £100 sterling, the bona fide cost in England, will cost the retailer £147 10, or 47½ per cent. in favor of the American manufacturer, besides the difference in the price of the raw materials.

When Mr. S. concluded, the Committee rose, and obtained leave to sit again.

SATURDAY, March 23.

Mr. ROBERTSON, from the Committee on the Public Lands, reported a bill to provide for the appointment of a surveyor of the public lands for the Territories of Illinois and Missouri; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. ROBERTSON also reported a bill for the confirmation of certain claims to land in the western district of the State of Louisiana; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the whole House on Monday next.

Mr. R., from the same committee, reported the bill from the Senate "further supplementary to the act entitled 'An act providing for the indemnification of certain claimants of public land in the Mississippi Territory,'" without amendment, and the bill was committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. ROBERTSON also reported a bill supplementary to the act entitled "An act for the final adjustment of land titles in the State of Louisiana and Territory of Missouri," which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. R. also reported the bill from the Senate "for the relief of Edward Wilson," with amendments; which were read, and together with the bill committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. FORNEY, from the committee appointed on that subject, reported a bill to increase the compensation of the Clerk of the House of Representatives, (to $3,000,) which was twice read, and committed.

On motion of Mr. PLEASANTS, the House went into Committee of the Whole on the bill to place the surviving sufferers at Dartmoor prison on the Navy pension list; which was reported to the House with an amendment (making the pensions commence on the 6th of April, 1815, the day on which the Dartmoor massacre took place) and the bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The bill from the Senate, entitled "An act authorizing a subscription for the printing of a second edition of the public documents," was read the third time and passed.

The bill from the Senate, entitled "An act relating to settlers on the lands of the United States," was read the third time and passed.

ALLOWANCE OF INTEREST.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a report from the Secretary of War, in obedience to the resolution of the 21st instant, respecting the allowance of interest on charges against the War Department; which was read and ordered to lie on the table.

The letter is as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, March 23, 1816.

SIR: In obedience to the resolution of the House of Representatives of the 21st instant, I have the honor to state that the general usage of the War Department has been to pay no interest upon any demand whatever, without regard to its origin.

During the latter part of the year 1814, and through the whole of 1815, the Department, being unable to discharge the multiplied and extensive demands which were made upon it, in some instances authorized different officers employed in disbursing the public money, and various contractors, to obtain money upon a loan; and, in some instances, where their bills were presented and remained unpaid for the want of funds, assurances were given to the banks that interest would be paid upon them if they were taken up by them. In all such cases, interest has been paid. Interest has also been allowed upon bills drawn by contractors pursuant to their contracts, which have been protested for the want of funds. This is the only case in which it has been allowed, except upon special agreement to that effect. No distinction has been made between bills drawn for money actually received by a public agent and for debts contracted by such agent in the course of his official duty.

I have the honor to be your most obedient and very humble servant,

WM. H. CRAWFORD.

HON. HENRY CLAY, Speaker.

14th CON. 1st Sess.—40

STAFF OF THE ARMY.

The engrossed bill to organize a general staff for the Army, was read the third time.

An inquiry made by Mr. HARDIN into the necessity of one of the officers named in the bill, (the Commissary General of Purchases,) the nature of his duties, &c., produced a short discussion on that point.

MESSRS. GROSVENOR and PICKERING argued that the duties of the Commissary General and those of the Superintendent General of Purchases, were in fact the same; that one of the offices was useless, and ought to be abolished, &c.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, explained the various duties of the officers referred to, the dissimilar character of their duties, their separate responsibilities, and the necessity of both to form a complete staff, &c.

The yeas and nays being demanded by Mr. DAVENPORT, the question on the passage of the bill was decided in the affirmative—yeas 96, nays 22, as follows:

YEAS—MESSRS. Adgate, Archer, Bateman, Bennett, Betts, Birdsall, Boss, Bradbury, Breckenridge, Brooks, Brown, Bryan, Burwell, Caldwell, Calhoun, Champion, Chappell, Clarke of North Carolina, Clark of Kentucky, Clayton, Clendennin, Comstock, Condict, Crawford, Crocheron, Cuthbert, Darlington, Desha, Edwards, Forsyth, Gaston, Gold, Goodwyn, Griffin, Grosvenor, Hahn, Hall, Hammond, Heister, Henderson, Hopkinson, Huger, Hungerford, Irving of New York, Jackson, Johnson of Virginia, Johnson of Kentucky, Kerr of Virginia, King of North Carolina, Lowndes, Lumpkin, Lyle, Maclay, Mayrant, McCoy, McLean of Kentucky, McLean of Ohio, Middleton, Moore, Nelson of Massachusetts, Nelson of Virginia, Newton, Pickens, Pickering, Pleasants, Powell, Reynolds, Roane, Robertson, Ross, Ruggles, Savage, Smith of Maryland, Southard, Strong, Sturges, Tate, Taul, Taylor of South Carolina, Telfair, Throop, Townsend, Tucker, Wallace, Ward of Massachusetts, Ward of New York, Ward of New Jersey, Webster, Wendover, Whiteside, Wilcox, Wilde, Wilkin, Willoughby, William Wilson, and Yates.

NAYS—MESSRS. Atherton, Cady, Cilley, Cooper, Culpeper, Davenport, Hale, Hardin, Jewett, Kent, Langdon, Law, Lewis, Lyon, Marsh, Mason, Milnor, Noyes, Stanford, Stearns, Vose, and Wheaton.

CUMBERLAND ROAD.

Mr. JACKSON, from the committee to whom was referred the Message of the President of the United States, of the 12th instant, containing a statement of proceedings in relation to the execution of the act to regulate the laying out and making a road from Cumberland, in the State of Maryland, to the State of Ohio, made a report thereon; which was read, and committed to the Committee of the whole House on the bill making appropriations for the support of Government for the year 1816. The report is as follows:

That they have attentively considered the subject confided to them, and respectfully submit to the House the following facts and observations: It appears by an act of Congress, passed on the 1st of May, 1802, entitled "An act to enable the people of the eastern division of the Territory northwest of the river Ohio to form a constitution and State government, and for the admission of such State into the Union, on an equal footing with the original States, and for other purposes," that on condition that the Convention of the said State would provide by an ordinance, irrevocable without the consent of the United States, that each tract of land sold by Congress, after the 30th of June next, ensuing, shall be, and remain exempt from any tax laid by order or under authority of the State, whether for State, county, township, or any other purpose whatever, for the term of five years from and after the day of sale: the United States among other stipulations agreed to apply one-twentieth part of the net proceeds arising from the sale of said lands, from and after the said 30th of June, to the laying out and making public roads, leading from the navigable waters emptying into the Atlantic, to the Ohio, to the said State, and through the same; such roads laid out under the authority of Congress, with the consent of the several States through which the same shall pass. It further appears that these conditions were accepted by the State of Ohio, on the 29th of November in the same year, subject, as regards the road fund, to a modification which provides that three per cent. of the net proceeds arising from the sales aforesaid should be subject to the control of the Legislature of that State, and be applied to the making roads within the same. It also appears by an act passed on the 3d of March, 1803, that this modification received the sanction of Congress; and that in pursuance of this compact a law was passed on the 28th of March, 1806, authorizing the President of the United States to appoint commissioners to lay out a road from Cumberland, or a point in its vicinity, to the river Ohio; and, on their report, to pursue such measures as in his opinion were proper, to obtain from the States through which the road was laid out their consent to its location and completion.

It further appears to the committee that the location crossing portions of the States of Maryland, Pennsylvania, and Virginia, applications were made to their respective Legislatures, and permission was given by each, to open and establish the said road.

By the report of the Secretary of the Treasury referred to the committee, it appears that of the appropriations heretofore made towards completing this road, and amounting in the whole to the sum of $410,000 00
There have been expended $285,786 60
Carried to the surplus fund 22,679 75

308,466 35

Leaving a balance on the 27th of February, 1816, of - - - - - 101,513 65 applicable to that object. And that a further appropriation of $300,000 is recommended by that report to complete the road to Brownsville on the Monongahela river; to cover the expenses of a survey from thence by Washington and Alexandria to Wheeling, and to make the road at and from Wheeling to the one hundred and thirteenth mile tree, a distance of about twelve miles.

It also appears, by the letter of the superintendent of the road to the Secretary of the Treasury, that frequent abuses are committed on the road, such as throwing down the walls, digging away the banks, &c. and he suggests that measures ought to be promptly adopted to prevent, and to punish these outrages.

This investigation suggested to the committee two points of inquiry, to which their attention has been directed. First, the necessity of protecting the work already completed against lawless violence; and, secondly, the propriety of making an ample appropriation for advancing its progress to completion, in order that the benefits it promises may soon be realized.

In considering the first point, although it appears that the Secretary of the Treasury, in his letter communicated at the last session, doubts the authority of Congress to pass any laws for punishing the offenders, the committee do not perceive any defect of jurisdiction. Without controverting the opinion that the Constitution does not, in virtue of any grant of power conferred by that instrument, authorize Congress to open roads and canals in any State, it seems to be admitted by all, that if a compact be made with a State, for which the nation receives an equivalent, as in this case, whereby it is agreed that a road shall be opened by the Government of the Union, and the States through which the road passes grant the right to make it, that the performance of such compact is not in contravention of that construction; as it is believed that the exercise of such power has in no instance been doubted, notwithstanding the repeated acts of legislation for a period of thirteen years. The permission of the States having been given, it follows as a necessary consequence, that all the powers obviously necessary and proper to carry the grant into complete effect and preserve it inviolable have been conferred also. A different construction would render the consent a nullity, and exempt from punishment, as well the individuals who resisted the execution of the work, as those that afterwards destroyed it.

If the right to punish these offences belongs to the National Government, it may be effected without the passage of any law, by indictment or information in the courts of the United States; or by enacting statutory provisions fixing the penalties. It being a fundamental right of the judiciary inherent in every Government to punish all offences, against the laws passed in pursuance of a delegated power, independently of express legislative sanctions. Although the committee deem it proper to make this explicit assertion of a right which it may become necessary to exercise on some future occasion, in case of a peremptory refusal by a State to pass any law upon the subject, yet as they believe no such disposition exists in relation to the road in question, and the prosecutions under State laws may be most effectual in preventing the practices complained of, because of the distances to the places where the respective Federal courts are held, they abstain from recommending, at this time, the passage of any law upon that subject.

In regard to the second branch of the inquiry, viz: the amount of appropriation proper to be made at the present session, it appears to the committee, that although the fund chargeable with the reimbursement of expenditures has been anticipated, it is growing more productive every year and will be eventually adequate to defray the expenses of completing the road.

If Congress persevere with becoming spirit in this great public work, we shall soon see one of the best roads in the world over the chains of mountains which separate the western from the Atlantic waters, and which, but a few years since, were supposed to present insurmountable obstacles to a safe and easy intercourse. The committee learn, with much satisfaction, that the State of Maryland is engaged in extending the turnpike road that reaches from Baltimore to Boonesborough, on to Fort Cumberland; and, in all probability, it will be completed before the national road from that point to the Ohio is finished.

MARCH, 1816.

Attorney General.

H. OF R.

It is not intended to expatiate at large upon the moral, political, and physical advantages of this road to the nation. They doubtless entered fully into the contemplation of the Congress by whom the original law was passed; time and experience have given the fulness of their sanctions to the wisdom of their decision; and it is alike a source of surprise and regret to the committee, that the work has been suffered, with the ample means possessed by the Government, to linger for a period of more than nine years. A vigorous prosecution of it now can alone, in any degree, repair the past neglect; and, in the estimation of the committee, no subject is more deserving the favor of Congress. They are aware of the opinion entertained by some that the Western country already holds out sufficient lures to the inhabitants of the Atlantic States to migrate thither, and that it is impolitic to contribute to their increase, which will be the effect, as it is supposed, of giving facilities to such removal. The error of this reasoning is proved by the infallible test of experience, applied to the past and present population of the States and Territories west of the mountains. The emigrant removes with intention to reside for life in his new habitation; and when he determines upon such removal, he bestows but little attention upon the inquiry whether the road on which he has to travel is a very good one, or in the condition of the principal State roads now used. This policy, therefore, although it cannot prevent him from going to the West, may, and, if persisted in, soon will materially affect his future connexions with the Eastern country in all the ramifications of a mutually profitable trade and intercourse. The natural advantages of a water over a land communication for the purposes of transporting all articles of merchandise, will not be denied by any; and trade will always seek that channel which affords it the fairest prospects of realizing its legitimate profits. Whenever, therefore, land and water communication are found to possess a fair competition with each other in any country, the improvements on both must be equal to prevent the monopoly of either.

The navigation of the Mississippi and Ohio rivers, by steamboats, is now in its infancy; its success is no longer doubtful, and it is increasing with a rapidity corresponding to that success. During the last years the sugar and cotton of Louisiana were brought up by the water to Pittsburg, and, in consequence of the extraordinary demand, were transported thence in wagons to the Atlantic cities, and sold at prices affording a profit to the owner. With the great advantages of steam navigation, unless the roads across the mountains are much improved, the merchants of the Western country will cease to purchase goods from the importers at New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, &c., and New Orleans will soon become the sole emporium of their trade.

This result never can be produced if a due attention be paid to the improvement of the means of internal communication. The rivers that take their rise in the mountains may be made navigable. In various sections of the country, the portage between them can be diminished to an inconsiderable distance, and roads passing over the entire route will present an option to the merchants as to the mode of transportation. Their connexions have been formed for a considerable period. These have begotten confidence, and a mutuality of interests which bind the parties to a future intercourse, and which will not be changed unless for a positive and unequivocal benefit.

But the advantages of an intimate commercial connexion, though addressed to the interest of the parties, are not the most important. Good roads have an influence over physical impossibilities. By diminishing the natural impediments, they bring places and their inhabitants nigher to each other. They increase the value of lands, and the fruits of the earth in remote situations, and by enlarging the sphere of supply, prevent those sudden fluctuations of prices, alike prejudicial to the grower and consumer. They promote a free intercourse among the citizens of remote places, by which unfounded prejudices and animosities are dissipated, local and sectional feelings are destroyed, and a nationality of character, so desirable to be encouraged, is universally inculcated.

The road, which is the subject of the particular inquiry of the committee, has additional recommendations. It leads as far as Washington, Pennsylvania, in a direct line from the Seat of Government to the important frontier of the United States on the Upper Lakes; and if, as the committee suppose, it be the true policy of the nation to have a direct military communication for the entire distance, a road can be extended from Washington, and passing, as it will, through a large extent of public lands, inducements will be held out to the Western settlers to purchase them, and by a rapid increase of the population, the necessity of keeping up a considerable military force in that quarter will be diminished, if not entirely superseded.

These constitute a part of the reasons which have induced the committee to recommend an appropriation of three hundred thousand dollars at this time, and therefore they submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That the bill entitled "an act making appropriations for the support of Government for the year 1816," be amended in the — line by inserting the following paragraph:

"For making the road from Cumberland, in the State of Maryland, to the State of Ohio, to be repaid out of the five per cent. fund reserved for that purpose, $300,000."

ATTORNEY GENERAL.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

I transmit to the House of Representatives a report from the Secretary of the Treasury, complying with their resolution of the 29th of February last.

JAMES MADISON.

MARCH 22, 1816.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, March 21, 1816.

The Secretary of the Treasury, to whom the President of the United States referred the resolution of the 29th of February, 1816, requesting that there be laid before the House of Representatives "a statement of the cases in which he has employed, or caused to be employed, counsel to assist the Attorney General prosecuting causes in the Supreme Court of the United States; stating, as nearly as may be, the amount of the property in dispute in each case, the names of the counsel so employed, the period of employing them, and the compensation granted to them in each case; also the manner of making such compensation, and the fund out of which the same was paid," has the honor to present the following report:

That it appears to have been the practice of the Government to employ counsel to assist the Attorney General, and also the district attorneys, in cases of great importance, either as to the principle or as to the value involved in the controversy. Thus, for example, so early as the February term, 1796, of the Supreme Court, Alexander Hamilton received a fee of $500 to assist the Attorney General in maintaining the affirmative upon the question respecting the Constitutionality of the carriage tax; and Alexander Campbell and Jared Ingersoll, counsel, maintaining the negative, received a fee of $233 33, under an agreement that, for the purpose of obtaining a final decision, the United States should pay all the expenses incident to the transfer of the cause from the circuit court to the Supreme Court.

H. of R.

Attorney General.

MARCH, 1816.

That on the 24th of March, 1804, in obedience to a resolution of the House of Representatives of the 3d of the same month, the Secretary of the Treasury presented a statement "of all the moneys which, since the establishment of the present Government, had been paid at the Treasury of the United States as fees to assistant counsel, and for legal advice in the business of the United States, in which were distinguished the several sums, when paid, for what services, and to whom paid respectively," amounting, in the whole, to the sum of $5,022 16.

That the statement hereunto annexed, marked A, contains a like specification of all the moneys paid, or payable, at the Treasury of the United States, from the 24th of March, 1804, until the present time, for the employment of counsel to assist, or to represent, the Attorney General in causes depending in the Supreme Court of the United States, amounting, in the whole, to the sum of $4,540.

That this Department does not possess the means of stating the amount of the property in dispute, in each case, in which assistant counsel has been employed in the Supreme Court; but it is confidently believed, from general information, that in every such case, either the value of the property was great, or the principle of the controversy was important; or the employment of assistant counsel in the cases of sickness, or other casualties, was essential to the public interests, as will more particularly appear by the notes accompanying statement A.

That the manner of making the compensation to the assistant counsel has uniformly been by issuing the warrants of the Secretary of the Treasury, founded upon the official settlement of the Comptroller and Auditor; and by paying the amount, either out of the appropriation, annually passed by Congress, "for the discharge of such miscellaneous claims against the United States, not otherwise provided for, as shall have been admitted in due course of settlement at the Treasury;" or out of the appropriations annually made "for the discharge of such demands against the United States, on account of the civil department, not otherwise provided for, as shall have been admitted in due course of settlement at the Treasury."

All which is respectfully submitted.

A. J. DALLAS,
Secretary of the Treasury.

STATEMENT A.

March 19, 1805.—Alexander James Dallas was employed to assist the Attorney General in the Supreme Court, upon the argument of the case of the United States vs. the assignees of Blight, a bankrupt, for which he received a compensation of - - - - $500

Note.—In this case, the claim of a general priority for the satisfaction of debts due to the United States, occurred. The amount in dispute was considerable, but the principle involved was of much more importance. The Attorney General being indisposed, the assistant counsel argued the case alone.

January 1, 1813.—Alexander James Dallas was employed to assist the Attorney General in the case of the French Government schooner Balou, (formerly the Exchange), and generally in the business of the United States, at February term, 1812, for which he received a compensation of - - - - 1,200

Note.—The Balou was a public armed vessel of France, attached in the port of Philadelphia by persons claiming her as their property. The case involved the important question whether such an attachment would lie; and on the remonstrance of the Minister of France, the President directed it to be brought before the Supreme Court. Mr. Pinkney, the Attorney General, being recently appointed, requested also some general assistance in the business of the term, to prevent delay. Mr. Dallas argued the case of the Exchange, and ten other cases.

May 14, 1808.—Walter Jones was employed to assist the Attorney General in the Supreme Court, upon the argument of the case of the United States vs. the schooner Betsey and Charlotte, William Yeaton, claimant, for which he received a compensation of - - 200

February 7, 1814.—William Pinkney, having resigned the office of Attorney General, was employed as counsel to argue the cases of the United States depending in the Supreme Court at February term, 1814, for which he received a compensation of - - - 1,000

Note.—Mr. Pinkney's resignation, though previously intimated, was not received until the term had commenced; and Mr. Rush, who was appointed his successor, could not take the oath of office, under his commission dated the 10th of February, 1814, until the 12th of the same month. In accepting his appointment, it was explicitly understood that he did not undertake to argue the causes of the United States during the current term, as it would have been impracticable to read the records, and to make the necessary preparation. It was, therefore, an alternative, either to postpone the public business until the next term, or to engage the services of Mr. Pinkney, who had a previous knowledge of the records. He was accordingly engaged, and he procured decisions in many important cases, besides giving a general attention to the interests of the United States throughout the term. Mr. Pinkney's compensation has not been paid at the Treasury, but has been credited in his account as Minister at the Court of London.

THE TARIFF.

The House then again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill to regulate the tariff of duties.

Mr. BETTS made a motion to strike out the words ad valorem, in the clause fixing the duty on woollens and cottons; which was negatived, ayes 40, noes 65.

Mr. WEBSTER submitted a motion to alter the tariff proposed on cottons, by laying a maximum duty of thirty per cent. for two years, and then gradually reducing it to — per cent. Mr. W. offered several arguments in support of his motion, but, at the suggestion of Mr. LOWNDES, he withdrew it, for the present, to wait some information which would enable the House to act more understandingly on the subject.

Mr. WARD, of Massachusetts, moved an amendment, the object of which, substantially, was to defer the operation of the duties on India cottons, proposed by the bill, to January next. He offered this motion to protect the merchants engaged in the India trade from the ruin which would inevitably be inflicted on them by the duties proposed if laid suddenly, after merchants had goods on their way home or ordered, and without sufficient notice to enable them to frame their measures accordingly.

Mr. LOWNDES opposed the motion. If the duty was necessary at all to secure our manufacturers, it was necessary to commence its operation without delay; and he thought the gentleman would find that more mischief would ensue to the manufacturing interest from the delay he proposed than would be prevented to the mercantile class from its adoption.

Mr. HULBERT was also hostile to the motion. It was said that the bill would ruin the India merchants; he wished the merchants all possible success and happiness, but he wished well also to the manufacturers; and to save them from ruin it was necessary to act promptly. This is the moment, said Mr. H.—the physician is not wanted after the patient is dead; and if the manufacturers are suffered now to go down, it will be impossible hereafter to resuscitate them. He hoped at least that his colleague would for the present withdraw his motion, for the reason stated on Mr. WEBSTER'S.

Mr. WARD supported his motion, and replied to the objections which had been made to it. It was not his object to ruin, nor would it ruin, any part of the community—but to save a valuable class of citizens from destruction. He argued that the time asked for would not be so injurious to the manufacturers as was predicted; because they would be able to get on very well under the double duties that would still be in force; but the merchants he alluded to had no relief at all.

After some remarks by Mr. PICKERING, on the impropriety of producing a prohibition of a particular trade by high duties which it was wrong to do by a direct interdiction, Mr. WARD, for the present, withdrew his motion.

Mr. MILLNOR moved to strike out the proposed duty of five cents per bushel on coal; which motion, however, he subsequently withdrew.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, then, with the view of encouraging and protecting the great quantity of machinery erected in different parts of the country for rolling and slitting iron, and encouraging that manufacture, and showing by several statements that the proposed duty was an insufficient protection—moved to increase the duty on the imported iron sheets, rod and bolts, from one hundred and fifty cents to two hundred and fifty cents per hundred weight.

The motion was supported by Messrs. IRVING of New York, ROOR, and CONDUCT, and carried without a division.

Mr. SMITH then moved to increase the duty on lump and loaf sugar to eighteen cents per pound—believing that the manufactories of the article now established in the United States were fully able to supply the whole country, and the duty proposed by the bill being in his opinion insufficient to protect those establishments from a successful foreign competition.

Mr. SMITH afterwards gave way to Mr. HUGER, who wished to reduce the duty of four cents per pound on brown sugar; believing that no protection was necessary to encourage the manufacture of that article, by which large fortunes were now making, and which it was unnecessary to encourage by taxing the community for that purpose. Mr. H. then moved to strike out the proposed duty of four cents, with the view, if successful, of filling the blank with two and an half cents.

Mr. ROBERTSON said: I rise Mr. Chairman, to oppose the motion of the gentleman from South Carolina. Before, however, I enter on my reply, I beg leave to make a few observations of a general nature, but strictly applicable to the question under consideration.

I think I am founded in saying, that the proposition of the Secretary of the Treasury, now brought forward by the gentleman from South Carolina, has resulted from inattention or forgetfulness; it can be traced to no other source; it can be executed on no other ground; for it is at war with every principle he has laid down, and violates the whole system which he professes to approve. I will not repeat his principles or his plans; they are before the eyes of every gentleman in the House. I content myself with saying again, that his plan of reduction in regard to the duty on sugar, is a clear and manifest violation of his own principles, and at war with the whole system.

The State of Louisiana, Mr. Chairman, from its happy climate and fertile soil, is competent to furnish the United States with all the sugar they may require; but that this may be done with certainty and within a short time, some encouragement is indispensable. Is any manufacture more important to the nation? Is there one which may be aided by a tax on its foreign competition with less injustice to the community, or with greater advantage to the revenue? Gentlemen call it an agricultural product; is that sufficient to render it an object of prejudice? Have our manufacturers already, by their combinations, succeeded in placing their employment on higher ground than that of the agriculturist? But, say gentlemen, why not hold out encouragement to the manufacturer of flour, to the growers of rice, tobacco, wheat, &c.? Is it possible that an argument of this kind can have any weight; is it seriously urged? Let me ask gentlemen, if tobacco, rice, and wheat, were interfered with by foreign importation, whether they would not see the propriety of giving that aid, by which we should be enabled to raise these important products within our own country? Would it not be wise to do so? Would not a dependence on foreign supply for these essential articles, be fatal to our happiness and prosperity? And let them ask themselves if the cane were the favorite culture of their State, whether they would not see the propriety of sustaining it against the rival efforts of a foreign country?

In the decision of this question, the interests of Louisiana are not alone concerned. Is it not important that in time of war we should be furnished with this valuable article? Let the situation of the country, little more than a year ago, answer the question. The States of the Union may hereafter not only be supplied with sugar from a sister State, but supplied at a cheap rate; the steamboat navigation of the Mississippi and its various waters will produce this effect. The high price during the war grew simply out of the want of transportation; this state of things will never again occur.

In times of peace the distant and extensive trade with New Orleans will give employment to our maritime industry; thus substituting a trade with one of the States of the Union, for that with the West Indies, and which we already have lost. Whilst an exclusion of all other foreign manufactures, however beneficial to our international prosperity, destroys a commerce, if in no other point of view desirable, important to navigation, let us take care, that while we promote manufactures, we do not so far annihilate commerce as to destroy maritime industry, and thus cut off the right arm of the nation. Commerce, considered in regard to America, is maritime strength; render useless the merchant, and you may save yourself the expense of building vessels of war. In the hour of battle they will be without seamen. The planter of Louisiana offers you a valuable manufacture, an extensive commerce, and an increased revenue; but the cotton manufacturer, who destroys your voyages to the East Indies, offers you none other in return. Our intercourse with foreign nations can never be entirely cut off; it will be always sufficient to breed dispute, and produce war. Let it be also sufficient, if it plunge us into war; to carry us through it with success and honor; to this end maritime force is necessary.

The duty paid on imported sugars, if taken from the pocket of the consumer, augments the public Treasury, because, although it affects the price, it will not in the same degree affect the quantity imported; whereas the duty laid on imported cottons, by excluding them entirely, is added to the price of the domestic manufacture, taken out of the pocket of the consumer, and put into that of the manufacturer; thus, in the one case, we pay a tax to the public, in the other, to individuals. Gentlemen have indulged themselves in the most extravagant misrepresentations in regard to the wealth of the planters of Louisiana; whence they have received their information, I know not. They have probably formed their opinions from the false and ridiculous statements which we have seen of the great profits of the cultivation in Georgia; and a gentleman from South Carolina tells us that his constituents are running into the business with the utmost alacrity. This may be so, but I beg leave to tell the gentleman, that after a very little while, they will run with redoubled alacrity out of it; it will not answer. The sugar planters of Louisiana are not so enormously rich as gentlemen affect to believe; I know some who have been ruined; many who have done nothing more than hold their own; a few, and these generally with all the advantages of commencing with large capitals, independent, if you please, rich. But the same may be said of our cotton planters and our merchants. There is nothing, as yet, which very advantageously distinguishes the cultivation of the cane. I believe the planters stand in need of the protecting care of Government; in their behalf I ask it. I have no personal interest. I am not a sugar maker, and from present prospects I believe I never shall be. I have not brought my private feeling into operation on this question. I wish it were the case that no pecuniary consideration could ever be seen to shape or decide our political course.

In regard to every article mentioned in the tariff, one excepted, the people of Louisiana are the purchasers and consumers; they are to be heavily taxed to augment the wealth of other parts of the country; they are willing to make the sacrifice—but they ask in return reciprocal sacrifices; they ask protection to their single manufacture—to that employment in which more capital is embarked, in relation to the State, than in any other in any State in the Union, in regard to its wealth and resources. I suppose the capital thus employed amounts to nearly $20,000,000, one-third of the agricultural and manufacturing wealth of the nation. Does any manufacture, in any other State, bear as great a proportion to its wealth?

MARCH, 1816.

The Tariff.

H. OF R.

The motion of the gentleman has a most important bearing on the revenue of the nation, as well as on the prosperity of Louisiana; if it succeed, it will strike off about $900,000 from the receipts of the Treasury. Does the gentleman propose to make up the loss by additional taxes on other articles? On what can it be laid with more propriety? No idea is entertained of increasing the direct tax, and augmented duties on any other subject will amount to a total prohibition or invite extensive smuggling; if the article be bulky, it will not be imported, if it be otherwise, it will be surreptitiously introduced—in either event, no benefit accrues to the customs.

My friend from South Carolina, the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, who, I hesitate not to say, is better acquainted with the fiscal concerns of the nation than any member of this House, has recommended the duty which I now advocate; he tells you explicitly, it is required by the necessities of the Government. Impartial and intelligent as he is, he has not said as much in regard to any other tax; he has not supported high duties on cotton and woollen goods, because no benefit would result to the public from laying them; they would, as they will, cease to be imported, or be smuggled; and the benefit to the nation, if either of these should occur, cannot be easily perceived; no danger of this kind is to be apprehended in respect to sugar, it is too bulky to be smuggled, and too necessary to the community to be dispensed with.

I fear, Mr. Chairman, that an interest is springing up before which every other is to be prostrated; the mere manufacturer is to be preferred; whether he be a manufacturer of the raw material, produced by our own country, or that of other States, is not to be asked—whatever injury be done to the revenue, whatever ruin be brought on maritime industry, however much the agriculturist suffer, the manufacturer must and will be encouraged. Does the manufacturer of wool want encouragement, foreign cloth is shut out, the value of the duties given up, and the competition, so beneficial to the consumer, is destroyed; does the farmer ask to be protected in raising sheep, so as to furnish the raw material, the necessary duty on foreign wool is denied, because it is convenient and profitable to the manufacturer to purchase wool as cheap as possible, whether it be foreign or native. Apply the same examination to other subjects—does the sugar refiner ask it, foreign refined sugar is excluded from the market by enormous duties; does the grower of the raw material solicit protection, it is denied, because it is convenient and profitable to the refiner to obtain the raw material as cheap as possible. I will detain the House no longer. I have endeavored to show that it is as important to the interests of the nation to protect the cultivation of the cane and the manufacture of sugar, as any other manufacture whatever; that, by so doing, in opposition to what will occur from augmenting the duties on imported goods generally, you encourage the commerce and navigation and add to the revenues of the nation. I hope the motion will not prevail.

Mr. HUGER acknowledged that the statements he had just heard had done away much of his objection to the duty proposed in the bill, and if the gentleman from Louisiana could convince him that the cultivators of sugar could not go on safely without the duty, he would not press his motion further; but he apprehended the gentleman had been in some measure influenced by his feelings, and, not being a grower himself, might be misled by an imperfect acquaintance with this subject.

Mr. ROBERTSON replied at some length to Mr. HUGER, in support of his previous statement; after whom

Mr. LOWNDES made a few remarks on the same side. He argued that the manufacture of sugar demanded encouragement as strongly as any other, and that he thought the duty proposed by the bill was even too low, being a very small increase on the specific duty; and it was as necessary for the purpose of revenue as the protection of the article.

Mr. SHERFEY said, he was in favor of the motion. He objected to a high duty being laid for the purpose of revenue, because it would press too heavily on the poorer classes. Sugar had become an article of necessity, and was used almost as much by the poor as the rich; it was taxing the poor, therefore, to impose a heavy duty on it. As to the necessity of protecting the article, the increase of the culture for several years was a sufficient argument that it was profitable, and needed no protection. Self-interest, he said, was eagled, and would pursue only what was productive of profit. Mr. S. resorted to a variety of other arguments to show that two and an half cents would be an ample duty on the article, either for protection or revenue.

Mr. CALHOUN made a few remarks against the motion. He dwelt on the great importance of the article, and the expediency of encouraging its production in our own country, by which our supplies would be so much more certain; and he enforced particularly the necessity of encouraging all those articles at home, for which we now depended on the West Indies, to which the trade was so precarious that a proclamation from the Governor of an island might any moment cut it off.

Several other gentlemen entered into this debate, whose remarks cannot be given in the above condensed manner. Mr. WILDE opposed the motion, and Messrs. MILNOR, PICKERING, and PITKIN, advocated it.

The question on striking out the sum of four cents was then taken, and carried—ayes 62, noes 55.

Mr. PITKIN moved to fill the blank with three cents.

Mr. FORSYTH proposed to fill it with five cents, and spoke some time in support of a high duty on the article; which, he said, would be cultivated very extensively in Georgia, if proper encouragement were given to it by the Government.

Mr. F. protested also with warmth against the injustice of taxing the South to support the manufacturers of the East, and yet denying to the South any security for their manufactures in return.

Mr. ROBERTSON also advocated this motion, and Mr. PITKIN opposed it; when

The question on five cents was negatived.

Mr. CLAY then moved to fill the blank with three cents and a half, but hoped some gentleman would propose to restore four cents; in favor of which Mr. C. argued at some length.

Mr. GASTON spoke a short time in opposition to the proposed duty; and earnestly entreated the House to consider those unfortunate manufacturing States, which were burdened on the one hand to encourage the manufactures of the East, and taxed on the other to protect the products of the South, &c.

After an ineffectual attempt by Mr. WOODWARD to obtain a reconsideration of the question on striking out, with the view of moving to restore four cents; his reasons for which he briefly stated,

The question on filling the blank with three and a half cents, was carried—ayes 64, noes 58.

The Committee then rose, reported progress, and obtained leave to sit again.

And on motion, the House adjourned until Monday.

MONDAY, March 25.

Mr. IRVING presented a petition of Jacob Barker, of the city of New York, praying that certain suits instituted against the endorsers of certain bills of exchange drawn by him on his agents in London, in the Kingdom of Great Britain, during the late war with that country, (which were sold to the Government of the United States and were returned protested in consequence of the British Government having prohibited its subjects from trading in the United States stock, upon which the said bills were bottomed,) may be discontinued upon their returning the purchase money given for the said bills, together with interest and all the costs which have accrued thereon.—The petition was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. PLEASANTS, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the bill from the Senate "respecting the late officers and crew of the sloop-of-war Wasp," reported the same without amendment, and the bill was committed to a Committee of the Whole.

An engrossed bill entitled "An act placing certain persons on the list of Navy pensioners," [wounded at Dartmoor prison] was read the third time and passed.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a bill "for the relief of John Holkar, formerly Consul General of France to the United States;" also, a bill "for the relief of the Baltimore and Massachusetts Bible Societies;" in which bills they ask the concurrence of this House.

BANKS IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. TUCKER, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the petitions of sundry banking associations in said District, praying for charters, made a detailed report thereon, favorable to the prayer of the petitioners, on their complying with certain conditions; which was ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

The report is as follows:

The committee have participated in that deep and general concern to which the unauthorized establishment of banking associations throughout the country has given rise. They will forbear to dilate upon the incalculable evils which inevitably flow from suffering any association of individuals, who choose to engage in such pursuit, to pour into the circulation of the country a flood of bank paper at their discretion. The general sentiment has been so perfectly settled on this subject, and has been so entirely justified by the lessons of a dear bought experience, that your committee have chosen rather to avoid unprofitable speculations, and to act at once upon the subject, by the introduction of a bill, which has already been reported, for the suppression of the notes of the unchartered banks. The provisions of that bill (however harsh they may appear) are believed by your committee to be essentially necessary to effect the great and important end which they have in view, in common, as they believe, with other members of the Congress of the United States. They have recommended the punishment of the persons engaged in banking, and of the officers of such institutions, rather than a general penalty on the circulation of the notes of unchartered banks, because the experience of an adjoining State has sufficiently demonstrated that provisions of the latter description cannot be carried into execution. A large proportion of society becoming implicated in the offence, it becomes impossible to enforce the provisions of the law, however wise in its views, and salutary in its design.

But whilst your committee unhesitatingly recommend the prohibition of the establishment of new banks, the maturest reflection has convinced them, that the existing state of things absolutely requires those which have gone into operation within the District without charters, to be incorporated, and suffered to continue an employment of their capital, which was legitimate when their associations were formed. In presenting their views on this subject, your committee will ask attention to the following considerations:

1. What are the evils that can fairly be anticipated from chartering the unincorporated banks?
2. What are the evils which are likely to ensue from arresting them in the course of their business?
3. What are the public advantages that may be derived from their incorporation?

It is of material consequence, in determining the first of these questions, to observe, that it is proposed by the committee to make the resumption of specie payments by the banks an essential condition of the charters, and to prohibit the suspension of specie redemption, under the penalty of forfeiting their privileges as a corporation. With such a provision, they indulge the hope that no evil of sufficient magnitude can fairly be apprehended from incorporating the banking companies now in operation.

An opinion has been entertained by some, that the amount of bank capital in the District far exceeds its wants, and that it is better to limit it by putting down a part of the existing unchartered banks, if not the whole. It is believed that this opinion is founded on a misapprehension of the amount of capital in the District, and is also contradicted by facts which admit not of controversion.

MARCH, 1816.

Banks in the District of Columbia.

H. OF R.

The actual bank capital of the District of Columbia is as follows:

Actual capital of the chartered banks, appearing from a printed statement before the House	$3,321,597
Proposed capital of six unchartered banks, which it is contemplated to incorporate, each $500,000	3,000,000
	$6,321,597

The actual capital of the six unchartered banks does not amount, it is believed, to more than two millions at the present time, and the sum of five hundred thousand dollars has been fixed on as the amount of the capital of each, because it is probable the demand for bank capital may increase before the expiration of the proposed charters, and because the provisions of the National Bank bill prohibit the granting of any others.

This capital of five millions three hundred thousand dollars, is not confined in its active operations, and its beneficial effects, to the population of the three towns in the District, amounting to about twenty thousand souls. Even if it were, it is believed it would not exceed the proportion of bank capital in Baltimore to the population of that city. But when we take into the estimate the extensive and rich country on the shores of the Potomac, and even of the Shenandoah, stretching up nearly two hundred miles West and Southwest into Virginia, whose produce chiefly centres in this District, and whose prosperity is, in some measure, dependent on the command of capital here, we may venture to doubt the accuracy of that opinion which pronounces the banking capital too large. A single fact ought to place this matter beyond doubt. It is the fact, that there is no difficulty in the employment of the capital. That capital cannot, it is believed, be justly pronounced to be too large, which, so far from exceeding the demand for capital, does not even now meet the extent of that demand. It is notorious, that the banks of this District are even now unable to discount all the paper which is offered them by men of unquestionable solvency, of the highest respectability, and engaged in the most laudable and lucrative employments; and though this incapacity proceeds, in some measure, from the absorption by Government stock of a part of their capital, yet that circumstance is neither supposed to be of sufficient importance to vary materially the position assumed, nor ought it indeed to be taken into the estimate.

The only evil it is supposed that can be plausibly assigned as likely to flow from the chartering of the unincorporated banks, is that which may be supposed to arise from a surcharged circulation of their paper. So long as banks continue their operations without redeeming their notes in specie, this is a well grounded apprehension. The love of gain—one of the most powerful instincts of the human heart—without the salutary check of specie redemption, will always tempt banking associations to overtrade. But the necessity of paying specie for their notes when demanded, affords an ample check to that propensity, at least in the present state of our public affairs. The committee will not intrude upon the House a disquisition, on a proposition so plain as to be at present almost received as an axiom, that an excessive issue of notes will furnish its own check, if banks redeem with punctuality the notes they send into circulation. And as the principle of specie redemption is the foundation of this report, it is believed that no evil will ensue from the adoption of the measure recommended by them.

2. The evils which are likely to ensue from suppressing the chartered banks already in operation, are, on the other hand, believed to be great and manifest.

Your committee are not in possession of any statement of the concerns of the several banks, from which it can be accurately known what amount has been discounted or lent by the unincorporated associations to individuals. The committee appointed by order of the House to make an investigation into their situation, will probably furnish correct information on the subject. It appears, however, from a statement of one of the banks, that they have discounted, on an actual capital of only $249,050 in money, to the amount of $489,000; and if the discounts of the other unchartered banks bear a like proportion to their capitals, we may fairly conclude that there is an amount of between three and four millions of dollars discounted by them at the present time. The effect upon the mercantile class, and upon society in general, of a suppression of these institutions, may then easily be conceived. The suppression, whether immediate, or even at a period somewhat remote, must compel those institutions immediately to commence a heavy and ruinous curtail of their discounts, perhaps an immediate payment of the whole of the debts due to them. These debts, amounting to perhaps four millions, form most probably nearly one-half of the money lent by all the banks in the District, chartered as well as unchartered. A demand of payment of a sum bearing so large a proportion to the mercantile capital of the towns of Georgetown, Washington, and Alexandria, must inevitably produce the most serious distress among all the debtors of the banks, and among all the debtors of those debtors, and thus extend throughout every ramification of society. Bankruptcy and ruin to individuals here, loss and embarrassments to those connected with them in trade, or their creditors elsewhere, and a paralysis of the commerce and active industry of this District, must be the inevitable consequence; and those to whom this Constitution has left no other protection than the Legislature of the nation, will find themselves prostrated by the hand to which alone they can look for support.

It is not here that the evil will stop. The suppression of the unchartered banks, and the consequent annihilation of so much capital, or the withdrawing so large an amount as two or three millions of dollars from the active capital of the country, must, of course, produce a visible effect upon the prices of the produce brought to this market; and whilst it thus indirectly injures the agriculturist, will drive him to seek in some other more distant and less convenient market, that fair price for the returns of his labor, which the distresses and limited capital of this District will prevent his receiving here. To whatever side we turn, there seems to your committee to be mischief and ruin to individuals, and to the District, in the suppression of the unchartered banks of the District. Nor will the chartered institutions be able to afford relief. Notwithstanding the allegation that there is too much capital in the District, it is believed that the chartered banks have discounted as far as they think it prudent to go, and are daily refusing the offer of good paper for discount.

For these reasons, and for others, (which they forbear to press lest this report, although extended beyond their expectations, should become unreasonably voluminous,) your committee earnestly recommend that the unchartered banks of the District should not be suppressed. They trust it will also be perceived that a mere postponement of the period when they shall cease, will not avoid the evils which have been contemplated.

3. Your committee next proceed to state very succinctly what are the public advantages that may be derived from the incorporation of the unincorporated banks of the District. These will be found in the effectual aid which will be afforded by those institutions, in promoting public works connected with the prosperity of the District, of the greatest utility and importance.

The committee will not enlarge upon the subject of public improvement in roads and navigation, from a conviction that every member of the National Legislature is sufficiently impressed with their importance. They will only mention the public works to which the banks will contribute an essential and salutary aid.

The navigation of the Potomac and Shenandoah rivers, which extend two hundred miles into the interior, passing through a fertile and rapidly improving country, has long been an object of the greatest interest, as affecting not only the wealth and convenience of the States of Maryland and Virginia, and the commerce and prosperity of their people, but as intimately connected with the general welfare of this District, whose interests are confided to the guardianship of the National Legislature. Individual exertion has done much towards opening that navigation, and at the present moment a great effort is making to complete what has so long been slowly in progress. Even now, however, some aid is required to prevent a failure of this important object; and this aid the banks of the District are willing to afford. It is proposed that the banks, when chartered, should advance or loan to the Potomac and Shenandoah companies, at moderate interest, two per centum of the amount of their capitals, and it is understood that the banks readily accede to this proposition, and to the other conditions here after mentioned. Those other conditions relate to the aid to be afforded by the banks for the completion and construction of certain turnpike roads terminating in the District, and leading to the upper and fertile part of the country. These roads are as follows:

The road from Georgetown to Fredericktown.

That from Washington to Montgomery court-house.

The road from Georgetown to Snicker's Gap, passing through Leesburg.

The road from Snicker's Gap to Winchester.

The road leading from Alexandria to Thornton's Gap. And,

The road from Winchester to Cumberland.

It is contemplated to appropriate ten per cent. of the capital of the banks in the District to these roads; and it is believed that, when united to individual subscriptions, the aid of the banks will be sufficient to effectuate these desirable objects. Should these important ends be obtained, there will then be afforded an admirable water carriage for the produce of a very wealthy portion of the community to this commodious market, whilst, at the same time, roads will be opened, communicating both through Frederick and Winchester, with the great national road leading through the Western States.

Your committee cannot forego the expression of a hope, that we shall not permit this favorable opportunity for effecting a great national work to pass by unimproved; they, therefore, respectfully submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That it is expedient to incorporate the following banking associations within the District of Columbia; that is to say: The Farmers and Mechanics' Bank of Georgetown; the Central Bank of Washington and Georgetown; the Bank of the Metropolis; the Patriotic Bank; the Union Bank of Alexandria; the Merchants' Bank of Alexandria; and the Franklin Bank of Alexandria.

THE TARIFF.

The House then again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill to regulate the tariff of duties on imports.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, renewed the motion he made, and afterwards withdrew, on Saturday, to increase the duty on lump sugar to twelve cents, and on loaf to fifteen cents per pound; which, after some objections by Mr. PICKERING, and reply by Mr. SMITH, was decided in the affirmative—ayes 56.

Mr. SOUTHARD proposed to increase the duty on gunpowder from six to ten cents per pound, which he supported on the ground of the ability of existing manufactories in the United States to supply the whole country, and the expediency of even prohibiting, by high duties, the importation of an article which it was so much our true policy to encourage the manufacture of at home.

After a few words from Mr. LOWNDES in reply, explanatory of the views of the Committee in fixing the duty at six cents, which was deemed fully adequate to protect the domestic manufacture, the motion was negatived.

Mr. RUGGLES moved to strike out the duty proposed by the bill, of one cent per pound on imported tallow, which he advocated in a short speech.

After some discussion, in which Mr. SMITH opposed and Mr. STEARNS favored the motion, it was lost without a division.

Mr. REED moved to reduce the duty on cocoa from four to two cents per pound; which amendment was also rejected—ayes 43, noes 55.

Mr. RUGGLES moved to include copper sheets in the list of copper articles, on which the duty of four cents per pound is laid by the bill.

This motion was supported by the mover, Mr. MILNOR, Mr. STEARNS, and Mr. WEBSTER, and opposed by Mr. LOWNDES; and ultimately negatived, without a division.

Mr. RUGGLES then moved to incorporate in the bill a duty of two cents per pound on copper sheets; which was also negatived.

Mr. SMITH, after some explanatory observations, and with the view of encouraging our own shipping by every means, moved to charge teas imported in foreign ships from China the higher duties charged in the bill on teas imported "from other countries than China," and thus to secure the China trade to the American shipping, as had been the case under the former law.—His motion obtained.

MARCH, 1816.

The Tariff.

H. OF R.

Mr. HOPKINSON, after observing that the proposed duty on lead was greater than that on shot, and presuming it an inadvertency on the part of the Committee of Ways and Means, moved to raise the duty of one cent on lead in bars, &c., to two cents per pound; which was agreed to without objection.

Mr. INGHAM moved an amendment, the object of which was to change the ad valorem duty on iron and steel wire of twenty-two per cent., to a specific duty of five cents per pound on wire under No. 18, and of nine cents per pound on that of No. 18.

After a few words from Messrs. IRVING, of New York, WARD, of Massachusetts, and PICKERING, to show the impropriety of the proposed change of duty, and by Messrs. INGHAM and MILNOR in support of the amendment, the motion was agreed to.

Mr. HALE, on account of the high freight which imported bar iron had to pay, and the consequent impropriety of a high duty on that article, moved to reduce the duty from seventy-five to fifty cents per cwt. on iron in bars and bolts.

Mr. CONDIOT opposed the motion because of the opposite fact, that bar iron generally paid no freight, and was brought from Europe chiefly as ballast, and submitted some statements to support his views of the subject.

Mr. HALE replied; after which the motion was negatived—ayes 31.

Mr. IRVING, of New York, proposed, for reasons which he stated, to amend the bill, by changing the duty on clocks and parts of clocks from seven and a half per cent. ad valorem to twenty-two per cent. ad valorem, and to include parts of watches in the duty of seven and a half per cent. on watches imported entire; which motion was agreed to without a division.

Mr. IRVING also proposed to change the duty of seven and a half per cent. on cotton laces to twenty-two per cent., and include lace veils, shawls, &c., in the articles liable to the duty of seven and a half per cent.; which was also agreed to, nem. con.

Mr. INGHAM moved to add the following clause to the paragraph which fixes the duties on woollen and cotton goods: "on cotton yarn or thread, the same; provided, that all unbleached and uncolored cotton yarn or thread, the original cost of which shall be less than sixty cents per pound, shall be deemed and taken to have cost sixty cents per pound, and shall be charged with duty accordingly; and all bleached or colored yarn, the original cost of which shall have been less than seventy-five cents per pound, shall be taken and deemed to have cost seventy-five cents per pound, and shall be charged with duty accordingly."

The motion was supported by the mover, and in a few remarks by Messrs. SMITH, CLAY, MILNOR, and STRONG, and also by Mr. WHEATON, (who entered into a general investigation of the question of protection of manufactures, and his reasons for favoring a decided and effectual protection,) and opposed by Messrs. LOWNDES and TUCKER; when the amendment was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. ROBERTSON, the words "on grain" were stricken out of the clause fixing the duty on imported spirits; so as to embrace all spirits, whether made of grain, molasses, or other material, within the highest rate of duties specified in the bill on spirits.

Mr. MILNOR moved, after some introductory remarks, to strike out the proposed duty on tin plates, of one dollar and fifty cents per box of one hundred square feet, for the purpose of substituting a lower duty.

Mr. LOWNDES offered a few arguments in support of the duty proposed by the bill, and in opposition to the amendment; after which the motion was negatived.

Mr. MILNOR moved to reduce the duty on tin, by changing the duty of one dollar and fifty cents from boxes of one hundred to boxes of two hundred and eighteen square feet; which motion was also rejected.

Mr. WEBSTER then renewed the motion which he offered and withdrew on Saturday, to strike out the duty proposed by the bill to be imposed on imported cottons, and to substitute the following: "For two years next ensuing the 30th day of June next, a duty of thirty per centum ad valorem; for two years, to commence at the termination of the two years last aforesaid, a duty of twenty-five per centum ad valorem; and after the expiration of the two years last aforesaid, a duty of twenty per cent. ad valorem."

Mr. CLAY moved to amend the amendment by changing the word two, in the first line, to three; the word two, in the second instance, to one; and to conform the remainder of the amendment accordingly. We all know, said Mr. C., that now is the time for encouragement, and that the domestic manufacturer has to struggle more at the end of a war, and at that moment the greater aid is necessary to support him against foreign competition. If the amendment he offered prevailed, four years would still reduce the duty to the minimum proposed by the original motion, and would give to our own manufactures an adequate protection at the time of the greatest difficulty.

Mr. LOWNDES assented to the motion. He rejoiced to see gentleman who had manifested the strongest friendship for the manufacturing interest the advocates of a proposition which would, in prospect, produce a return of correct principles. Satisfied that twenty-five and even twenty per cent. was a sufficient protection to the manufactures in question, he would, nevertheless, support the proposed motion, though not perfectly correct in his opinion, persuaded that it would eventually produce the state of things which he thought most desirable.

Mr. ROOT believed the proposition now under consideration was worse than any other which had been offered on the subject. He was opposed to the graduation, by which the manufacturing establishments would be sustained for two years, and then left to their fate. If twenty per cent. was a sufficient protection, as had been stated, by this amendment a bounty of ten per cent. would be given to the manufactories already established, and in effect would be a monopoly to them. He was in favor of encouraging the erection of others, which could not be effected under the advantage of the powerful competition which the amendment would give to the existing establishments.

Mr. HULBERT said if the amendment was modified as proposed by Mr. CLAY's motion, he should be in favor of it. Since the amendment was offered on Saturday, he had consulted with gentlemen acquainted with the subject, and had been informed that the manufacturers would be satisfied with the encouragement which the amendment would afford to them; and if the minimum was retained, he was decidedly in favor of the motion.

Mr. WEBSTER observed that he had conversed with those well informed on the subject, and had understood that the manufacturers would be satisfied with a duty of 30 per cent. for one year; but he had proposed two years, for the purpose of meeting the views of those who advocated a greater degree of encouragement.

Mr. HULBERT said the individual consulted by the gentleman, though intelligent and honorable, was a manufacturer of large capital, and could better stand under the operation of the amendment than many others whose means were limited, and who had not got well established.

Mr. WARD, of Massachusetts, wished it distinctly understood that he was in favor of encouraging manufactures; and his object was to give a substantial and permanent support to them, and not a bounty for a short time, which would temporarily discourage foreign importation altogether. It was said by some that foreign goods ought to be excluded, because the country was so completely stocked with them now as to contain enough for two years' consumption. He asked if this course would not be a bounty on those already imported, by allowing the holders of them to put on 30 per cent? This would be promoting the interest of the merchants, and while he desired to protect them against injury, he wished not to give one part of them a bounty, to the exclusion of the other; and asked if consequences would not result from the course proposed, which were not contemplated?

Mr. WEBSTER said the question was, how far the country was bound to support those institutions. He was not prepared to say that the Government was bound to adopt a permanent protection, or one which would exclude those goods already in the country. From the course pursued by the Government for some years back, the community had a right to expect relief from the danger to which the sudden change of circumstances exposed our manufactures; but Government had a right to say whether that relief should be permanent or not, and to reduce the protecting duties if it thought proper. But Mr. W. said he was opposed to a changing and fluctuating policy, and the object of his motion was to impose a duty so moderate as to insure its permanency and be still an adequate one.

Mr. CALHOUN hoped the amendment to the amendment would not prevail. He believed the mode proposed by the original motion was correct, and that the permanent duty of 20 per cent. was an ample protection; he believed the policy of the country required protection to our manufacturing establishments, and he hoped it would be adopted in the way proposed by the amendment.

Mr. PITKIN said, in forming his opinions on this subject, he would not be influenced by the statements of those who had large manufactories already established. He wished to act on a large national scale; not to give a monopoly to those now in existence, but to enable others to embark in the business of manufacturing. Under this amendment a man could not get his buildings erected in the two years proposed, and the time offered would be of no use to them at all. Mr. P. supported Mr. CLAY's modification, and argued at some length in favor of the policy of holding out encouragement to additional establishments.

Mr. WEBSTER repeated that his object was to protect the manufacturers permanently. He asked gentlemen to recollect that even under the duty of 20 per cent., the minimum of his proposition, the India cottons would be forever excluded; the India trade, he said, was at an end. He contended further, that manufacturing establishments could now be erected at less than two-thirds the cost of those which were first commenced in the country.

Mr. CLAY said the object of protecting manufactures was, that we might eventually get articles of necessity made as cheap at home as they could be imported, and thereby to produce an independence of foreign countries. In three years, he said, we could judge of the ability of our establishments to furnish those articles as cheap as they were obtained from abroad, and could then legislate with the lights of experience. He believed that three years would be sufficient to place our manufacturers on this desirable footing, and others would not hesitate to enter into the business, because they would look to that liberal and enlarged policy which they might anticipate from the Government at a future period.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, did not believe that 20 per cent. was at this time an adequate duty on cotton goods, but that it would give an advantage to the American manufacturer of 50 per cent. over the British manufacturer in cotton goods.

Mr. ROSS believed that 20 per cent. was an encouragement amply sufficient; and replied at some length to those who maintained that the Government was pledged to afford a high protection to manufactures, and against the rage for fostering them to the exclusion of every other pursuit. He desired the independence of the people as well as national independence, and wished not to see one class of the community enslaved by another; to illustrate which, he introduced the situation of China, where the government was completely independent, and yet the people all slaves. If the extravagant duties proposed were not necessary for revenue, he said, he could see no strong necessity for them. The failure of certain manufacturers was no reason for them, because some individuals of all professions were unfortunate in the best times, and no sympathy was felt for the merchants who failed. Adverting to a remark that some manufactories were worked in Kentucky by slaves, Mr. R. said all manufactories were conducted with slaves, because the occupation had a tendency to degrade and debase the human mind. It was, he argued, a vain attempt to carry manufactures to such extent in this country, while there were so many inducements to seek an independent support by agriculture, and other beneficial pursuits. The only kind of manufactures he wished to see flourish, were those conducted in families; any other would prove destructive to the liberties of this Republic, by combinations effecting a revolution in this House and in the Government. There was already great necessity for a strong country party to withstand the manufacturing and commercial parties here.

Mr. CLAY's motion was negatived—ayes 47, noes 61; and Mr. WEBSTER's amendment was agreed to by a large majority.

The Committee then rose, and obtained leave to sit again.

TUESDAY, March 26.

On motion of Mr. JENNINGS, the Committee on Public Expenditures were instructed to inquire into the state of the accounts connected with the superintendency of Indian affairs for the Territory of Indiana, and the manner in which the said superintendency has been discharged.

Mr. JENNINGS, in proposing the above motion, observed that he wished to state to the House, that each of the Governors of the Territories of the United States, at least of the Territories northwest of the river Ohio, were likewise superintendents of Indian affairs, for and within their respective Territories. That it would be difficult to ascertain the mischief which might accrue by reason of any neglect, or other malfeasance in relation to the duties of such superintendencies. That he had long been of opinion that malconduct had taken place in the superintendency for the Territory of Indiana. Mr. J. said, that the laws of the United States had long since prohibited any superintendent from being concerned in merchandising; though he had no hesitation in stating, that the late superintendent for the Territory of Indiana had been concerned in trade while acting as such, and that he had purchased goods for the use of the Indians, on account of the United States, from the concern in which he was a partner. Mr. J. said, that he did not intend to make any allusion to the present Governor of Indiana—he alluded particularly to a former Governor, late a Major General of the Army of the United States. He hoped the inquiry would be instituted.

On motion of Mr. BRYAN, the Committee on Military Affairs were instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing by law for the payment of such articles of military clothing as may be due soldiers discharged from the Army of the United States.

On motion of Mr. TUCKER, a committee was appointed to inquire into the expediency of providing by law for the turnpiking a road from the town of Winchester, in Virginia, to Cumberland, so as to unite with the great western turnpike road.—Messrs. TUCKER, PIPER, LEWIS, BAER, and LYLE, were appointed the said committee.

The bill from the Senate "for the relief of the Baltimore and Massachusetts Bible Societies," was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

The bill from the Senate "for the relief of John Holkar, formerly Consul General of France to the United States," was read and committed to the Committee of Ways and Means.

THE TARIFF.

The House then again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill to regulate the tariff of duties on imports.

Mr. LOWNDES offered the following amendment to the clause fixing the duty of twenty-five per cent. on woollens: "Excepting blankets, and woollen rugs, shall be levied, collected, and paid until the 30th of June, 1818, and after that day twenty per cent. on the said articles."

Mr. LOWNDES observed that he believed the manufacture of woollens, and particularly of blankets, required a decided present encouragement; and after receiving that support, his amendment would produce the reduction of the duties to that correct standard which only ought to be encouraged and looked to.

Mr. INGHAM favored a duty of twenty-five per cent. for three years, and a duty of twenty-two per cent. for one year; but he was willing to take the amendment with simply substituting the year 1819 for 1818, and moved so to modify it.

Mr. HULBERT hoped Mr. INGHAM's amendment would be accepted by the mover of this proposition, and offered a few reasons in support of it.

Mr. LOWNDES repeated some of the reasons which induced him to prefer his own proposition.

Mr. HUGER argued some time in opposition to extravagant duties, the consequence of which would be to tax the community to give a monopoly to a few large manufacturers. He was also opposed to legislating for the next Congress; though willing to lay an adequate protection during the present Congress, he desired to leave the next to act for themselves, and impose such duties as to them should seem proper.

Mr. INGHAM replied, and offered some additional reasons in favor of the motion as he wished to modify it. Mr. HUGER rejoined.

Mr. LOWNDES entered into a more comprehensive investigation of the question, defending his proposition, and replying to the gentleman who had opposed it.

Mr. INGHAM's modification was then agreed to—ayes 63; and the question recurred on the amendment as amended.

Mr. ROOR opposed it at some length; and likewise the adoption of a policy which, in his opinion, would encourage the most odious of all monopolies.

On motion of Mr. STEARNS, the words "woollen stuffs" were added to the amendment, being accepted by Mr. LOWNDES.

And the original proposition was agreed to as amended.

Mr. FORSYTH offered the following proviso to follow the amendment:

"Provided, That all woollen cloths, or cloths of which wool is the material of chief value, the original cost of which, at the place whence imported, shall be less than four shillings sterling per square yard, shall be subject to no higher duty than fifteen per cent. ad valorem."

Mr. SMITH opposed the motion, and submitted some statements to show that its adoption would be extremely injurious to the revenue.

The motion was also opposed by Mr. LOWNDES and Mr. HULBERT, and was supported by Mr. HUGER. Mr. CUTHBERT also said a few words on the subject, advocating moderation in a duty which would fall with peculiar force on the poor. The question was then taken, and decided in the negative, without a division.

Mr. WARD, of Massachusetts, offered the following proviso to the clause respecting the duty on cotton goods imported from India, &c.:

"Provided further, That nothing in this act shall be so construed as to subject any goods of the description last mentioned, which may be imported directly from beyond the Cape of Good Hope, which shall arrive in the United States before the 1st day of January next, to any other or higher duty than would be imposed upon them, should they arrive in the United States before the 30th day of June next."

Mr. WARD supported his motion by a variety of arguments, and at considerable length; and was replied to by Mr. HULBERT, who was answered by Mr. WARD. Mr. SMITH indirectly argued against the motion, believing that the amendment would cover but a very small number of voyages, &c. Mr. CLAY likewise spoke against the amendment, and against legislating on every voyage which might be thought to suffer hardship from the policy of the Government, and also in reply to Mr. WARD's arguments. Mr. MASON spoke some time in opposition to the motion, and Mr. WARD again in favor of it. Mr. PICKERING made a few remarks in favor of relieving the merchants now engaged in the trade, and in danger of ruin by the bill. Mr. SHEFFEY supported the amendment; arguing that the duty on India imports was from 113 to 150 per cent. on the cost, and that a system which required such enormous protection was unnatural and oppressive on the great body of the community. Mr. PICKERING explained, and Mr. MASON rejoined; when, after a very long discussion, almost entirely of a commercial character, the question was taken on the amendment, and lost—ayes 32.

Mr. ROBERTSON moved to amend the clause of the bill fixing the duty on books, so as to confine the duty to books printed in the English language; observing that the heavy duty on books in the English language was obviously necessary, because they could be reprinted in our own country; but that the same reason did not operate on books in other languages, as we had to depend almost wholly for them on Europe, and their importation ought not to be restricted, as we were not yet in the habit of republishing them.

Mr. LOWNDES said, in reply, that one reason for the duty in the bill, was that the duty of twenty per cent. was supposed by the committee sufficient to enable the reprinting to advantage of books of any language in this country.

Mr. PICKERING remarked that books on the dead and other languages, were not altogether from Europe, as they were now printed in different parts of the country.

Mr. GROSVENOR agreed, in part, with Mr. ROBERTSON; but those who read books in other languages were able to pay for them; that there was no reason for the discrimination, and that he would prefer striking out the duty altogether, as in his view it would answer no valuable purpose.

Mr. INGHAM argued, that as printing establishments were extremely costly, those who embark in the publishing of books ought to be encouraged; that they would be thereby able to circulate many more books in the community, and that he looked on them as among the most valuable establishments in the country.

Mr. GROSVENOR replied, and contended that if the duty was not necessary for revenue, it was not so for protection.

Mr. ROBERTSON varied his motion so as to embrace the whole duty on printed books. He agreed with Mr. GROSVENOR in his views, and wished not to retard the improvement of the country, because it might diminish in a little the profits of some of the mechanical employments.

The motion was carried—ayes 48, noes 45.

Mr. SMITH then made a motion he had promised some days ago, the object of which was to take off the ad valorem duty of twenty per cent. on Russia and Holland duck, and to lay a specific duty of $2 50 per piece on the former, and $3 per piece on the latter; which motion was agreed to nem. con.

On motion of Mr. BETTS, the bill was amended by adding gold leaf to the articles on which a duty of fifteen per cent. is laid.

Mr. MCKEE moved to strike out the words three cents from the duty on lead ground in oil, with the view of inserting a larger sum; which was supported by Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, and Mr. CLAY, who stated that the article was already manufactured, and of a better quality than the imported article, amply sufficient for the consumption of the country, and that the great possessions of the Government in lead mines was an additional reason for laying a high duty on the imported article.

After a few remarks on the subject by Messrs. LOWNDES, SMITH, and IRVING, to show that the present sum would be a sufficient protection, the motion was negatived—49 to 43.

Mr. CLAY then moved that the duty be increased from three to four cents per pound on red or white lead ground in oil; which motion was carried—ayes 48, noes 43.

On motion of Mr. PITKIN, the bill was so amended as to extend the duty on teas to those which may be imported from any other place than China, east of the Cape of Good Hope.

The Committee then rose, and obtained leave to sit again.

WEDNESDAY, March 27.

Mr. ROBERTSON, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill from the Senate "further extending the time for issuing and locating military land warrants," reported the same without amendment, and the bill was committed to the Committee of the Whole on the bill of this House, upon the same subject.

Mr. ROBERTSON, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the Message of the President of the United States of the 20th of January last, recommending the ratification of certain donations of land made by the friendly Creek Indians to General Andrew Jackson, Colonel Benjamin Hawkins, and others, made a report thereon; which was read and committed to a Committee of the whole House on Monday next.

Mr. YANCEY made a report on the petition of the President and Directors of the Washington Bridge Company; which was read; when Mr. Y. reported a bill for the relief of the President and Directors of the Washington Bridge Company; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. FORSYTH, after some introductory observations, in support of his object, offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee for the District of Columbia be instructed to report a bill to incorporate the subscribers to the Female Orphan Asylum of the City of Washington, and to vest in them the fee simple title to four of the public lots in the City of Washington, to promote the benevolent objects of the said institution.

The question on proceeding to consider the resolution, was decided in the negative—ayes 44.

DAY OF ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. BASSETT, from the joint committee appointed on that subject, made a report on the probable business which the two Houses have to act on during the present session, and recommending that the President of the Senate and Speaker of the House of Representatives be authorized to close the session on the — day of April next.

Mr. HARDIN moved that the blank be filled up with Monday, the 22d of April.

Mr. JACKSON moved Saturday, the 20th, being opposed to legislating on the Sabbath, except in case of great emergency, and one day would make but little difference.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, asked if gentlemen were serious in their motions, and declared it as his opinion that the necessary business could not be completed sooner than the 22d of May. If we hurry off, said he, and leave the public business unfinished, the alteration we have made in the mode of our compensation, will prove a very bad one, &c.

Mr. MILNOR offered some reasons to show the impropriety of fixing on the day at present, and moved that the report lie on the table; which was agreed to.

The report lies on the table accordingly.

SEIZURE BY A COLLECTOR.

Mr. LOWNDES, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported a bill for the relief of David Gelston and Peter A. Schenck; which was read twice and committed to the Committee of the Whole on the bill for the relief of Edward Hallowell.

Mr. L. also communicated the following document:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, Feb. 19, 1816.

SIR: It is my duty to lay before the Committee of Ways and Means a request for an appropriation to pay the amount of judgment recovered by Gould Hoyt against David Gelston, the collector, and Peter A. Schenck, the surveyor of the port of New York, under the following circumstances:

Information having been received in July, 1810, from the French Minister, as well as from various official sources, that a ship called the "American Eagle" was arming and equipping as a vessel of war in the port of New York, for the use of Petion, one of the chiefs of the island of St. Domingo, the collector and surveyor of the port were instructed by the Secretary of the Treasury, acting with the authority of the President, to seize the ship for adjudication, under the act of the 5th of June, 1794. The seizure was accordingly made, but, upon trial, (after a delay of more than two years,) a degree of restitution was pronounced. Mr. Hoyt, the alleged owner of the ship, then instituted an action against Messrs. Gelston and Schenck, to recover damages, and has, in fact, obtained a verdict for $107,369 43, upon which judgment has been rendered by the Supreme Court of the State of New York.

The case involving a construction of an act of Congress upon questions highly interesting to the United States in their relation to foreign Powers, the attorney for the district of New York was instructed to aid in the defence of the suit, and to take the proper measures to obtain the judgment of the Supreme Court of the United States, should the decision of the State court render it necessary. Accordingly, the case has been removed by writ of error into the highest court of law in the State of New York, with a view to its being brought finally before the Supreme Court. It has, however, been represented by the counsel of the defendants that the expense of prosecuting the writ of error will be great, and that the probability of reversing the judgment is slight. It becomes necessary, therefore, to provide for the event of a final judgment in favor of the plaintiff.

In explanation of the facts thus generally stated, I have the honor to transmit the following documents:

1. A copy of the report made by this Department to the Senate on the 13th February, 1815, in which the circumstances that led to the seizure of the ship "American Eagle" are particularly stated.
2. A transcript from the record in the case of Hoyt vs. Gelston and Schenck.

H. OF R.

Post Office Department.

MARCH, 1816.

3. The correspondence with Mr. Gelston and his counsel relating to the suit.

4. A letter from Albert Gallatin, Esq., who was Secretary of the Treasury at the time of the seizure of the "American Eagle," explanatory of the facts and principles on which the seizure was directed.

From the whole, it will satisfactorily appear—

That the instructions for seizing the "American Eagle" were founded upon official information of an illicit design in her equipment, upon a sense of public duty, and upon a fair and reasonable construction of the law :

That the seizure was made by the collector and surveyor, in the course of their official duty, under the official instructions of the Treasury Department :

And that an indemnity is due from the Government to the collector and surveyor, by providing for the payment of the damages which have been awarded against them.

If, therefore, the Committee of Ways and Means concur in this view of the subject, I respectfully ask their direction to insert in the general bill of annual appropriations (which is now preparing) an item "for discharging the judgment obtained in the Supreme Court of the State of New York, by Gould Hoyt against David Gelston and Peter A. Schenck, in an action of trespass for seizing the ship "American Eagle," under instructions from the Treasury Department, a sum not exceeding $112,000."

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, sir, your most obedient servant,

A. J. DALLAS.

Hon. W. LOWNDES,

Chairman Committee Ways and Means.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT.

Mr. INGHAM, from the committee appointed on the 29th January, at the request of the Postmaster General, to investigate the conduct of the Post Office Department, made a detailed report of said investigation, accompanied by the evidence submitted to the committee by the various witnesses who appeared before it. The report and documents were committed to a Committee of the Whole, and ordered to be printed.—The report is as follows :

The committee appointed to investigate the conduct of the General Post Office Department, make report :

That they have used their utmost endeavors to ascertain every fact that appeared to be material to a full understanding of the conduct of the officers of that Department. As the inquiry originated in a request of the Postmaster General, the committee, in the first place, addressed to him a letter, requesting to be informed of the reasons of his application to Congress, and also that he would give them such information as appeared to be calculated to facilitate the investigation. The Postmaster General stated, in his answer, that the application was induced by a rumor that some person or persons of the Department had sold drafts for money due to the General Post Office for premiums, which had been converted to their private use.

The committee, therefore, proceeded to inquire into the truth of the rumor, by the examination of every person who seemed likely to have any knowledge of the fact ; but, in the examination of some of the clerks in the General Post Office, various suggestions were made of improper transactions in the Department, other than those to which their attention had been drawn by the Postmaster General. The investigation has therefore assumed a very extensive scope, and has consequently occupied more time than could have been anticipated, at its commencement. This delay has also been increased by circumstances arising out of the nature of the inquiry. As no person appeared to make any specific charges, the committee had no alternative but to abandon their undertaking, or listen to rumors and the hearsays of some of the witnesses to prove the facts. They made choice of the latter course, and have examined every person who was either suggested to them, or appeared as likely to possess any information on the subjects of their inquiry.

The charges arising out of the suggestions of the witnesses, and which, from the various communications they made to the committee, it appeared to be the desire of some of them most especially to establish, are as follows :

1. That certain persons in the General Post Office, and particularly Abraham Bradley, jr., Assistant Postmaster General, had sold post office drafts and checks, and applied the premium to his private use.

2. That an erasure had been made in the cash-book of the General Post Office, and an erroneous entry found thereon.

3. That private accounts were improperly kept with individuals on the books of the post office.

4. That Phineas Bradley had been concerned in a contract for carrying the mail, that was improperly obtained.

5. That P. Bradley had received corrupting presents from mail contractors.

6. That P. Bradley and Abraham Bradley, jr., had made use of post office money, in purchasing depreciated bank notes, for which they received a premium, and applied it to their private use.

7. That bank notes which were better than the paper of the District of Columbia, and a Treasury note, had been returned to postmasters, by order of Abraham Bradley, jr.

8. That the Washington and Union Bank and certain individuals had profited by the sale of post office drafts.

9. That a contract for carrying the mail from Washington to Fredericksburg had been superseded by order of the Postmaster General, before it expired, and about double the amount given for the same service.

An examination of the subjoined testimony and documents will enable the House to determine how far the charges, or either of them, have been sustained. The committee have, however, no hesitation in expressing their opinion on them severally.

1. With respect to the first charge, in relation to Abraham Bradley, jr., there is no evidence whatever to induce a suspicion that he has sold post office drafts or checks for a premium ; nor does it appear that any other person in the General Post Office has sold post office drafts or checks for a premium, other than drafts obtained for their own salaries, except in the case of H. H. Edwards, who bought a post office draft on Boston, for District of Columbia paper, and disposed of it by an agent in New York, (as "he presumes,") for a premium.

The committee have not relied upon negative testimony to disprove this charge, but have attentively examined the books of the Union Bank containing the accounts with the General Post Office, as well as the private accounts of Abraham Bradley, jr., and Phineas Bradley, with that bank, and have satisfactorily ascertained that no credits have been given to them, or any other person in the General Post Office, for premium on drafts or checks; they have also ascertained, that the premiums for post office drafts and checks sold by the bank, have been entered in the profit and loss account thereof. It therefore conclusively follows, that these premiums have accrued to the bank, and to none other.

2. It appears that a draft in favor of Elisha Riggs is charged in the cash book of the General Post Office, as sold to the Union Bank, the words Union Bank being apparently written on an erasure. But from an examination of the books of the Union Bank, the committee ascertained, that the General Post Office had credit for this draft thereon, and therefore, the draft having been actually sold to, and negotiated by the Union Bank and not Elisha Riggs, they do not perceive any impropriety in the entry, and still less have they been able to discover any improper purpose to be effected by the alterations on the cash book.

3. It appears to have been the practice of the Assistant Postmaster General, A. Bradley, jr., to open an account with certain individuals, partly of a public and partly of a private nature; there were cases in which members of Congress have, by means of the agency of Abraham Bradley, jr., transferred funds from one part of the United States to another part, or have received money for some of their constituents, who were contractors for carrying the mail, by which their names became entered on the books; no advantages accrued to any person by the transaction other than that of the accommodation in transferring an inconsiderable fund from one place to another. It may be observed that the post office offered peculiar facilities in this particular, and has frequently been resorted to by members of Congress and others for this purpose, but their names do not appear in an open account on the books, except when the drafts exchanged did not exactly balance at the time of exchange.

The only account of this nature which is ascertained to remain open on the books was made in December, 1800, where there is a balance in favor of the General Post Office of three hundred and twenty dollars, due from General H. Lee, of Virginia.

4. It appears that Phineas Bradley, a clerk in the General Post Office, has been concerned in carrying the mail, and that he owned somewhat more than one eighteenth of a line of stages which carried the mail from Baltimore to Georgetown and Alexandria for $2,800 a year. Whatever may be the opinion of the committee as to the strict propriety of the mode in which a compromise was effected in this case between rival contractors, it is but proper to add, that Mr. Bradley had no legal agency in influencing the decision upon the contract, nor could he have had any other agency in it, unless a corrupt disposition is presumed on the part of the then Postmaster General, who was consulted before the contract took effect as to the propriety of his being concerned in it; but there is no circumstance in the case to authorize such a presumption.

5. There is no evidence which, in the opinion of the committee, can justify the imputations in this charge.

6. It appears that bank notes to a small amount have been sold by Abraham Bradley, jr., and P. Bradley, previous to the general depreciation of bank paper, for which they received a premium. The evidence does not prove that they made use of public money for this purpose; but so far as a fact of this kind could be ascertained from circumstances, it proves the transaction to have been a private one.

7. It appears that a Treasury note of one hundred dollars, and bank notes to a small amount, which were supposed to be better than the money of the District of Columbia, have been returned to postmasters; this transaction, so far as it regards the bank notes returned, is in conformity with an order of the Postmaster General to his deputies. The only reason alleged for returning the Treasury note is, that it might have been purchased at a discount by the postmaster who remitted it.

8. The committee have ascertained that drafts to the amount of $121,348 40 have been disposed of to the Union Bank; and to the amount of $4,000 to the Washington Bank, and to the amount of $15,348 25 to individuals who were not public creditors since the 1st of October, 1814, the commencement of the general depreciation of bank paper. Those drafts appear to have been exchanged at par, and, except in a few cases, for the paper of the District of Columbia. It is evident, from the rate of exchange during this period between the District of Columbia and most of the places upon which these drafts were drawn, that the purchasers must have derived an advantage other than that of a mere transfer of their funds. It has not been in the power of the committee to ascertain the value of these drafts in the paper of the District of Columbia, having no means of determining, at the several dates, the respective rates of exchange; nor did this appear to them very material, as the amount of profit which accrued to the purchasers could have but little influence upon the principle which must determine the propriety of the measure. With respect to the banks, it is stated that a small proportion of these drafts were sold for premiums, some having been exchanged for specie, and others used for the payment of debts due to other banks.

It cannot, however, be of any importance (if the drafts were essentially more valuable than the District of Columbia paper) whether they were employed in the payment of debts, sold for specie, or for bank notes of this District with a premium for the difference of value; the principle is the same in either case, and whatever may be the amount of advantage to the individuals or the banks in this transaction, resulting from the difference of exchange, the same will be the amount of disadvantage to the Government. It does not however appear that any change has taken place in the practice of the General Post Office Department, in this respect, for a series of years; and as the operation complained of is evidently the effect of an existing arrangement under a change of the circumstances of the circulating medium, it is not to be presumed that the practice has arisen out of a design to promote private interests, or to prejudice the interests of the Government. The committee are however decidedly of opinion, that the advantage arising from the difference of exchange as to all the moneys that are due to the Treasury ought to accrue exclusively to the Government; but as the Postmaster General has expressed a willingness to pay over these balances in any way that may best accommodate the Treasury Department, the evil admits of a very simple remedy.

9. The facts stated in this charge are admitted to be correct, and the letter of the Postmaster General contains a satisfactory explanation of the reasons for altering the terms of the contract in question; whether too much was eventually given for the service, under the changes required by the Postmaster General, is a subject not in the power of the committee to decide; nor would they be justified in presuming any misconduct in a transaction that appears to have been so fairly conducted.

The committee subjoin to this report the substance of all the testimony which appeared to them in any degree material to the inquiry, also sundry communications made in writing, and beg leave to offer the following resolution, viz:

Resolved, That the committee appointed to investigate the conduct of the General Post Office Department be discharged from the further consideration of the subject referred to them.

[Accompanying this report is an abstract of the evidence given before the committee, and some written statements made in answer to its queries. These documents, being voluminous, are omitted.]

THE TARIFF.

The House then again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill to regulate the duties on imports.

Mr. LYON, after some remarks to show the oppressiveness of the proposed duty on salt on the people of his part of the country, and the general impolicy and odiousness of a heavy tax on that article, moved to strike out the duty of twenty cents per bushel on salt.

Mr. LOWNDES, without following the gentleman in the discussion of the general question, hoped the House would not now reverse its former decision on this subject, and reject the duty.

The motion was then negatived by a large majority.

Mr. INGHAM moved, for reasons which he offered, that the duty of six cents per pound on imported gunpowder, be raised to eight cents; which was assented to by Mr. LOWNDES, and agreed to by the House.

Mr. WARD, of Massachusetts, after remarking on the difficulty of discriminating between London Particular and market wines, and the ease of evading the difference of duty, moved to abolish the discrimination, and make the duty on each ninety cents per gallon.

Mr. SMITH gave a particular statement of the different wines of Madeira, their qualities, &c.; declaring his belief that the duty proposed on wine was so high as to endanger the revenue therefrom, and showing, by various illustrations, that a moderate duty was more productive to the Government, by preventing smuggling.

Mr. MILNOR argued in favor of the discriminating duty, and adduced some facts in support thereof.

Mr. WARD replied, that his objection was not to the expediency of discriminating, but its impracticability, &c.; after which

Mr. SMITH observed, in addition, that the high duties might operate as an encouragement to the brewing of wine at home, because thirty gallons of good cider, thirty of sherry, ten of Malaga, and ten of good Madeira, would make wine which would pass anywhere for Madeira; and, as we were greatly encouraging some manufactures, he said, ironically, gentlemen might think that it would be proper to encourage this.

The amendment was then agreed to—ayes 65.

Mr. ROBERTSON, after observing that claret was not a luxury alone in some parts of the country; but, from the nature of the climate, an absolute necessary to the health of the people in that section of the Union which he represented, moved to strike out the duty on certain kinds of wine named in the bill, with the view of establishing a lower duty.

Mr. SMITH, in the course of some remarks, said he wished to retain the highest duty on Spanish and Portuguese wines, for political reasons; in those countries, our flour being subjected to a duty of two dollars per barrel, and he wished to induce our citizens to go elsewhere in search of foreign wines, &c.

Mr. HARDIN spoke against the motion, and in favor of high duties on luxuries, such as he considered claret wine, particularly at a time when we were taxing the indispensable articles of life; and remarked, incidentally, that if the Louisianians could not obtain wine, they could obtain an abundant supply of whiskey from Kentucky in lieu of it.

Mr. ROBERTSON repeated that claret, in the part of the country referred to, was not only necessary to the health, but to the morals, of the people. They were a sober people, he said, and it was to save them from the whiskey offered by the gentleman from Kentucky that he wished to reduce the duty on claret. The liquid fire of alcohol would, in so warm a climate, be poison to them, and its use be more pernicious than arsenic.

Mr. CLAY said he was in favor of the motion, because of the cheapness of the article at the places whence it was imported; but he was sorry his friend from Louisiana had declared war against the whiskey of the West; and regretted, if such was the fact, that the taste of the people of Louisiana was so bad as to prefer bad claret to good whiskey.

Mr. SMITH then—Mr. ROBERTSON having withdrawn his motion for that purpose—moved to reduce the duty on claret wine in casks, from twenty-five to fifteen cents per gallon; which was negatived—ayes 44.

Mr. BURNSIDE moved to increase the duty on imported iron in bars, &c., from seventy-five to one hundred and twenty-five cents per hundred weight, which he advocated by a speech of some length.

The motion was opposed by Messrs. HALE, PICKERING, SMITH, of Maryland, LOWNDES, GROSVENOR, HARDIN, CUTHBERT, and IRVING, and advocated by Messrs. REYNOLDS and CONDIOT; the last named gentleman concluding by moving to raise the duty to one hundred and fifty cents per hundred weight.

After a very extended discussion of the question, in which it was argued on one side that our iron factories required additional encouragement and protection; and, on the other, that it was already a profitable pursuit, by which large fortunes were made; that if it could not now do without so high a protection, it would always require it; that the duty in the bill was three times the former duty, under which iron factories were established to great advantage—

The amendment was rejected—five or six only rising in favor of the motion.

Mr. STRONG then moved to reduce the duty on imported iron, from seventy-five to fifty cents per hundred weight.

This motion was supported by Mr. ROSS, who wished that the ambassadors from the cotton factories had at once made a treaty with the Committee of Ways and Means, which the House might have swallowed, and have left the other manufactories to themselves, and not be burdening the people in every possible way, under the plea of protection. The motion was advocated also by Mr. WEBSTER, chiefly on the ground of the great navigation the iron importations employed to the Baltic.

It being suggested that this motion had been already decided a few days ago, Mr. STRONG varied it, by moving to reduce the duty to thirty-seven and a half cents per hundred weight, which was negative—ayes 45.

Mr. WEBSTER then moved to reduce the duty to forty-five cents per hundred weight.

This motion was opposed by Mr. BURNSIDE, and advocated by Messrs. WEBSTER and HALE, and carried—ayes 62, noes 43.

Mr. BETTS moved to strike out the duty of five cents per bushel on coal, with the view of inserting the article in the second section, among those which are to be admitted free of duty; in support of which a memorial from the Common Council of New York was read.

The motion was opposed with much earnestness by Mr. PLEASANTS, who adduced various arguments in support of the duty, and of encouraging the home production of the article.

The motion was negative without a division.

Mr. PLEASANTS then moved to add one cent more to the duty on the imported coal, and make it six instead of five cents per bushel.

This motion was opposed by Mr. IRVING, at some length, as one which would fall with peculiar and unequal severity on the poorer classes of citizens in the Atlantic towns; as a partial and unjust tax, &c.; and he argued against the impolicy of legislating in this sectional and special manner.

Mr. CLAY also made a few remarks on the subject, saying that he supposed it was a substitute for a motion which Mr. PLEASANTS had previously made and withdrawn, (to make the imported bushel an even and not a heaped one,) and as he could not shave the bushel down to a level, he wished to put a cent on the top of it. Mr. C. asked his friend from Virginia, coming as he did from the South, used to cheerful coal fires, to recollect the shivering condition of those of the North, &c., who had to import their coal.

Mr. PLEASANTS said he did not expect, by his motion, to excite so much seriousness on the one hand, or so much pleasantry on the other, and then proceeded to defend the propriety of his motion, in reply to Mr. IRVING; after which, the amendment was negative—ayes 46, noes 63.

Mr. CONDOR then moved to reduce the duty to three cents per bushel; which was negative by a large majority.

Mr. IRVING moved the following clause to the first section:

"That in all cases where an ad valorem duty shall be charged, it shall be calculated on the net cost of the article, (exclusive of packages, commissions, and all charges,) and on the usual addition, established by law, of twenty per cent. on all merchandise imported from places beyond the Cape of Good Hope, and of ten per cent. on articles imported from all other places."

This amendment, after a short discussion, was adopted, without a division.

The Committee then proceeded to the second section of the bill, which enumerates the articles to be admitted free of duty.

Mr. FORSYTH moved to strike out "burr stones unwrought," with the view of subjecting them to a duty, on the ground that Georgia could supply all the wants of the country in this article of the best quality, and that it ought to be encouraged, &c.

The motion was opposed by Messrs. GROSVENOR and MILNOR, and supported by Messrs. FORSYTH and WILDE, and negative.

The Committee then rose, and obtained leave to sit again.

THURSDAY, March 28.

Mr. CHIPMAN, from the select committee appointed on the 27th December last, reported a bill for the relief of John H. Peaslee, Nathan B. Haswell, and Russell Jones; which was read twice, and committed to the Committee of the Whole on the bill for the relief of Edward Hallowell.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed "An act in addition to the act to regulate the late Post Office Establishment," with amendments, in which they ask the concurrence of this House.

The amendments were read, and referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a supplemental report of the Secretary of War, of applications to be placed on the list of invalid pensioners; which was referred to the Committee of Pensions and Revolutionary Claims.

Mr. HARDIN moved a resolution fixing the future hour of meeting during the session, at ten instead of eleven o'clock.

The resolution was opposed by Mr. HULBERT, and supported by Mr. HARDIN, and adopted by a considerable majority.

THE TARIFF.

The House then again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill for the regulation of the duties on imports and tonnage.

Mr. MIDDLETON moved so to amend the second section as to admit maps, charts, and drawings, free of duty; which motion was agreed to.

On suggestion of Mr. STEARNS, and assented to by Mr. LOWNDES, chemical apparatus was also included in the free articles, when imported for incorporated societies.

Mr. REED, after some introductory observations, moved to strike out "olive oil in casks" from the free articles, for the purpose of subjecting it to duty. It was his opinion that spermaceti oil was a good substitute, and that its manufacture ought to be encouraged.

After some opposition from Messrs. STRONG and HULBERT—the motion was lost.

Considerable conversation then took place on the subject of a proposed duty on the importation of foreign unmanufactured wool; but no decision took place on the subject, the motion respecting it being waived for the present.

Mr. WILDE moved some amendments in the phraseology of the second section, which were agreed to.

On motion of Mr. ATHERTON, gold and silver coin were added to bullion in the list of free articles.

On taking up the 3d section, which imposes 12½ per cent. on all articles imported after the 30th June next, in ships or vessels not of the United States,

Mr. SMITH moved that 10 per cent. be substituted for 12½. That rate, he said, had been the uniform duty from the commencement of the Government to this time; and he further wished to impose as moderate a duty as we could, because of the number of our citizens residing in the Hanse Towns, &c., and carrying on an extensive trade with us.

Mr. PIRKIN supported the motion, also, in a few remarks; and the amendment was then agreed to, without objection.

Mr. SMITH moved to reduce the amount to be deducted from the duties on articles exported, with the benefit of drawback, from 5 per cent., as proposed by the bill, to 2½ per cent.

On this motion a short discussion ensued, after which, the amendment was adopted by a large majority.

Mr. SMITH moved further to amend this section, by reducing the proposed deduction on spirits exported with the benefit of drawback.

The motion was opposed by Messrs. LOWNDES and PICKERING, and negatived.

Mr. LOWNDES moved the following proviso to the enumeration of the articles entitled to drawback:

"Provided, however, That piece goods imported in ships or vessels of the United States from India, which shall have sailed before the passing of this act, and shall arrive between the 30th of June 1816, and the 30th of June 1817, may be re-exported with the benefit of drawback, and without any deduction from the amount of duties secured or paid, at any time within twelve months from the time of importation."

The proviso was offered without the periods stated above, but the blanks were filled up, and the amendment finally adopted in the form stated.

Mr. IRVING moved the following as an additional section to the bill:

"That after the 29th of June next, in all cases of entry of merchandise for the benefit of drawback, the time of twenty days shall be allowed from the date of the entry, for giving the exportation bonds for the same: Provided, That the exporter shall, in every other particular, comply with the regulations and formalities heretofore established for entries of exportation for the benefit of drawback."

The amendment was adopted without opposition as the 5th section of the bill.

On motion of Mr. EDWARDS, a clause was added to the bill empowering the President to purchase as well as erect houses for the use of the customs.

On motion of Mr. ATHERTON a section was added to make more positive and unequivocal the repeal of former acts respecting discriminating duties, interfering with the provisions of this bill.

Mr. MILNOR proposed to take from the President the application of the fund called "warehouse money," and vest it in the Secretary of the Treasury, under the direction of Congress.

This motion was negatived by a large majority.

Mr. CADY then moved to strike out the whole section providing a fund from drawbacks, &c., for the erection of custom-houses.

This motion was agreed to without a division.

Mr. INGHAM moved a long amendment, the object of which was to reduce the number of grades of ad valorem duty, and transfer the articles falling under the rate of twenty per cent. to other classes—which was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. INGHAM the duty on unmanufactured wool was fixed at 7½ cents ad valorem—ayes 63.

Mr. ROBERTSON, after some explanatory observations, in which he adverted to the decision of the committee on this subject a day or two ago moved to strike out the exception in favor of books imported for the use of incorporated societies, &c., so as to make the importation of books entirely free; a duty on which, he argued, was unnecessary for the purpose of encouragement to the American publisher, &c., and would create only a greater competition amongst the printers here.

The motion was opposed by Messrs. INGHAM and LYON, the latter of whom maintained that the encouragement was necessary for the business here; that very few books were published in the United States in the foreign languages; that our printing was greatly inferior to that of England; that until very lately we had not republished any of the standard works, &c., and that a duty on foreign imported books was necessary to improve the business of book-making in this country.

The motion was then negatived.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH moved a new section, to limit the operation of the act to the term of four years.

This motion was opposed by Messrs. SMITH and HULBERT, on the ground of the injurious effect on commerce as well as manufactures which the constant apprehension of change would produce, and it was advocated by the mover, who said if the act passed without limitation it would be still liable to repeal at any time by a majority of Congress, and present protection he had understood was all that the manufacturers wanted, &c. After which the amendment was rejected, by a large majority.

The Committee then rose, and reported the bill and amendments, which were ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

DIRECT TAX.

The House then went into Committee of the Whole, on the bill supplementary to the act laying a direct tax.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH moved that the assessors should be compelled to attend two full days in each county in their several districts, instead of one day; which motion was negatived without a division.

Mr. NELSON, of Virginia, moved to strike out the proviso which makes the seller of a slave, after the purchaser has entered such slave as his property, responsible for the tax as well as the purchaser; which motion was agreed to.

After some ineffectual attempts to amend the bill, Mr. McLEAN, of Kentucky, offered an amendment, the object of which was to compel the assessors to attend at each court-house in their respective districts, as well when the counties exceed six, as when they do not; which was agreed to without objection.

The Committee then rose and reported the bill as amended. The House concurred in the amendments, and the bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The Committee of Ways and Means obtained leave to sit to-morrow during the session of the House; and then the House adjourned.

FRIDAY, March 29.

Mr. MILNOR presented the petition of the managers of the Pennsylvania Hospital, praying that the property of said hospital may be exempted from the payment of the direct tax; which was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. YANCEY, from the Committee of Claims, reported, with amendments, the amendments of the Senate to the bill authorizing payment for property lost, captured, or destroyed by the enemy, while in the public service; which were ordered to lie on the table.

The House went into Committee of the Whole on the bill supplementary to the act for defining the duties of the judges of the Territory of Illinois. The bill received a verbal amendment in committee, was reported to the House, and ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill to authorize the President to lease out the United States saline on the Washash river; which was reported to the House with some unimportant amendments, and the bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The House went into Committee of the Whole on the bill for the relief of Benjamin and John Tyler, of New Hampshire. The Committee rose, reported progress, was refused leave to sit again; and the bill was laid on the table.

The remaining orders of the day were suspended, on motion of Mr. NELSON of Virginia; and Mr. N. then submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire into the official conduct of Matthias B. Tallmadge, one of the District Judges of the State of New York, and to report their opinion whether the said Matthias B. Tallmadge has so acted in his judicial capacity as to require the interposition of the Constitutional power of this House; and that the said committee be authorized to send for persons, papers, and record.

The resolution was adopted without objection, and a committee of seven appointed accordingly.—Messrs. NELSON of Virginia, GROSVENOR, BETTS, GOLDSBOROUGH, YANCEY, WILKIN, and LAW, were appointed the said committee.

The bill for the relief of Edward Hallowell; the bill for the relief of Henry Malcolm; the bill for the relief of Edward Keeler and John Francis; the bill for the relief of Moses Lewis; the bill to remit certain duties on books imported for Harvard College; the bill for the relief of Robert Kidd; and the bill allowing 100,000 dollars to the captors of certain Algerine vessels, severally passed through a Committee of the Whole, and (with the exception of the last named, which was ordered to lie for the present on the table,) were ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

MISSISSIPPI TERRITORY.

The bill for the relief of certain purchasers of public lands in the Mississippi Territory, also passed through a Committee of the Whole, and was reported to the House with an immaterial amendment, which was agreed to.

Mr. HALL then moved the following as a new section to the bill: "That, from and after this day, the sum of money due the State of Georgia, under the articles of agreement and cession, shall bear an interest of six per cent. per annum, until paid."

This motion was objected to by Mr. ROBERTSON, who could see no reason or justice in the amendment; and supported by Mr. HALL, who said if the United States chose to grant gratuitous indulgence to their debtors, it was no reason why they should delay the payment of their debts without giving interest, &c.

The amendment was rejected by a large majority.

Mr. FORSYTH then offered an amendment to the bill, in the following words: "That the interest due, and which shall become due, from the persons entitled to the benefits of this act, shall be paid to the State of Georgia, in addition to the sum due by the articles of cession and agreement for the purchase of the Mississippi Territory."

This motion was supported by the mover, and opposed by Mr. ROBERTSON, and negatived; and then the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

REMISSION OF DUTIES.

The bill remitting the duties to Harvard College was, on motion of Mr. CLAY, amended in the Committee of the Whole, by including in the bill the remission of duties on the carriage of Governor Gore, of Upper Canada, who landed at New York in 1815, and passed through part of the United States to his Government.

It was inquired by Mr. FORSYTH, who conceived the remission of the duty an act of courtesy only, what the practice of the British Government was in such cases: that if the courtesy was not usual with that Government, he should be unwilling to extend it in the present instance.

It was replied by Mr. CLAY that, though his motion was founded in strict justice, it not being within the contemplation of the law to exact duties on a carriage which was not to be used in the country, the courtesy was usual in England, and on the continent of Europe.

Mr. HOPKINSON stated a fact, also, in which the duties accruing in Great Britain on certain paintings intended for the Pennsylvania Hospital were remitted, on the ground that they were for the general encouragement of the arts, and for a public institution.

The amendment was agreed to in committee, and concurred in unanimously by the House.

THE PREVIOUS QUESTION.

The SPEAKER proceeded to announce, severally, the orders of the day. On calling the report of the Committee on the Standing Rules and Orders of the House, which was under discussion some weeks ago,

Mr. STANFORD moved that the House resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole on the said order.

Mr. BASSETT moved that the order be indefinitely postponed.

Mr. STANFORD said, so far as it was the object of the House to get clear of the discussion of the previous question, it might be well enough to postpone indefinitely; but the motion itself he considered as opening the whole discussion. He considered the rule unconstitutional, and oppressive upon a minority of this House; that it always called up the worst feelings in the House, and he thought the present a propitious time to get clear of it. But, he was as anxious as any other gentleman to bring the session to a close, and would therefore content himself with asking the ayes and noes upon the question; which were ordered.

Mr. JACKSON expressed his wish that the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. BASSETT) would withdraw his motion.

Mr. TUCKER united in that request; not from an indisposition to express an opinion on the subject of the rule relating to the previous question, which it was the object of the mover of the order of the day to bring under consideration. He had always believed the rule an essential rule, however cautious the House should be in the exercise of it. But he was averse to this mode of acting on the question, preferring to meet it directly, and if the motion for postponement was persisted in he should vote against it.

Mr. BASSETT replied that he could not withdraw the motion. Gentlemen must perceive that it was now too late to take up the subject and go into a long debate—that subjects of a more pressing nature called for the attention of the House in order to bring the session to a close; and if the gentleman from North Carolina (Mr. STANFORD) wished to go into a discussion, he had it in his power, by a resolution to that effect.

Mr. STANFORD said that the gentleman, (Mr. B.,) and the House, knew there were other previous questions besides the main one. If he made the motion the gentleman spoke of, then followed the question of consideration, and the House had it in their power to evade the discussion at will. The other gentleman, from Virginia, (Mr. TUCKER,) declares that he thinks the rule a necessary and proper one, and ought, at times, to be resorted to. If, said Mr. S., the rule be a proper one—say a Constitutional one—then it was fair to use it upon one subject, as well as another, upon all subjects before the House; then we might be made a dumb Legislature complete; or we might be carried through a whole session in that way. He would forbear, however, as the ayes and noes were called, and it would be seen who were for, and who against the tyranny of this rule.

On taking the yeas and nays, it was discovered that a quorum had not voted—the ayes being 56, the noes 34.

Mr. STANFORD and Mr. BASSETT then successively withdrew their motions.

SALARY OF NEW YORK DISTRICT JUDGE.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill to allow additional compensation to the District Judge of the Southern District of the State of New York, for performing the judicial duties in both districts in the State.

This bill gave rise to some discussion, not on the propriety of allowing the compensation proposed, but on the expediency of adopting some course by which the Judge of the Northern district (Judge Tallmadge) should be compelled either to perform his official duties, or to resign; and not be permitted to hold a sinecure office.

Mr. CLAY thought it would be better to meet the question fairly at once, by inquiring into the conduct of the offending Judge, than to get round it by allowing extra compensation to the Judge who performs the duty of both.

Mr. NELSON said that the inquiry had not devolved on the Judiciary Committee, nor had they conceived it their duty to enter into an examination of the conduct of the Judge of the Northern district; but they had incidentally become acquainted with his improper conduct; and Mr. N. said he believed he ought to be turned out of office. That consideration, however, ought not to throw any impediment in the way of this bill, because a former law had enjoined on the Southern Judge (Van Ness) to perform those extra duties, if necessary, and he ought to be compensated therefor.

Mr. STANFORD had some doubt as to the constitutionality of voting a temporary increase of salary to a Judge. He doubted whether, if the compensation was allowed, it could with propriety afterwards be reduced; and for the purpose of entering into the inquiry of a general increase of salary to the Judges, he moved that the Committee rise.

Mr. BETTS remarked that Judge Tallmadge was incapacitated by bodily infirmity from performing his official duties, and that he had not received the salary for some time, &c.; to which it was replied by Mr. GROSVENOR and others that that fact was immaterial, as the Judge had a claim to the salary and could at any time demand and receive it.

The necessity of an inquiry into the neglect of Judge Tallmadge, was also urged by Mr. GROSVENOR and Mr. HOPKINSON.

The Committee then rose, ayes 53, noes 51, obtained leave to sit again, and the bill was laid on the table.

INDIANA AND MISSISSIPPI.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill to enable the people of Indiana Territory to form a Constitution and State government and be admitted in the Union on the footing of the original States.

The bill received a variety of amendments in its details, and having been gone through,

The Committee proceeded to take up the bill to enable the people of the Mississippi Territory to form a Constitution and State government, and be admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States.

After adopting various amendments and rejecting others, the discussion of which consumed considerable time, the bill was got through.

The Committee rose and reported the two bills with their amendments to the House.

The amendments reported to the first were successively agreed to, and the bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The amendments reported to the Mississippi bill were also agreed to, with the exception of one adopted by the Committee, on the motion of Mr. JOHNSON, reserving to the Congress the power of hereafter altering the boundary of the new State. This amendment was widely discussed, and finally disagreed to; after which, the bill was ordered to be engrossed, as amended, for a third reading; and the House adjourned.

SATURDAY, March 30.

Mr. LOWNDES, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported a bill making appropriations for the support of the Navy of the United States for the year 1816; which was read twice and committed to the Committee of the Whole on the report of the Committee of Ways and Means upon the subject of revenue.

Mr. L. also reported a bill continuing the salaries of certain officers of Government; which was read twice and committed to the Committee of the Whole last mentioned.

Mr. L. also reported a bill to fix the commissions of the collectors of the direct tax and internal duties, and to revive and continue in force "an act further to provide for the collection of duties on imports and tonnage;" which was read twice and also committed to the Committee of the Whole last mentioned.

Mr. INGHAM, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, reported a bill to establish post roads; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

A message from the Senate informed the House that an omission has taken place in engrossing the amendments made by the Senate to the bill "in addition to an act to regulate the Post Office Establishment," and to request the House to return the said bill and amendments to the Senate, with a view that the said omission may be supplied.

Ordered, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be discharged from a consideration of the bill and amendments aforesaid, and that the Clerk carry the same to the Senate.

On motion of Mr. JACKSON, a committee was appointed to inquire into the expediency of providing, by law, for making an artificial road from Washington, in Pennsylvania, through Charlestown, on the Ohio river, to the Sandusky river, at or near Fort Stephenson. Messrs. JACKSON, ROSS, LEWIS, LYLE, and PICKERING, were appointed the said committee.

Mr. HOPKINSON, after some introductory observations, in which he animadverted on the inconvenience and expense of the present mode of doing business, by which all bills, &c., which are not finally consummated at one session, are commenced at a following session de novo; also the additional expense to the parties who are brought here session after session on the same business, the repeated trouble to the House, &c., &c., for the purpose of remedying these evils, he submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee upon the Rules and Regulations of the House be instructed to inquire into the expediency of making, in conjunction with the Senate, the following alterations in the mode of transacting the public business of Congress, to wit: That the standing committees appointed at the commencement of any Congress shall not be dissolved at the end of the session at which they were appointed; that, on the adjournment of Congress, the unfinished business, to wit, bills, resolutions, and reports of committees shall remain over to the next session of the same Congress, in the same situation as they were at the time of adjournment.

The resolution for the present was, with the consent of the mover, laid on the table.

On motion of Mr. LOWNDES, the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures were instructed to inquire into the expediency of making an appropriation for preserving Little Gull Island, in Long Island Sound, near New London, from the encroachments of the sea.

Ordered, That the bill be "An act for the remission of certain duties on the importation of books for the use of Harvard College, and on the carriage and personal baggage of his Excellency W. Gore, Governor of the British province of Upper Canada."

CASE OF SHIP ALLEGANY.

Mr. STANFORD, from the Committee of Claims, reported a bill for the relief of the house of Bowie & Kurtz, and others; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. STANFORD also made the following report in the case:

That Richard Forrest, as agent for the Department of State, chartered the ship Allegany, Captain Eveolith, of the house of Bowie, Kurtz, and others, of Georgetown, to take out a cargo to the Dey of Algiers, in fulfilment of our treaty with the Regency. The charter party was entered into on the 20th day of January, 1812, and stipulated the time of receiving the cargo on board in the United States, and the time of its delivery at Algiers, the amount of freight, where and how it should be paid, and all the terms of the voyage, in the most precise and formal manner, binding the memorialists, with their ship, her freight and appurtenances, to the true and faithful performance of the same, under the penal sum of twelve thousand dollars, lawful money of the United States.

After the public cargo, however, was taken on board, room was found in the cabin and other parts of the ship to admit a further shipment of coffee and spices, and the privilege of such an adventure was accorded to the owners, on their private account, in consideration of their agreeing to receive in the United States the portion of their freight which the Government was otherwise bound to pay them at Algiers, which was accordingly accepted and agreed to.

Thus chartered and loaded, the Allegany sailed on her destined voyage, but was soon arrested by the embargo which preceded the declaration of war, and could not proceed until a special act was passed by Congress to permit the departure of vessels in the public service. When released, she proceeded and arrived at Algiers in good time, and, in all respects, conformably to contract. The cargo was consigned to Colonel T. Lear, the Consul General of the United States near the Dey and Regency of Algiers.

He states, in his communication to the Government on this subject, that the Dey and his officers at first appeared well pleased with the arrival of the Allegany; that the articles on board were at the time much needed; and that on the 20th of July (the third day after the arrival of the ship) the Minister of the Marine sent off a lighter, and actually received from on board the ship a considerable quantity of plank and spars, and proceeded to the landing place of the Marine.

Until now, everything appeared to be going on well, when, of a sudden, the temper and conduct of the Dey assumed the reverse aspect. He at once affects to be disappointed in the quantity of gunpowder and cables which had been sent to him; directs the lighter to be sent back to the ship with the plank and spars received, and at the same time sends a peremptory order "that the Allegany should depart from Algiers in three days, and take with her our Consul General, and all other citizens of the United States then at Algiers."

Against this violent proceeding remonstrances were made by Colonel Lear, but all was in vain—no argument availed anything. Instead of relaxing, he went still further, and demanded a cash payment of $27,000, which he insisted, according to the Mahometan year, was the balance due upon his annuities. Our Consul contended that $15,827 was all that was due, and that the cargo of the Allegany, if received, was more than sufficient to discharge it. But the Dey refused to have anything to do with the cargo, or to suffer it to be sold at Algiers. He did, however, extend the time two days longer for the departure of the ship, and then repeated his mandate that if, within the time, "the demanded balance was not paid into his treasury, and the ship did not depart, with the Consul, his family, and all the other Americans on board, he would detain them in slavery, confiscate the ship and cargo, and declare war against the United States."

Under this unpleasant alternative, Colonel Lear determined to raise the money, if possible, and depart accordingly. The house of Bacri was the only one where he could obtain the money for a bill on Gibraltar, and he drew one on John Salvino, Consul of the United States at that place, giving Bacri to understand that he bottomed the credit and redemption of the bill on the cargo of the Allegany, so far as it would go, who expressed his confidence in the pledge, and advanced the money; and the ship was then early on the morning of the 25th of July, within the prescribed time, carried by an Algerine captain and crew out of the port, whence she proceeded to Gibraltar.

Captain Evelith, of the Allegany, yielding to the necessity of the case, states in his protest that he should abandon the ship to the United States, and consider her as in their service and at their risk, but would navigate her under Colonel Lear's control and direction. Colonel Lear admits that, although he does not recollect any formal abandonment of the ship, Captain Evelith did submit her to his destination and control, and that he directed her to Gibraltar, a place from whence he could better serve the interests of the United States in sending out information of the events at Algiers to our different Consuls in the Mediterranean, in disposing of the Allegany's cargo, and providing to meet the bill which he had drawn on that place.

The committee have thus given as brief a view of the case of the Allegany as the history of the case would admit. Considering that she was chartered by the Government, and performed the stipulated voyage to their entire satisfaction; that she was then, by the arbitrary power of the Dey, compelled, not chartered, into their further service, and that, too, to save their citizens and their property from Algerine seizure; sent upon a new voyage, as opposed to the interests of the owners as it was contrary to the instructions given to their commander; that she was thus diverted from her proper destination, and thrown into the hands of a different enemy, where she was seized and ultimately condemned, ship and cargo, to the serious disadvantage and loss of the memorialists—the committee are impressed with the justice of their claim, and are of opinion that they are entitled to indemnity in this case, when they reflect that the Government has awarded relief in similar cases recollected, and particularly in the cases of the Anna Maria, of New York, and the Resource, of Baltimore, vessels employed in the same service, and suffered in like manner by the arbitrary conduct of some one or other of the Barbary Powers.

They therefore beg leave to report a bill for the relief of the memorialists in the present case.

COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC EXPENDITURES.

Mr. TUCKER called up for consideration the resolutions he submitted some weeks ago respecting the appointment, at the commencement of each session, of additional standing committees for the investigation of the public expenditures.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, did not believe that much good could flow out of the measure. There were already, he said, an accountant of the War and an accountant of the Navy Departments, and a comptroller over them, and now we are to appoint committees of Congress over the whole, to inspect accounts after the money has been paid away. Furthermore, he thought it would be impracticable for the committees to act efficiently unless they sat all the year. Mr. S. said he remembered that a gentleman of this House (Mr. RANDOLPH) once moved a similar investigation into what was called the Augean stable; the inquiry was ordered; the gentleman went into it; five thousand dollars were spent in printing documents, &c., and, after all, there was not even a resolution or any other proceeding predicated on the examination.

The motion was advocated by Messrs. TUCKER, DESHA, STANFORD, WRIGHT, and LOWNDES, by whom it was argued that the experience of other States, particularly Virginia, proved the utility of such committees; that they were also found extremely beneficial and useful in England; that clamors and suspicions had gone abroad, and though they might not be well founded, still they rendered the inquiry necessary; that if anything was wrong in the public accounts, the Government ought to know it and the evil be corrected; that if the committees only entered into a general, and not a minute and detailed investigation of those accounts, much good would still result from it, as it would tend to correct frauds, or errors, if any; that it was the duty of this branch of the Government to inspect the money concerns, and see that they were correctly and faithfully conducted.

The resolutions were then agreed to in the following form:

Resolved, That the following standing committees be appointed to serve during the present Congress, and that hereafter, at the commencement of the first session in each Congress, like committees shall be appointed, whose duties shall continue until the first session of the ensuing Congress:

1. A committee on so much of the Public Accounts and Expenditures as relate to the Department of State.
2. A committee on so much of the Public Accounts and Expenditures as relate to the Treasury Department.
3. A committee on so much of the Accounts and Expenditures as relate to the Department of War.
4. A committee on so much of the Public Accounts and Expenditures as relate to the Department of the Navy.
5. A committee on so much of the Public Accounts and Expenditures as relate to the Post Office; and
6. A committee on so much of the Public Accounts and Expenditures as relate to the Public Buildings.

The said committees shall consist of three members each.

It shall be the duty of the committees to examine into the state of the accounts and expenditures respectively submitted to them, and to inquire and report, particularly,

Whether the expenditures of the respective Departments are justified by law;

Whether the claims, from time to time satisfied and discharged by the respective Departments, are supported by sufficient vouchers, establishing their justness both as to their character and amount;

Whether such claims have been discharged out of funds appropriated therefor, and whether all moneys have been disbursed in conformity with appropriation laws; and

Whether any and what provisions are necessary to be adopted to provide more perfectly for the proper application of the public moneys, and to secure the Government from demands unjust in their character or extravagant in their amount.

And it shall be, moreover, the duty of the said committees to report, from time to time, whether any and what retrenchments can be made in the expenditures of the several Departments without detriment to the public service; whether any and what abuses at any time exist in the failure to enforce the payment of moneys which may be due to the United States from public defaulters, or others, and to report, from time to time, such provisions and arrangements as may be necessary to add to the economy of the several Departments and the accountability of their officers.

Messrs. YATES, MASON, and EDWARDS, were appointed a committee pursuant to the first rule.

Messrs. SMITH, of Maryland, HULBERT, and HAHN, were appointed a committee pursuant to the second rule.

Messrs. ROOT, FORNEY, and SHEFFEY, were appointed a committee pursuant to the third rule.

Messrs. ARCHER, LUMPKIN, and HUGER, were appointed a committee pursuant to the fourth rule.

Messrs. CANNON, PARRIS, and MILNOR, were appointed a committee pursuant to the fifth rule.

Messrs. CONDUCT, DARLINGTON, and REED, were appointed a committee pursuant to the sixth rule.

LOST AND CAPTURED PROPERTY, &c.

The House then proceeded to consider the amendments of the Senate to the bill from this House, to authorize the payment for property lost, captured, or destroyed by the enemy while in the public service.

One of the Senate's amendments was the addition of a clause providing for the payment of the forty cents per day stipulated to be paid for certain horses which were afterwards lost, as well as the value of each horse. The Committee of Claims, to whom the Senate's amendments were referred, recommended the disagreement to this amendment. This recommendation to disagree was the question first considered.

The Senate's amendment was strenuously advocated by Messrs. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, DESHA, McLEAN, of Kentucky, HARDIN, JACKSON, McKEE, and SHARPE, who supported the justice of allowing the 40 per cent. per day first stipulated, together with the value of the horse lost. The adverse side was taken by Messrs. YANCEY, CULPEPER, and STEARNS, who denied the justice of the remuneration to the extent contended for. The debate on this question occupied much time, taking the course through which it extended when the subject was originally brought before the House.

The question was finally decided against the recommendation of the Committee of Claims, and in favor of the Senate's amendment—68 to 50.

Mr. ROANE proposed to add the following clause to the cases in the bill in which payment is to be made by the Government: "When any produce or merchandise with which any wagon, cart, boat, or sleigh, impressed into the service of the United States was laden, shall have been lost or consumed in consequence of such impressment."

After some objections to the amendment by Mr. YANCEY, and reply by Mr. ROANE, the motion was negatived.

Various other unsuccessful amendments were offered to the amendments of the Senate; after which the latter were concurred in by the House.

INDIANA TERRITORY.

An engrossed bill, entitled "An act to enable the people of the Indiana Territory to form a constitution and State government, and for the admission of such State into the Union on an equal footing with the original States," was read the third time, and on the question, Shall this bill pass? it passed in the affirmative—yeas 108, nays 3, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adgate, Archer, Baker, Barbour, Bassett, Bateman, Bennett, Betts, Boss, Bradbury, Breckenridge, Brooks, Bryan, Burnside, Cady, Caldwell, Chappell, Clarke of North Carolina, Clayton, Clendennin, Condict, Cooper, Crawford, Creighton, Crocheron, Culpeper, Cuthbert, Darlington, Davenport, Desha, Edwards, Forsyth, Gold, Goodwyn, Griffin, Hahn, Hall, Hammond, Hardin, Hawes, Heister, Henderson, Huger, Hulbert, Hungerford, Irving of New York, Jackson, Johnson of Virginia, Johnson of Kentucky, Kent, Kerr of Virginia, King of North Carolina, Langdon, Love, Lovett, Lumpkin, Lyle, Lyon, Maclay, Marsh, McCoy, McKee, McLean, of Kentucky, Milnor, Nelson of Massachusetts, Nelson of Virginia, Newton, Parris, Pickens, Pickering, Piper, Pitkin, Pleasants, Powell, Reynolds, Roane, Root, Ross, Ruggles, Savage, Schenck, Sharpe, Smith of Maryland, Smith of Virginia, Stanford, Strong, Sturges, Taggart, Taul, Telfair, Throop, Townsend, Tucker, Vose, Wallace, Ward, of Massachusetts, Ward of New Jersey, Wendover, Whiteside, Wilcox, Wilde, Wilkin, Willoughby, William Wilson, Woodward, Wright, Yancey, and Yates.

MISSISSIPPI TERRITORY.

An engrossed bill, entitled "An act to enable the Mississippi Territory to form a constitution and State government, and for the admission of such State into the Union on an equal footing with the original States," was read the third time.

A short debate took place, arising from some objections made to the bill by Mr. STANFORD, who was opposed to it because it contained no provision for the future division of the Territory, which he thought entirely too large, considered in relation to the other States, and in time would be too powerful if it continued an undivided State; and he wished the bill might be recommended for amendment in that particular.

Mr. STANFORD was replied to by Messrs. LATIMORE and HARDIN, who argued that the Territory, it was believed, had a sufficient population to entitle it to a State constitution; at any rate it would the next session have enough to demand admission into the Union, and it was as well to grant that now, with a good grace, which in so short a time Congress would be unable to refuse; that if the Territory be now divided, it would be twenty years before the half of it would be able to ask a State government; that from the immense quantities of barrens unfit for cultivation, and the great quantity of Indian lands it contained, it would be a very long time before its population would, if ever, exceed that of any other State; that it was good policy to encourage by every means the population of that section of the country, to be able promptly to repel an enemy where attacks would very probably be made; that it was an older Territory than Indiana, in whose favor a bill had just passed, with scarcely a dissenting voice.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, also opposed the recommitment and advocated the passage of the bill, though he was decidedly of opinion that Congress ought to retain the power of altering the boundary of the new State hereafter, if they should deem the alteration necessary; but the House having yesterday decided against such a reservation, he thought it wrong to impede the passage of the bill.

Mr. J. supported his opinions by a variety of arguments; after which the bill passed, by yeas and nays—for the passage 70, against it 53, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adgate, Archer, Barbour, Bassett, Bateman, Betts, Brooks, Bryan, Chappell, Clarke of North Carolina, Clendennin, Condict, Crawford, Creighton, Crocheron, Darlington, Desha, Forsyth, Goodwyn, Hahn, Hall, Hammond, Hardin, Henderson, Hungerford, Ingham, Irving of New York, Jackson, Johnson of Virginia, Johnson of Kentucky, Kerr of Virginia, King of North Carolina, Love, Lumpkin, Lyle, Lyon, Maclay, Mayrant, McCoy, McKee, McLean of Kentucky, Moore, Nelson of Virginia, Newton, Parris, Pickens, Piper, Pleasants, Powell, Reynolds, Root, Ross, Savage, Schenck, Sharpe, Smith of Maryland, Smith of Virginia, Taul, Throop, Wallace, Wendover, Whiteside, Wilde, Wilkin, Willoughby, William Wilson, Woodward, Wright, Yancey, and Yates.

NAYS—Messrs. Alexander, Baer, Baker, Boss, Bradbury, Breckenridge, Brown, Burnside, Chipman, Ciley, Clayton, Cooper, Culpeper, Cuthbert, Davenport, Edwards, Gaston, Gold, Goldsborough, Griffin, Hale, Hawes, Heister, Hopkinson, Hulbert, Jewett, Kent, Langdon, Law, Lewis, Lovett, Marsh, Milnor, Moseley, Nelson of Massachusetts, Pickering, Pitkin, Randolph, Roane, Ruggles, Southard, Stanford, Stearns, Strong, Sturges, Taggart, Telfair, Tucker, Vose, Ward of Massachusetts, Ward of New Jersey, Webster, and Wilcox.

MONDAY, April 1.

Mr. EASTON presented a petition of sundry inhabitants of the Territory of Missouri, praying to be incorporated as a commercial company, for the purposes of trade and intercourse with the Indian tribes.—Referred to Messrs. EASTON, MCKEE, THOMAS WILSON, CADY, ATHERTON, CLENDENNIN, and POWELL.

Mr. LOWNDES, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported a bill for the relief of certain owners of goods entered at Hampden, in the District of Maine; which was read twice, and committed to the Committee of the Whole on the bill for the relief of David Gelston and Peter A. Schenck.

Mr. LOWNDES, from the same committee, reported the bill from the Senate "for the relief of Richard Mitchell," without amendment; and the bill was ordered to be read a third time tomorrow.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Treasurer of the United States, transmitting his annual accounts of receipts and payments at the Treasury for the year ending October 1, 1815; which was ordered to lie on the table.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a report from the Secretary of the Navy on the petition of John McCauley, prize agent of the officers and crew of the brig Vixen; which was read and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting his report in obedience to a resolution of the House of the 9th ultimo, relative to expenses incurred in prosecutions on behalf of the United States in the States of New Hampshire, Massachusetts, Connecticut, Vermont, and New York; which were ordered to lie on the table.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a bill "to reward the officers and crew of the United States frigate Constitution," in which they ask the concurrence of this House. The Senate also returned to this House the bill "in addition to an act to regulate the Post Office Establishment," with the amendments of the Senate corrected.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill to increase the pensions of certain invalid pensioners. No amendment being offered, the Committee rose, reported a bill to the House; and it was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

REPORTS FROM COMMITTEES.

Mr. YANCEY, from the Committee of Claims made a report on the petition of Asher Palmer, which was read; when Mr. Y. reported a bill for the relief of Asher Palmer; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. YANCEY also made a report on the petition of the supervisors of Clinton county, in the State of New York, which was read; when Mr. Y. reported a bill for the relief of the supervisors of the county of Clinton, in the State of New York; which was read twice, and committed to the Committee of the Whole last appointed.

The report is as follows:

That, in the month of September, 1814, when the British forces invaded the United States on the frontier of the State of New York, they took possession of a part of the village of Plattsburg, and sought a cover from the American artillery at the fort near the village, from a number of houses belonging to individuals, and the court-house of the county of Clinton. In order to uncover and dislodge the enemy, General Macomb, who at that time commanded the American troops at that place, considered it prudent and proper to fire hot shot into the houses for the purpose of destroying them. Among the number thus destroyed was the courthouse of Clinton. The petitioners, on behalf of the county, pray that Congress will pay the value of the house.

The facts in the petition having been satisfactorily established, and it appearing to the committee that the property was destroyed for public good, they are of opinion that the petitioners are entitled to relief, and therefore report by bill.

Mr. YANCEY also made a report on the petition of John Crosby and John Crosby, junior, which was read; when Mr. Y. reported a bill for the relief of John Crosby and John Crosby, junior, which was read twice, and committed to the Committee of the Whole.

The report is as follows:

That, in the month of August, 1814, the United States frigate Adams, commanded by Captain Charles Morris, arrived at Hampden, in the county of Hancock and State of Massachusetts, and was moored at the wharf of the petitioners. The Adams remained at the wharf until the 3d day of September following, when a British naval force appeared and attacked her. Captain Morris, after having bravely defended his ship for a considerable time against a much superior force, considered it prudent, under all circumstances, to set fire to the ship and blow her up, to prevent her falling into the possession of the enemy. The fire which was thus applied to the ship communicated itself to the wharf and storehouse of the petitioners, and they were consumed, together with their stock of goods on hand. They pray that Congress would pay them the value of their property destroyed.

The committee are of opinion that the injury which the petitioners have sustained, being immediately consequential of a justifiable and prudent act of an officer of the Government, they are entitled to relief, and therefore report by bill.

Mr. YANCEY also made a report on the petition of Taylor & McNeal, Evans & McNeal, and Henry & John McCleister, which was read; when Mr. Y. reported a bill for the relief of Taylor & McNeal, Evans & McNeal, and Henry & John McCleister; which was read twice, and committed to the Committee of the Whole last mentioned.

Mr. MIDDLETON, from the select committee appointed on the 10th of January last on the petition of James H. McCulloch, made a report thereon; which was read, and committed to a Committee of the Whole to-morrow.

The report is as follows:

The said petitioner states, that he entered upon the office of collector of the port of Baltimore early in the year 1808, with a prospect, indeed, of difficulties and labors arising from the peculiar situation of the country at that time, but under an assurance of receiving adequate compensation for his services. That such an expectation was reasonable, may be inferred from the universal practice of this Government, which has ever been to provide fixed salaries where other profits are either inadequate or forbidden. The petitioner was confirmed in this his belief, from the circumstance of the House of Representatives having, in that particular juncture of affairs, under the impression that the emoluments of the officers of the customs would be lessened by the embargo acts, directed the Secretary of the Treasury to report his opinion of the cases where a temporary increase of salary might be necessary. In obedience to this resolve, the then Secretary addressed a circular to the officers of the customs, under date of April 23, 1808, giving instructions respecting the embargo act, and calling upon the said officers to make returns of their emoluments, in order that he might make his report in conformity to the views of Congress.

That the emoluments of the petitioner, as collector of the port of Baltimore, have not been by any means adequate to the services he performed within the period alluded to, appears from his statement that in 1808 he seemed to receive $72, but actually sunk $428, on account of a salary to a clerk paid by himself; in the year 1809 he received $589; in the year 1810 he received $512; in 1814 he paid $980 for performing the public service, while the support of his family each year amounted to $2,000; the result is, that in these four years he received from the public $673, and expended in the maintenance of a frugal family $8,000, and in the support of a custom-house for the public $980. His account at the Treasury will establish the correctness of what is here stated. The intervening years were more profitable, but below the common receipts of the office and the limit of the law.

The committee, having duly considered the foregoing statement, are of opinion that the compensation allowed by law to James H. McCulloch, collector of the customs at Baltimore, having been taken away by the operation of other laws enacted for the public benefit, he has an undoubted claim upon the public justice to provide an equivalent; and inasmuch as the committee believe that there exist other similar cases of hardship, arising from the non-productive state of the revenue derived from impost during the embargo and non-intercourse laws, with a view to embrace such cases, they recommend the following resolution:

Resolved, by the Senate and House of Representatives, That the President of the United States be authorized to allow an extra compensation, for a limited time, to those officers of the customs whose emoluments were diminished below a reasonable salary during the restrictive system.

GENERAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The House, on motion of Mr. LOWNDES, resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill making appropriations for the support of Government for the year 1816.

In filling up the blank in the bill, left for the appropriation for the payment of the members of Congress, some debate arose as to the manner of drawing this compensation. The act lately passed to alter the mode of compensating the members of Congress, declares that they shall receive an "annual" salary of one thousand five hundred dollars; and in a subsequent clause, provides that the compensation shall be "certified and made in the manner heretofore provided by law;" the custom under the former law was to pay the members from time to time, as the services were rendered.

Mr. L. in obedience to instructions from the Committee of Ways and Means, and in accordance with what he understood to be the construction given to the act by the Attorney General, moved to fill the blank with a sum sufficient to defray the compensation for the year ending on the 4th of March, 1816, and making no provision for the services which would intervene between that period and the end of the next session.

APRIL, 1816.

H. OF R.

This construction of the act was disputed by Mr. CLAY, the Speaker. He thought that the members, whenever they could exhibit evidence of the rendition of services, had a fair claim for a due proportion of the annual salary. Such had been the practice heretofore; and if the rule laid down by the Attorney General were adopted, a member who happened to come into Congress after the 4th of March, would receive nothing until the next March. Against the inconvenience and hardships of this construction, Mr. C. argued at some length; and for the purpose of making an appropriation out of which to compensate the members for the remainder of this session, and part of the next, moved to fill the blank with a sum adequate to meet that object. Mr. C. added, that as the public interest would be unaffected by this decision, let either construction of the act be adopted, he saw no objection to pursuing the course he proposed, without however allowing any member to draw so much of the salary as would bring him at any time in debt to the Government.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, differed both from the Speaker and the Attorney General in this, that the compensation given to members was intended to embrace a whole session, long or short; but as it made no difference to the United States, and that construction had been given, he should acquiesce, and vote for the appropriation, provided an amendment which he had drawn up should be adopted, which did not interfere with the construction given, and was indispensable to do justice to the Government, and to certain members who had not attended the whole session; which amendment was intended to make a deduction from the compensation of members for absence, in the proportion that absence bore to the whole days of the session.

Mr. JACKSON explained the views of the select committee, when they originally reported in favor of changing the mode of compensation; and concurred in the construction given by Mr. CLAY.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, also concurred in the construction of the law given to it by the Speaker. According to the other interpretation of it, if the members were called here to an extra session, they would be obliged to bring money in their pockets to defray their expenses, as they could receive no compensation until the end of the year.

Mr. GASTON thought it not of much importance which construction was adopted; but stated the reasons that induced him to believe the construction given by the Attorney General the true one. Mr. G. compared the terms of the several acts on this subject to establish what he believed the proper construction, and to show that Mr. CLAY's could not be sustained.

Mr. WRIGHT thought it entirely unnecessary to dispute about the construction of the late law.

Congress had voted to its members a certain annual compensation, which might be viewed in the light of a contingent fund, and it was perfectly competent for Congress to direct in what way, and in what proportions, that compensation should be drawn.

The Committee then agreed to the amendment proposed by Mr. CLAY, and filled the blank in the bill accordingly.

With the exception of some objections made by Mr. JEWETT to an appropriation for additional clerks for one of the departments, the Committee met with no difficulty in its progress through the bill, until Mr. JACKSON moved to insert a clause appropriating $300,000, out of the fund set apart for that purpose, for carrying on the great western road from Cumberland to Ohio.

This amendment was earnestly opposed by Mr. GASTON, on the ground that it was improper to introduce into an ordinary bill an appropriation for an object which had not been authorized by a previous act. In support of his position Mr. G. cited a recent course pursued by the Committee of Ways and Means, who, although aware of the necessity of protecting an island whereon an important light-house was placed (Gull Island) from the encroachments of the sea, did not think it proper to resort to the slovenly mode of inserting an appropriation for that purpose in the bill now under consideration, but instructed its chairman to move that the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures be previously directed to inquire into the propriety of the expenditure, and to report thereon. Mr. G. said the checks upon the disbursement of the Government were already few enough, and they ought not to be further diminished by this House.

MESSRS. JACKSON, CLAY, RANDOLPH, SMITH, WRIGHT, and GOLDSBOROUGH, respectively, advocated the amendment. The three gentlemen first named being particularly zealous in its support. It was argued that the appropriation moved for was extremely interesting to the Western States, and more important to the people of every section of the country than any other item in the bill, if the Union of the States was to be, as all expected it to be, the means of public happiness, prosperity, and safety. That the appropriation was required from a fund already set apart for the work by a solemn compact; that if this House could be called on to appropriate money to carry into effect a convention with a foreign Government, it could surely make an appropriation to execute a contract with the States, a double compact, too, it being between the General Government, and the States of Ohio, Pennsylvania, and Virginia, as they were all parties to it; that the appropriation was, furthermore, sanctioned by former laws directing the work to be prosecuted, and that nothing was wanting to fulfil the law but the present appropriation of money, for which there were several precedents; that the single State of Maryland had undertaken to complete, in five years, a road from Baltimore to the point at which the Cumberland road commenced, and that it would be derogatory to the character of the General Government to be outdone by a small State in a work of so much public utility and political consequence; a work authorized by repeated laws, and wanting an appropriation only from the fund already solemnly pledged to it, to carry it on rapidly, &c. It was likewise stated in debate, by all whose personal knowledge enabled them to speak on that point, that the thirty miles of the turnpike completed between Cumberland and Ohio, was the most excellent road which had ever been made in America; and Mr. CLAY took occasion to remark, that he had seen many turnpikes, as well in Europe as in this country, but had never travelled on so fine a road as the thirty miles of the Cumberland turnpike which were finished.

Mr. JACKSON's amendment was finally agreed to, and the appropriation inserted.

The Committee having filled up all the blanks, and gone through the bill—

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, moved the amendment alluded to by him in the discussion this morning respecting the manner of distributing the compensation to the members, which was agreed to.

No other amendment having been offered to the bill, the Committee of the whole House, on motion of Mr. LOWNDES, proceeded to the consideration of the bill making appropriations for the military service for the year 1816.

In addition to the ordinary appropriations in the bill, Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, moved to insert one of $15,000, to pay the owners of certain vessels sunk in the harbor of Baltimore, in 1814, to defend it against the enemy; which had been reported in the ordinance bill, but withdrawn to be transferred to this.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, stated the urgent circumstances under which the measure of sinking the vessels had been adopted, the authority of the commanding officer (General Smith) therefor, in which he was warranted by an act of Congress, making appropriation of $250,000 for such objects, and which act Mr. S. read.

The amendment was agreed to without objection.

Having filled up the blanks, and got through the bill, the Committee successively took up the bill making appropriations for the Navy for the year 1816, and the bill to increase the salaries of certain officers of the Government; which were also proceeded through; when the Committee of the Whole rose and reported to the House the four bills which it had had under consideration, with the amendments thereto.

Some conversation took place between Messrs. RANDOLPH, LOWNDES, and JOHNSON, in which Mr. R. opposed going to-day into the report of the Committee on the bill making appropriations for the civil list, the provisions of which required a more deliberate investigation. The two latter gentlemen were opposed to delay, because the first quarter of the year had already expired, and all the officers of Government waiting the appropriation necessary for their subsistence.

The House then passed by the bill for the civil list, and successively agreed to all the amendments to the three remaining bills, which were ordered to be engrossed for a third reading to-morrow.

TUESDAY, April 2.

Mr. HERRBERT, from the committee appointed on the 27th ultimo, reported a bill supplementary to the act entitled "An act to incorporate a company for making certain turnpike roads in the District of Columbia;" which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

On motion of Mr. THOMAS WILSON,

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to lay before this House all such testimony as may be in possession of the Executive, relative to the location and confirmation of the route of the United States road from Cumberland, in Maryland, to the Ohio river, particularly relative to that part of the route extending from the town of Washington, in Pennsylvania, to the said river, with the distances and description of ground upon the different routes which have been examined, and the difference, as far as the same has been ascertained, between the distance on each straight line and that upon the location for a road in the direction of the same line between Brownsville, on the Monongahela, and the Ohio river, as well to Charlestown, or any other point on said river to which the route for a road has been examined, as to Wheeling; with any other information which the President may deem material, the communication of which, in the opinion of the President, may not be inexpedient or improper.

Mr. THOMAS WILSON and Mr. STRONG were appointed a committee to present the foregoing resolution to the President of the United States.

On motion of Mr. BARBOUR, the Committee of Ways and Means were instructed to inquire into the propriety of providing by law for compensating the services of such assessors as shall have begun to perform the duties of their office, and shall have been prevented from completing the same, either by reason of an assumption of the direct tax, or by order from the proper officer of the United States not to proceed further therein.

Mr. LOWNDES, after a few prefatory remarks, offered the following resolution, which was agreed to without objection:

Resolved, That the Committee on Naval Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of so amending the laws relating to the Marine Corps, as to reduce the number of that corps to be retained on the Peace Establishment to a number which shall bear a just proportion to the naval force which it is proposed to keep in service.

The bill from the Senate "to reward the officers and crew of the frigate Constitution," was read twice, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

1816; and the engrossed bill making appropriations for the support of the Navy for the year 1816, were severally read the third time, and passed.

The bill from the Senate "for the relief of Richard Mitchell," was committed to the Committee of the Whole on the bill for the relief of David Gelston and Peter A. Schenck.

AMENDING RULES.

The resolution for amending the rules of proceedings, submitted by Mr. HOPKINSON yesterday, was called up for consideration.

After some conversation as to the mode of arriving at the general object of the resolution, to which there was no objection, as to the propriety of making it a joint inquiry, and of appointing the committees for the whole Congress, &c., the resolution was agreed to in the following words:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire, in conjunction with such committee as may be appointed by the Senate, into the expediency of making the following alterations in the mode of transacting the public business of Congress, to wit: That the standing committees appointed at the commencement of any Congress, shall not be dissolved at the end of the session at which they were appointed; that on the adjournment of Congress the unfinished business, to wit: bills, resolutions, and reports of committees, shall remain over to the next session of the same Congress, in the same situation as they were at the time of adjournment.

Mr. HOPKINSON, Mr. BASSETT, and Mr. YANCEY, were appointed the committee on the part of the House.

POST OFFICE BILL.

The amendments of the Senate to the bill in addition to the act regulating the Post Office Establishment, were taken up. One of these amendments being to increase the compensation of a particular deputy postmaster, gave rise to a desultory debate of some length on the merits of other deputy postmasters, and their claims to additional compensation.

The House then proceeded to that amendment of the Senate which struck out the third section of the bill, which is as follows:

"Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That letters and packages to and from any member of the Senate, a member or delegate of the House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States, the Secretary of the Senate, and Clerk of the House of Representatives, shall be conveyed free of postage from the commencement of every Congress until the termination thereof, and for thirty days thereafter: Provided always, That no letter or packet shall exceed two ounces in weight."

And in lieu thereof to insert the following:

"Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That letters and packets to and from any member of the Senate, a member or delegate of the House of Representatives of the United States, the Secretary of the Senate, and Clerk of the House of Representatives, shall be conveyed free of postage for thirty days previous to each session of Congress, and for thirty days after the termination thereof: Provided always, That no letter or packet shall exceed two ounces in weight, and in case of excess of weight, that excess alone shall be paid for."

Mr. RANDOLPH hoped the House would not concur with the Senate in this amendment, and proceeded to argue at some length in opposition thereto. He said, substantially, that there were many of the petty officers of the Government who possessed the privilege of franking; that the members of Congress were great officers of the State, at all times liable to be called here at a moment's warning upon national concerns; that the Clerk of this House, and the Secretary of the Senate, were also high and responsible officers, constantly in the public service, and men better entitled to the privilege than many who possessed it; and a concurrence in the amendment would be consenting to take rank below the subordinate officers of the Government. He knew that great clamor had been attempted to be raised on the subject of another (the compensation) bill which lately passed the House; but what political materials are there, said Mr. R., which factious printers will not work up to serve their purposes? Was there a shadow of reason why the Vice President of the United States should be invested with this privilege, that was not equally strong in favor of the presiding officer of this House? a privilege possessed by the highest and the lowest officer in the public employ—from the President of the United States to a deputy postmaster, who does not receive five dollars a year in postage. Compare this privilege, said he, with the exemption from militia service, which is conferred on postmasters, and then decide the question. He could not agree to the practice of stripping the members of Congress of a necessary privilege, like so many livery servants, twenty days after the end of the session.

Mr. CUTBERT was in favor of concurrence. If the privilege of franking were claimed as a matter of compensation, then, as a matter of compensation, he was opposed to it; if as a matter of privilege, then as a matter of privilege he was opposed to it. He thought also that instead of maintaining the dignity of the members by contending for this power, they were putting themselves on a footing with the subordinate officers of the Government by it. The President, he said, was the Chief Executive Magistrate, constantly engaged in corresponding on national concerns, and required an exemption from the payment of postage. Whatever privileges are necessary to aid in conducting public business, and not to suit private convenience, for the purpose of corresponding with friends, &c., was proper, but none others.

Mr. WEBSTER spoke against concurring with the Senate in their amendments. He thought if there was any necessity or propriety in the privilege during the session, it was equally proper during the recess, if members were to be regarded as public men. The power of abusing the privilege was no argument; how many thousand deputy postmasters were there who could abuse the privilege, yet it was not urged against granting it to them. He thought it was proper to confine the privilege strictly to the session, or to extend it to the recess also.

Mr. REYNOLDS was also in favor of retaining the privilege. An important reason for it was, the resolution this very day adopted, to make the standing committees permanent during the whole Congress, which would involve them in correspondence on public business.

Mr. JACKSON spoke a short time against the amendment. He thought it important that communication should be kept up during the recess, between the members and their constituents. In this case, said he, we should not be presenting petitions on the last day of the session, if a free channel of communication could be kept open. In every point of view, without going over the elevated, the dignified ground on which this question stood, it ought to be maintained by the House.

Mr. WRIGHT and Mr. GROSVENOR also made some remarks in favor of the privilege; after which the question was decided in favor of concurring with the Senate—yeas 80, nays 51, as follows:

The residue of the said amendments were then concurred in by the House.

GENERAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The House then proceeded to consider the report of the Committee of the Whole, on the bill making appropriations for the support of Government, for the year 1816.

The original bill contained an appropriation of twenty-five per cent. in addition to the salaries heretofore allowed to the clerks of the several departments. This increase of compensation was stricken out by the Committee of the Whole, and, on the question of concurring in the amendment—

Mr. CULPEPER said, he felt some objection to the indiscriminate rejection of the addition first proposed. He adverted to the great depreciation of money, the increased price of necessaries, &c., as a reason for believing that an additional allowance was in some cases necessary. Mr. C. thought that every man who devoted himself to the public service ought to be comfortably supported; he believed a few did already receive a compensation sufficiently high, the salaries of some being $2,000, and he would not, therefore, lay on the twenty-five per cent. indiscriminately; but, he said, there were individuals in the public service who were not decently maintained, and to such he wished an increase. Mr. C. thought a maximum might with reason and propriety be established, which no salary of a clerk should exceed, and by which others might be graduated.

When Mr. C. concluded, the amendment was concurred in by the House, without a dissenting voice.

The House agreed successively to the remaining amendments of the Committee; and then ordered the bill to be engrossed for a third reading.

THE TARIFF.

On motion of Mr. LOWNDES the House proceeded to consider the report of the Committee of the Whole, on the bill to regulate the duties on imports.

The question on agreeing to the amendment of the Committee, to reduce the duty on unmanufactured wool, from 15 to 7½ per cent. ad valorem, being put—

Mr. ROOT opposed the amendment, and made some remarks on the impolicy of leaving the country open to foreign competition, in an article which it was so important to encourage the domestic increase of. He hoped the House would not agree to the amendment reported by the Committee, and demanded the yeas and nays on the question.

The amendment was then agreed to—yeas 73, nays 42, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alexander, Archer, Baer, Bassett, Baylies, Bennett, Boss, Bradbury, Breckenridge, Calhoun, Champion, Cilley, Clayton, Conner, Cooper, Crawford, Creighton, Culpeper, Cuthbert, Davenport, Edwards, Forney, Gaston, Gold, Grosvenor, Hahn, Hale, Hardin, Hopkinson, Hulbert, Hungerford, Ingham, Kent, Law, Lewis, Love, Maclay, Marsh, Mason, McKee, McLean of Kentucky, Middleton, Milnor, Moseley, Nelson of Massachusetts, Newton, Pickering, Pinkney, Piper, Pitkin, Pleasants, Randolph, Reed, Ross, Ruggles, Sergeant, Schenck, Stanford, Stearns, Sturges, Tate, Throop, Vose, Wallace, Ward of New Jersey, Ward of New York, Webster, Wendover, Wheaton, William Wilson, Woodward, Yancey, and Yates.

Mr. FORSYTH then moved to strike out the whole of the amendment adopted by the Committee, to graduate the duty on imported cottons, (by laying a duty of thirty per cent., for two years, from the 30th of June, of twenty-five per cent. for two years thereafter, and then of twenty per cent.,) except the last named sum; in other words, to reduce the duty on cottons to twenty per cent. from June next.

This motion, involving the general question of the degree of protection proper to be afforded to domestic manufactures—

Mr. GASTON rose and delivered his opinions in opposition to the policy of burdening the community by an extravagant duty on imports, for the purpose of encouraging domestic manufactures. Mr. G. spoke about an hour.

Mr. CUTHBERT followed on the same side of the question, in a speech of about the same length; when the question was decided in the negative—yeas 65, nays 69, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Archer, Baer, Barbour, Bassett, Breckenridge, Bryan, Caldwell, Champion, Cilley, Clarke of North Carolina, Clayton, Culpeper, Cuthbert, Edwards, Forney, Forsyth, Gaston, Goldsborough, Hale, Hall, Hardin, Heister, Henderson, Herbert, Huger, Hungerford, Jewett, Johnson of Virginia, Kerr of Virginia, Lewis, Love, Lovett, Lowndes, Lyon, McCoy, McKee, Middleton, Moore, Moseley, Murfree, Nelson of Massachusetts, Nelson of Virginia, Noyes, Pickens, Pickering, Pleasants, Randolph, Roane, Root, Ross, Smith of Virginia, Stanford, Stearns, Sturges, Tate, Taylor of North Carolina, Telfair, Thomas, Vose, Ward of Massachusetts, Wilcox, Wilde, Woodward, Wright, and Yancey.

Mr. WRIGHT then, after declaring his belief that many members had voted on the question, who, from being interested in its decision, were of right excluded by a decision of the House, submitted the following proposition, which was read:

“That no member, being a proprietor, or having any share in any factory of cotton or cotton yarn, was, by the rules of this House, entitled to vote on the question fixing the duty on the importation of articles of cotton imported into America.”

Before the question was put on this resolution, a motion was made to adjourn, and carried.

WEDNESDAY, April 3.

Mr. CREIGHTON, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill from the Senate, “to authorize the Legislature of the State of Ohio to sell a certain part of a tract of land reserved for the use of that State,” reported the same without amendment; and the bill was committed to the Committee of the Whole, on the bill to authorize the sale of lands forfeited to the United States, in the district of Jeffersonville, at the land office in said district.

Mr. EASTON, from the committee to whom was referred, on the 19th of February last, the petition of the Legislature of the Territory of Missouri, made a report thereon, which was read, when Mr. E. presented a bill for the relief of certain frontier inhabitants of the Territory of Missouri; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

On motion of Mr. SAVAGE, the Committee on the Judiciary were instructed to inquire into the expediency of annexing the county of Rensselaer, in the State of New York, to the northern district of said State.

On motion of Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, the Committee on Pensions and Revolutionary Claims were instructed to inquire into the expediency of increasing the pension of George Shannon.
